two countries engage in war. Can it be true, that persons who have expatriated themselves under such circumstances, can be bound to allegiance to their original country? Could such have been the understanding of any of the persons concerned? It does seem to me to be at war with the plainest principles of reason and humanity. In this case, the population is thrown off upon the principle of self-preservation in respect to the original country; it is received into the second, upon the principles of humanity; and afterwards, forsooth, it turns out that they are bound to be the enemy, or at best, but inefficient friends to the country in which they reside; into which they have been hospitably received, and by the laws of which they have been protected. Doctrines leading to such consequences cannot be true.

But, sir, it is the practical consequences of this pretended right of Great Britain, of which we have the greatest cause to complain. Under the pretext of impressing English sailors, thousands of native-born American seamen have been forcibly dragged from their ships, their country, and friends, and compelled to endure a state of military imprisonment on board British ships of war, to fight against those who were not their enemies, and for those who had despoiled them of their liberty, and all which can endear life to man. It is true, the British Government disavows this practice, but it is equally true that it is persisted in; and it is equally true, that they are not ignorant that such must be the consequence of the practice of impressment.

Gentlemen here lay great stress on what they are pleased to call the necessity of Great Britain's exercising this practice in order to secure her maritime power, which power, they say, is necessary to preserve her existence. I do not admit, sir, that the overgrown power now possessed by Great Britain is necessary to her existence; but, if it is, it is no argument with me for abandoning any of our rights. This doctrine of necessity, as applied to the British navy, is extremely vague; and if settled as a principle, would lead to consequences, by a very plausible kind of reasoning, which would destroy the maritime rights of every other nation. The naval superiority of Britain is necessary to secure her existence; the naval superiority of Britain cannot be supported without just as much of the commerce of the world as she deems necessary to effectuate this object; therefore, Britain ought to have the monopoly of all commerce; she ought to carry for all; she ought to buy and sell for all, if necessary to support her navy. Gentlemen, I hope, are not prepared to admit this; but really, when we see the various attempts which the British Government have made to change the old settled principles of national law, or rather to introduce new principles, I am compelled to believe she desires something like such monopoly. I am, for one, not prepared to yield to the correctness of her reasoning as to the necessity of pursuing such a course for the security of her national existence, or the existence of her Government; neither am I, admitting its correctness, willing to surrender any of our rights as an independent nation, in order to secure that object. Let us stand firmly by our own rights, and depend upon our own exertions for security.

Sir, I will not enter into an examination of the question, whether this war was declared at the precise point of time when it ought. I will not endeavor to prove that it ought to have been declared sooner, or that the declaration ought to have been postponed awhile. We are engaged in war, and the great desideratum seems to be, in what way we can most probably get out of it without loss or disgrace. Neither will I undertake to investigate the question, whether this war has been skilfully conducted or not. I feel unable to say that it has been ably managed; it does seem to me, that the means furnished have not been well directed to the end. But this does not furnish to my mind a sufficient argument for withholding the means. When we furnish the means, we have done our duty; the responsibility will not rest on us; and I am entirely averse to take on myself the responsibility that might be consequent upon a denial of the means.

I will now come to the question presenting itself more directly by the bill under consideration. This bill proposes to authorize a loan, the object of which is to procure money to defray the expenses of the war. We have passed sundry bills with a view to the prosecution of the war, which are all dependent, as to their efficacy, upon this; all of which will be entirely lifeless without this. This is necessary to add sinews and give motion to the whole machinery. Is it not expedient to pass it? I hold that it is. In reflecting upon this subject, I have concluded in my mind, that it is always expedient, when a nation is engaged in a state of war with a strong Power—with a Power capable of taking advantage of its errors and endangering its rights—to prepare amply and prosecute the war vigorously, without reference to the original cause of the war. I would pursue this course, sir, because I would be unwilling to put to hazard any of the unquestionable rights of the nation, by a feeble and inefficient course of warfare; because, sir, I would rather the nation to which I belong would have it in its power to dictate the terms of pacification than to be dictated to. I am not willing to admit, that as an individual, there are not many acts of injustice which I would rather suffer than do; in which I would rather be acted upon, than be the actor; but, sir, I will frankly declare, that I would rather take upon myself the proper dividend of almost any act of injustice to a foreign nation, than my portion of the disgrace that might be consequent upon a war feebly and inefficiently prosecuted. The nation against which we are making war, is a strong nation; of this we have ample evidence; very recently by her prowess, and through the means of her financial resources, the gigantic power of Bonaparte has been broken and dissipated in Spain and Portugal; she has been the very soul, the animating principle, and given sinews to that formidable league on continental Europe, which has defeated and driven the Emperor of France within the limits of his own empire. Have we then nothing to fear from her enterprises upon the supposition of remissness or negligence on our part? I apprehend we have. We present to her enterprises a frontier of about four thousand miles, vulnerable to her and her red allies at many points; already has she seized and held for more than a year, one of our territories; it is still vulnerable; one of our States is feeble in population, and in a manner severed from the rest of the nation. If we are remiss, will she not have it in her power to seize upon some weak point and hold it, demanding as the price of restitution some commercial sacrifice not before brought into view? She may tell you, we will not yield this advantage without an equivalent; this equivalent may be some restriction on your commerce; or it may be the entire use of the lakes, with barrier towns on this side to secure that object, or both. Have we any pledge that our enemy will not have the disposition to make the most of any successes consequent upon our negligence? The history of her usurpations, exactions, and bloodshed in India, will answer the question; and the affair of Copenhagen will guaranty that answer.

Sir, the history of all nations and ages will admonish us against remissness or negligence in the conduct of a war. I will cite one or two examples. The history of the origin, progress, and termination of the second Punic war, between Carthage and Rome, exhibits to us an awful warning against any the least remissness. The ostensible origin of that war was the territorial limits of the two nations in Spain. Rome admonished the Carthagenians against crossing the river Iberus, and against molesting the people of Saguntum, her ally; she was probably right in so doing; she claimed not anything of Carthage in Africa. The Carthagenians regarded not her admonition; a large, well-disciplined army under Hannibal, the General of Carthage, the greatest warrior of the age, commenced its march for the invasion and subjugation of Rome; this army crossed the Pyrenees, traversed the length of Gaul, crossed over the Alps, and fell down upon Italy; several great battles were fought, in which the arms of Carthage prevailed; and by the great victory of the Carthagenians at Cannæ, the power of Rome seemed to be almost annihilated; it seemed to be limited to the walls of the city. Here was an important crisis in this war; immediately after this victory, the Republic of Carthage ought to have amply and promptly supplied their General with fresh troops and money. Carthage was remiss; the consequence was, that the power of Rome revived; and finally, the fate of Carthage was settled on the plains of Zama. She was compelled to sue for peace; she lost her possessions in Spain; she yielded Rome tribute, and was ignominiously restricted in her navy and commerce. Now, sir, although I do not indulge a fear that it will be as bad with us as with Carthage; yet I cannot but fear, that through negligence, we may lose much; that we may be compelled to submit to terms disgraceful in themselves; and as I would, as a Carthaginian, have regretted the lack of the means which, in all probability, would have led to the subjugation of Rome, in preference to the losses and degradation of my own country, without reference to the cause of the war; so, as an American, I would regret that we should sustain any losses, or be compelled to submit to degrading terms; and I would the more regret it, if it should seem to be the consequence of negligence. I would prefer that we could dictate the terms of peace, rather than be dictated to, without any reference to the cause of the war.

A strong example, sir, to show how unreasonably nations at war will rise in their terms with success, is exhibited in the celebrated war in Europe for the succession to the Spanish throne. In that war, Lewis XIV., with the greater part of the Spanish nation, was arrayed on the one side, contending for the right of a Bourbon to the throne; on the other, the Emperor of Austria, the United Provinces of Holland, and England, contending in favor of a descendant from the House of Hapsburg. In the progress of the war, Louis was so hardly pressed, that he offered, in order to secure his own dominions, to withdraw his forces from aiding his connexion; but so much were the allies elated with their success, that this would not satisfy them; they demanded that he should turn his arms against the competitor of the Bourbon family, his grandson. He refused this, and the result was such as it ought to have been. I am decidedly of opinion, that it is expedient to authorize the loan. The honor, interest and safety of this nation, I believe, require it.

I will vote, sir, for this loan, with a view to pave the way for a vigorous prosecution of the war; and I am decidedly opposed to any legal geographical limit to our military operations; I am unwilling that we should by law, as some desire, confine our exertions to our own territory. If we were thus to limit ourselves, the enemy would have it completely in their power to choose the time and place of battle, and could never be expected to fight us but when they were able to beat us: if we marched an army to any point of our frontier to oppose and give them battle, they would not be there unless able to beat us; but you would immediately hear of some incursion into our territory in some other part; march an army to this second point, and you will not find them unless in sufficient force to beat you. Again, sir, under this system of confining ourselves to geographical limits, the enemy will be permitted to make the utmost of any victory obtained near our borders, whilst on the other hand the crossing the line in flight will save their routed armies. I cannot consent, sir, to shield a flying foe by an act of Congress. I wish, sir, to see this war conducted according to the best rules of the art: the sum of which is, to produce to our enemy the greatest possible loss of blood and treasure by the least possible loss on our side. I believe this will be better effected by concentrating a sufficient force and making an invasion of their territory, than by waiting for their enterprises upon our territory. I would prefer that the territory of our enemy should be the theatre of military deeds, rather than our own.

I have not entered into any nice financial calculations, or made any deep researches into the principles of political economy, in order to be able to determine whether the people of this country will be able to loan to the Government the money contemplated; but I believe, judging from past occurrences, that it may be obtained: I believe it to be necessary, and I cannot bring my mind to vote against this bill upon any speculations of this kind. If we pass the bill, and the money cannot be obtained, the fault will not be in us; we will have discharged ourselves of responsibility. But, sir, I will take the liberty of remarking, that if the present state of things continue long, this Government will not be able to borrow money to meet the exigencies of the times; or will be compelled to give a most exorbitant rate of interest. This nation is now prohibited from selling anything and permitted to buy much. The purchases of foreign articles, it does seem to me, must be paid for in specie; this will produce a drain of our specie; as specie becomes scarce, its comparative value will rise; men who have capital of this sort will of course either lay it out in the purchase of property advantageously; or, upon loans, will exact a much higher rate of interest.

Sir, much has been said in relation to the rights of majorities and minorities; and with respect to what each may rightfully do. I do not mean, sir, to enter into any tedious discussion upon these subjects; but I feel somewhat interested in stating what I believe to be my duty as one of the legislators of this nation. I believe it to be my duty to endeavor to understand the true bearing of the questions proposed here; as well in relation to the Constitution which bounds our powers, as to its political consequences, as a measure of expediency, not disregarding any facts which may stand connected with it; and, after having obtained as correct a view of the subject as my mental powers will permit, to give a vote that will accord with the judgment of my mind. When I have taken this course, I will have my own approbation; I will be supported by consciousness of rectitude. Really, sir, I cannot yield that it is incumbent on me to pace through this hall and inquire of every member what will be his vote, in order to determine on what side the majority will fall, with the view to determine in what way I shall vote. I may be put down for not pursuing this course; I am prepared to meet such event. I will endeavor—it is my duty—to submit to all Constitutional acts of the majority; but I am not bound to declare they are wise or expedient.

There has been much said on the subject of parties in a Republic; we have been eloquently admonished against the evil effects of party spirit in a minority. Sir, my opinion is, that the exertions of a minority may be productive of evil consequences, when steadily pursued as an embodied party; such exertions may encourage a foreign enemy to persevere in a course of hostile policy, and may have the effect of driving the majority into a crooked, wavering, and feeble course of policy. But whilst I admit the dangers and evils to be apprehended on the one side, I will not be forgetful that there are dangers on the other. Fearless, then, of the frowns of any party, I declare to you that I believe, that whenever the liberties of this nation are destroyed, it will be done by a majority. Party spirit seems to me to be growing apace in this country; and the arts of obtaining and perpetuating party power are fast developing themselves; to what consequences they will lead, I cannot say with certainty. But really, sir, I cannot but indulge in fears that I will live to see the day when everything of rational liberty will be annihilated by some majority; when all the honors and emoluments of the nation will be disposed of, at the whim and caprice of three, four, or five of the leaders of the majority: and all these things will be managed with the forms and in the name of liberty, under the warmest professions of attachment to the public weal. I cannot fix upon any precise time for the happening of this event; but I believe I can give you many of the signs; and when all the signs are seen by men of discernment, they will verily know that the event has come to pass. When this event happens, there will be dispersed through this nation a host of hireling editors of newspapers, busily engaged in puffing their employers, and moulding and fashioning public sentiment by deception to suit their views. When this event happens, this country will swarm with little demagogues, whose appropriate business will be to sound the praise of their leaders, and misguide public sentiment; playing, at the same time, the part of sycophants to their leaders, and the deceivers of the people; looking for their reward, and willing to be sent here and wire worked by the great political jugglers in the way which may best suit their purposes. In those days, every sentiment deemed important by the leaders will be made a test, an article of political orthodoxy, and all who will not assent will be considered as heretics: it will not be enough that a man is attached to the Constitution of his country, and that he has acquired a character for integrity and good sense—he must praise his leaders—his sentiments must be in perfect accordance upon all points. Then will be heard denunciations against all who have not precisely pursued the course marked out; made for the purpose of whipping in the timid and crushing the firm. When this crisis arrives, this hall, which ought through all time be the great watch-tower of liberty—from which the language of the patriot might be heard in the voice of warning; and from which the rays of political truth might be shed abroad by open, fair, and manly discussion, will on favorite occasions be silent as death: by the use of the previous question, and upon the ready plea of the necessity of despatching business, discussion will be silenced; and this hall present to the eye a college of silent recorders. Then will the rights of all who have independence of mind to disapprove of the course of a party, however much it may merit it, consist of obedience to their will.

Whatever others may think, my judgment and feelings conspire and embolden me to say, that a majority may err. It was corrupt majorities, if my memory serves me correctly, that, by their intrigues with Philip of Macedon, paved the way for his subjugation of the Grecian Republics. The triumvirate of Cæsar, Pompey, and Crassus, wielded a majority of the Roman Senate. Cromwell had his majority in the English Parliament—yes, sir, he had his entire Parliament. Robespierre had his majority in the French National Convention. Even Nero observed the forms of the Roman Republic, and had his majority in the Senate of Rome.

Mr. PEARSON addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman: The extent and variety of this discussion may, perhaps, tend to impair the real importance and intrinsic solemnity of the subject immediately presented to our consideration. It is, however, so intimately connected with the characteristic policy and avowed objects of the Administration, as to render their separation almost impracticable, and may well justify, if not positively demand, some inquiry into that policy and those objects. By the bill on your table, together with the issue of paper called Treasury notes, for five millions of dollars, it is proposed to obtain thirty millions of dollars on the credit of the Government, to be applied exclusively to the military and naval service of the current year; the whole receipts from taxes, and other sources of revenue, not amounting to more than the payment of interest on former loans, the stipulated reimbursement of part of the old debt, and expenses of the civil list. The first question which presents itself is this: Can the Administration borrow, on terms which they ought to accept, the immense sum now proposed? I profess not, sir, any peculiar skill in finance, and but a limited knowledge of the fiscal concerns of this country. I will, therefore, not hazard a positive opinion as to the practicability of obtaining the proposed loan, though I have no hesitation in believing that it will not be obtained with the facility imagined by some gentlemen, and that the practical resources of the country, in its present situation, have been greatly overrated.

The honorable Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, (Mr. EPPES,) in a manner perhaps required to insure success to his measures, exhibited a very flattering prospect of the aggregate value of our country—the annual profits of industry—and the probable amount of necessary and unnecessary circulating medium. I object not to the effort of that gentleman, to convince us of the ability of the country, and the interest of the money holders to lend, when his object is to borrow. In private life, when a proposition is made, or a favor asked, the appeal is made to our ability or our interest. If our charity is applied to, the excellence of that cardinal virtue is not only portrayed by the successful mendicant, but his claim becomes irresistible the moment he persuades us that virtue is eminently our own.

All estimates of the character of those which the gentleman has furnished, must, in their nature, be uncertain, because their great basis rests principally on conjecture. Were I asked to set a price on the soil of my country, which would compensate its present possessors for the abandonment of it, and oblige them to seek existence in other climes, I would indignantly say, Not the accumulated wealth of the world could for a moment tempt us to part with the land of our fathers—our inestimable inheritance. In this point of view, the estimate of the capital of the country at $2,567,480,000 is far below its intrinsic value. If, on the contrary, the idea is intended to be conveyed that this sum constitutes a disposable capital, or a fund from which is derived a profit in any considerable degree equal to the ordinary interest of money, such a supposition is too illusory to require refutation. Without examining the several items which are assumed as constituting this general aggregate of our wealth, I will content myself with examining one only; and should it appear to have been overrated nearly one hundred fold, the elaborate superstructure of the honorable chairman must necessarily be shaken, and the whole fabric left for its support on little more than vague conjecture and visionary speculation. The item I allude to is $800,000,000, the estimated value of our wild unappropriated lands. What those lands may be worth some centuries to come I pretend not to say; but it is a well known fact, that the average proceeds from the sale of them for the last six or eight years has not exceeded $600,000; and as this seems to be the era for conquest, and further extension of our territorial limits, I doubt whether we can, for many years to come, calculate on increased sales of unappropriated lands. Taking, then, $600,000 as the annual value of this fund, it is evident a disposable capital of ten millions would yield an equal income. The conclusion is irresistible, that this estimated capital of $800,000,000, employed in the manner in which it is, and probably as it ought to be, is only equal to ten millions of specie, or other active capital. Thus, for all practical financial purposes, the estimated value of those lands is eighty fold beyond their real disposable value. Sir, we might as well boast of the value of the air we breathe, or of our political institutions, as to talk of a fund which cannot be brought into action, or in any way converted to meet the pecuniary exigencies of the Government. The comparison, I think, for the purposes of the argument, a fair one. This little book (the Constitution) is worth to my country more than would be the wealth of Europe—at the same time it can be purchased in any book shop for the cost of printing and paper. The sum which could be raised from the exclusive sale of it, would bear no imaginable proportion to its intrinsic value—so also must be the result of all calculations, for financial purposes, on those wild lands, and a vast proportion of undisposed capital in this and every other country.

The gentleman (Mr. EPPES) has also favored us with an estimate of the annual income arising from his assumed capital. To this the same general objections will apply; the premiums being assumed, the conclusions are necessarily inconclusive. The result of this estimate gives to us an annual income of $255,849,600. The first remark which occurs to me is the very extraordinary circumstance of the gentleman having omitted to discriminate between the net and gross income, arising from any given object; we are, therefore, totally at a loss to know whether to consider this result as comprehending the net or gross income arising from the capital of the country. I presume, however, it is a mixture of both, and therefore affords a latitude for conjecture, too broad to arrive at the truth. It cannot be net income, because the amount exceeds twelve per cent. on the given capital; a result which the most sanguine cannot admit. It cannot be gross income, because it is well known the annual produce from agriculture exceeds $19,640,600—as is sufficiently proved by the official reports of annual domestic exports—which in better times amounted to nearly fifty millions of dollars, and would now exceed that amount were it not for the war and that deadly incubus, the Embargo, which presses to death the resources and activity of the country. The sum allowed for commercial income may remain as a rule for other times; at present we have no commerce, and consequently no income from that source.

FEBRUARY, 1814.

The Loan Bill.

H. OF R.

Without examining all the items of this account of the honorable chairman, I cannot avoid noticing the last, though not least, article on the list. It is the product of other occupations, including manufactures, as stated in the last Census, amounting to $172,000,000. This, I presume, must be intended as the gross product, and indeed it is so gross as not to be susceptible of application by the Government, to any purposes of finance. I admit, with great satisfaction, the intrinsic value of our domestic manufactures; our people, of almost every description, particularly of the laborious class, are clothed with the fabrics made, for the most part, in their own families. This is as it ought to be, and is far preferable to those hotbed manufacturing establishments which spring up in times of national depression, and can only flourish on the ruins of agriculture and commerce, particularly in the Southern and Middle States, where our dispersed population, our fertile fields, and extensive seacoast, all point to the plough and the ship as the instruments of their wealth and prosperity—as the means most conducive to national good and individual virtue.

I would seriously ask gentlemen, what revenue they could expect to derive from a tax on the domestic manufactures of the Southern, Middle, or even Western States? Were this attempted, it might not literally take the bread out of the mouth of the laborer, but it would strip him of the garments he wore; it would bear most heavy on the poorer class of citizens, and in proportion to the number of women and children in a family, in that proportion would such a tax operate on them. In the States which I have mentioned we have no surplus manufactures; and from all the States the exports of manufactures, I believe, cannot be calculated at more than half a million of dollars. The exports from those sources did not, the last year, exceed about three hundred thousand dollars. From this course of reasoning I am warranted in concluding that, for Government use, or financial purposes, this immense sum of $172,000,000 dwindles down to about half a million of dollars, and that more cannot be made out of it, unless we are doomed to go naked.

The honorable chairman, having fixed the capital and productive income of the country, proceeds to ascertain, by a process I profess not to understand, the amount both of necessary and unnecessary circulating medium. The necessary circulating medium he estimates at about $47,000,000, and the surplus at $53,000,000, making in the whole one hundred millions of dollars, of which he conceives fifty-three millions may be loaned to the Government. Permit me here to remark, that this calculation appears to me to be at war with all those correct principles which govern the transactions of moneyed capitalists. It would be perfect folly for them to put into circulation more medium than is necessary for the demands of commerce, and the ordinary gradual improvement of the country; if they attempted it the surplus would return upon them, or the rate of interest would be reduced in proportion to the excess of paper set afloat. The present high rate of interest contradicts the idea of the existence of such a superabundance of circulating medium. The actual specie in the United States does not exceed twenty-five millions of dollars; this is generally held by the banks, and their paper literally constitutes the circulating medium, and not a dollar can be obtained from the banks at less interest than about seven and a quarter per cent., consequently, whatever may be the nominal amount of bank capital, they cannot keep in circulation more than the amount necessary for the objects which I have stated, which the gentleman admits to be forty-seven millions of dollars. I am inclined, therefore, to think the actual circulating medium, in times of ordinary prosperity, does not exceed fifty millions of dollars. This paper medium, resting on a specie capital of not more than twenty millions, will not, with safety, admit issues to a greater amount.

Already has the Government borrowed within the last two years near forty millions of dollars, most of which has been obtained from the banks, and from individuals who make the banks the instruments of enabling them to comply with their engagements. The fair and honest ability of the banks to lend does not exist to a much greater extent, unless the stock of the Government is considered a safe fund on which they may issue their own paper to any amount.

If this be the case, it is evident the whole system is a tottering fabric of credit; the Government relying on the credit of the banks, and the banks resting on the credit of the Government. If this confidence does exist, and is likely to continue, I would ask, why not issue Government paper at once, and save the enormous interest now paid to the banks, and run the chances of depreciation, instead of depreciating it ourselves by giving a premium for other paper, which may depreciate equally soon? I mean not to advocate a project of this sort, my object is only to show that the present system is bottomed on credit alone, and therefore may fail.

H. OF R.

The Loan Bill.

FEBRUARY, 1814.

The present unfortunate situation of the country adds much, in my judgment, to the force of those remarks. If we had a flourishing commerce—if there existed a free, reciprocal intercourse between the several States—if there were a perfect community of interests, and a riveted confidence between the various sections of the country, and especially between the moneyed men and the moneyed institutions in all the States, the prospect would be greatly changed. In those events, credit might be relied on to almost any imaginable extent. But, sir, this unfortunately is not our lot. Blocked up as we are by the enemy's squadron on our coast; corked up by our still more unmerciful Embargo and Non-importation laws, calculated, as it were, to fill up the little chasm of ills which the enemy alone could not inflict; the entire coasting trade destroyed, and even the pittance of intercourse from one port to another in the same State prohibited; the planters of the Southern and Middle States, finding no markets for their products at home, are driven to the alternative of wagoning it hundreds of miles in search of a precarious market in the Northern and Eastern States, or permitting it to rot on their hands. Many of those articles which are, or have become by habit, necessary for their comfort, are procured at the most extravagant prices from other sections of the Union. The balance of trade, if trade it may be called, from these and other causes being so entirely against the Southern and Middle States, the whole of our specie is fast travelling to the North and East; our bank paper is thrown back upon the institutions from which it was issued, and as the war expenditures are proportionably inconsiderable in the Southern and Middle States, where the loans have been principally obtained, the bills of those banks are daily returning, and their vaults drained of their specie, to be locked up in the Western and Eastern States, never to return but with the return of peace and commerce. The extraordinary and alarming demands which have lately been made from Boston on the banks of New York, and which I understand are progressing to the South, prove these remarks not to be the mere effect of fancy.

But, sir, admitting for the argument, that the bank capital is as great as has been supposed, and their notes, which constitute the circulating medium, are in amount equal to the demands of Government; does it follow that this medium is so regulated as to be safely obtained from the banks, and effectually applied to the wants of the Government? If gentlemen suppose the real circulating medium is increased in proportion to the number of banks established in every section of the country, they are greatly deceived. Bank paper being the representative of specie, the respective spheres of bank notes will be circumscribed, in proportion to the greater number of banks by which they have been issued; because it is the policy and interest of banks, in order to save their coin, not to receive in payment or give circulation to notes of distant banks. If such notes are received, it is for the purpose of redeeming their own, or demanding the specie, and therefore cannot be considered an eligible, or indeed a circulating medium at all, except to a limited extent, often confined to a particular county or State. In ordinary times this inconvenience may not be severely felt; an active commerce and free exchange of commodities between the different States would lessen the evil. But, sir, in times of commotion and of unusual expenditure, when the Government cannot adapt its local expenditures to its local receipts, when the ordinary routine of business is broken up, bank paper will not be receivable beyond the neighborhood of its own institution, or will be immediately thrown back upon it. Those institutions must necessarily become more limited and more guarded in their operations, or a failure must be the consequence. The reliance of the Government on this kind of circulating medium must be precarious. Suppose some of the principal banks were to contract for the greater part of the proposed loan, and issue their own paper on the credit of the stock to be created; these bills not finding general circulation, or a shock given to the institutions, either by accident or mismanagement, what would be the situation of Government? Their finances would be deranged, their credit impaired—enriched with a debt, but their coffers empty.

Without venturing an express opinion whether the proposed loan can be obtained from the citizens of our country, I will be allowed to express a truism—that the power of Government fairly to borrow, must depend on the ability of the people fairly to lend. This ability may be judged of, by each gentleman estimating the proportion which his constituents would have to contribute in the Constitutional mode of taxation and representation. By this mode of calculation, one of the counties which I have the honor to represent, (Rowan,) would have to contribute about ninety thousand dollars—her proportion of the present three million direct tax being about nine thousand dollars, consequently her proportion of thirty millions would be ten times that amount. Although this is a fertile and populous county, its inhabitants are unable to contribute such a sum in this or any other year, without a sacrifice of their farms and the ordinary comforts of subsistence. The same remark will apply with equal force to the other counties constituting the district I represent, and perhaps with equal force to every district in the State.

Leaving this view of the subject, which may be considered in a great measure speculative, I find other objections to the bill crowding on me with a force not to be resisted. It is sufficient for me to know that thirty millions of additional debt are about to be saddled on my country for the military operations of this single year. It is enough for me to know that the expenditures of the Government, from January, 1812, to January, 1815, will have exceeded ninety millions of dollars, exclusive of many millions of outstanding claims, and that the public debt will, at the close of the present year, exceed one hundred and five millions of dollars. This brings me again to reflect what is the proportion which my constituents will have to pay, agreeable to the Constitutional mode of taxation, and unless you restore peace and commerce no other mode can be adopted. For the sake of brevity I will take one county, (Rowan,) as before; her proportion of three millions being nine thousand, (I speak in round numbers,) the amount of debt at the close of the present year being one hundred and five millions, the proportion of this one county will be three hundred and fifteen thousand dollars, the annual interest of which, at seven per cent., will be twenty-two thousand and five dollars. This, sir, is more than the surplus product of their industry, and more than they are able to pay.

For what, then, it may be naturally inquired, is this mass of debt created—those mighty sacrifices to be made? Is it to prosecute a war of conquest against the British possessions in Canada? I believe this is the object. If so, without stopping to calculate the chances of success, which are gloomy indeed, if we may judge from what has passed, I hesitate not to say, it is an unprofitable contest, unworthy our efforts, and will illy requite our toils. For my single self I would not give a draft on the fallen Bonaparte for my share of the spoils which he has committed on our commerce, for all the advantages which, in my judgment, will result from the acquisition of Canada.

Gentlemen, however, tell us, their ulterior object is "free trade and sailors' rights." Are those objects to be attained by the conquest of Canada? Do you expect to barter the fancied conquered territories for "free trade and sailors' rights?" Whatever opinions might have originally been entertained on this question, they exist no longer. Canada once taken, you cannot get clear of it without giving up the Western States at the same time. No, sir, it will be fixed on you, although "free trade and sailors' rights" should never be heard of more. The little fleeting success which followed the achievement on Lake Erie last Fall, brought forth the real, though till then latent sentiments of the Western States. Their language was unequivocal—Canada must not, shall not be given up. The present Administration would not, and perhaps could not, resist this Western torrent. Canada once taken, even were we disposed to surrender it, I doubt whether it would be a valuable article of traffic in our hands; I doubt whether Great Britain would desire the repossession of so precarious a tenure. Those provinces would forever after be at our command; the inhabitants would be our tenants at will, and subject to our good pleasure. To retain possession might be attended with vast expense and danger to our country. Great Britain might desire to recover by force what was lost by force, but in no other way could the possession be either valuable or secure. Admitting Canada to be taken, (and that we have the physical force to take it I do not deny,) I demand of the advocates of this war to know what is then to be done. Do they mean to plant their standard on the walls of Quebec, apportion out the lands to the conquerors, and sing a requiem to "free trade and sailors' rights?" These questions never have been satisfactorily answered. It is time the people should know and understand them. My humble opinion is, if any legitimate object exists for the prosecution of this war, that object is not to be obtained by the conquest of Canada; I therefore advise the abandonment of this phantom, at least during the pendency of the present negotiation. Husband the resources of the country—do what you can for commerce and the navy, and, above all things, prepare for defence, by affording competent protection to your bleeding frontiers and exposed seacoast. Do those things which manifest a sincere love of peace—a guardian care for your suffering and exposed citizens—in a word, give a native, home-bred character to your war, and should peace not be the result you will not be forsaken, at least by me, in the hour of peril.

Gentlemen in the majority, still thirsting for conquest, attempt to treat with ridicule the suggestions from this side of the House, to suspend offensive operations. If there is anything ridiculous in the idea of a nation declaring war, merely to invite attack, that they may have the privilege of repelling it, let it be remembered that we the minority are innocent; the majority alone are answerable for this state of things, if it does or should exist. This, however, is not a fair statement of the question; it is not whether we are to become conquerors by acting on the defensive, but it is whether the resources of the country shall be exhausted in projects of ambition and of conquest—whether the whole military force shall be employed against Canada, and your homes and firesides left to take care of themselves. Sir, our paramount duty is to secure our homes before we seek adventures abroad.

Mr. Chairman, I was not a little surprised to hear an honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) say, the other day, that competent protection had been afforded to the exposed parts of the country. Sir, the Government has not afforded competent protection; the melancholy scenes which have lately been witnessed on the Northern frontier, prove, that whilst your armies were recovering from their late disasters, and securing themselves on the borders of Canada, threatening another assault in the Spring, the frontier of New York, to the extent of fifty miles, was laid waste by a handful of the enemy's troops, and the innocent inhabitants delivered over to captivity or slaughter. Let the gentleman inquire of Virginia and North Carolina what protection they have had from the General Government; let him, on his return home, visit the tomb-stones of many brave and respectable citizens of those States, who either fell by the hands of the enemy, or became the untimely victims of exposure to a climate still more ruthless, and this, too, in the performance of that duty which ought to have been assigned to the regular soldier, for the want of that protection from the General Government which every State is entitled to by the express letter of the Constitution.

Early in the last year, representations were made to the General Government of the exposed situation of the coast of North Carolina, and some small aid ardently required; the application was treated with neglect or contempt; the just apprehensions of danger on the part of our citizens were attributed to imaginary fears. Thus unprepared and unprotected, the enemy came—the State was invaded—some of our towns taken possession of; what depredations were actually committed I know not—what might have been committed, I leave to gentlemen nearer the scene than myself to inform the House. Such was the general alarm, and such the real danger, that the militia, nearly as high as the centre of the State, were called into service to repel this invasion; unarmed, unaccounted, and unprovided as they were, they flocked, as they always will do, to the standard of defence; many of those worthy men were kept in service during the unhealthy months of Autumn, exposed to a climate to them unnatural and more terrible than the enemy; many of them found in the swamps of Carolina untimely graves.

At this very period, too, there were at different rendezvous in the State several hundred regular soldiers, lolling in their tents and fattening on the public spoils; these precious mercenaries were too sacred to be employed in the inglorious service of defending the State; not a company were ordered to our relief; they were reserved for nobler purposes; they were destined for the glories and rewards of conquest, whilst the breasts of our respectable citizens were made the medium for the bayonet of the enemy, in defence of our families and our homes. If this is what the gentleman calls protection, I pray to be delivered from it. The same gentleman has also reminded us of our apprehensions and predictions in relation to our exposed towns and seacoast. I will only remark, that those predictions have, to a considerable extent, unfortunately been realized; and that they have not been fully so, is not owing to any efficient protection from the General Government. That gentleman ought to be the last to talk of prophecies; he, if I mistake not, once turned prophet, and told this people, as an inducement to embark them into this war, that Canada would be conquered in six weeks; this entitles the gentleman to a distinguished place among the false prophets.

Mr. Chairman, however much this war was justly deprecated in its origin, however disastrous and hateful it may have become in its progress, I acknowledge, with peculiar satisfaction, that my apprehensions for the existence of my country, its laws, and institutions, have greatly subsided. The events in Europe, as unexpected as they have been sudden and glorious, have cleared the ancient horizon of the gloomy despotism which had well nigh overwhelmed and extinguished every ray of freedom in Europe, have dispelled the mist which has so long clouded our atmosphere, and exposed to public view the tendency of our ill-fated policy. Yes, sir, for my country, and for the cause of humanity, I do rejoice that the charm of Napoleon's invincibility is broken, that the chains he had prepared for mankind are rent asunder, and that his power is about to become harmless, if not totally annihilated. A new birth has been given to liberty in Europe, and I trust it will be cherished with a holy zeal. With ourselves, I no longer consider the unfortunate contest in which we are engaged, as involving the question of the guillotine; no longer whether we "shall or shall not be a people." Many valuable lives may yet be lost in the prosecution of this war, the country may be overwhelmed with a debt, which centuries of prosperity will scarcely enable our posterity to pay; much individual suffering and privation may be inflicted, and thousands of corrupt, and corrupted sycophants of power may feed and fatten on the public spoils; but the balance of power in Europe restored and preserved, the good sense of this nation must and will rid us of war; our liberties will outlive the storm, and our Constitution survive the wreck. Suppose the scene to have changed, and Bonaparte at this moment giving law to the whole Continent—England, our present enemy, might and probably would fall; she could not long resist the colossal power of the mighty tyrant; what then would be our fate? Is there a virtuous man among us, what lover of his country, whose nerves are so strong as not to tremble at such a prospect? Our own country, the only then remaining nursery for anything like the great principles of free Government, would have fallen a prey to the great spoiler. Our liberty alone would afford a sufficient temptation, and we should experience the reality of a tyrant's love.

Some gentlemen of the majority, particularly the honorable member from Louisiana, (Mr. ROBERTSON,) shudder at the idea of England's increased power and influence. It would have been well for the country, had those gentlemen calculated differently and more accurately the doctrine of chances, before we were involved in this war. What their calculations on the events of Europe really were, I pretend not to say. The prospect was too big not to have been seen, and ought to have been regarded by all prudent politicians. I well know what were my own fears, and those of my political friends—the very reverse of what has come to pass. It cannot be forgotten that the storm was gathering on the Continent, while the clouds were lowering here; it burst upon Russia almost at the same moment it flashed upon us; the legions of France poured into Russia, while our forces marched towards Canada. This extraordinary coincidence could not well have been the effect of accident or chance. Gentlemen could not but reflect on the consequences and the effect of our apparent co-operation. If they regret the result of the European contest, they must have desired the success of Bonaparte; they must have prepared themselves to encounter the scenes which I have but so feebly described, and which have filled my mind with so much "secret dread and inward horror."

The present situation and prospects of Europe, so far from threatening the existence of our country, afford to my understanding the animating prospect of returning peace, and ought to stimulate our desires and efforts to restore its blessings. England, it is true, has now less to fear; she may give more efficient protection to her Canada possessions, and increase the annoyance of our exposed seacoast; but her power is not essentially increased. Our country is in no danger of being overrun; were this attempted, it would become the holy cause of defence, in which there would be no division; in such a cause, even "weakness would become strength." Were it necessary, security against the power of England would be found in those nations who have lately redeemed themselves from the yoke of Bonaparte. Can it be believed that the spirit which animated the betrayed Spaniard, and armed him with all the energy of despair; the spirit which nerved the arm of the Russian, and kindled up a holy flame among the subjected nations of Europe, will be so easily extinguished? That those nations who have thus successfully thrown off one tyrant, will immediately bend their necks to another? Sir, I will not believe so meanly of them. They have an interest in the proper limitations of power; they have an interest in commerce and in the ocean; they have an interest in our friendship and our prosperity. These considerations, while they tend to lessen the imagined power of England, offer additional inducements for us to desire peace; they imperatively demand that we should repeal the embargo, and the whole black catalogue of restrictions on commerce, which serve only to impoverish your citizens, and make sport for your enemies. All imaginable inducements for continuing your suicidal restrictions are now at an end; all the ports of the Continent are now open to us and to Great Britain, she can neither be starved by our embargo, or thrown into insurrection by our non-intercourse: repeal, then, your embargo; let our industry find its reward in the hungry markets of Europe; this will give enterprise to seamen, and raise the drooping spirits of the laborer.

In reviewing the leading policy of the Administration for the last six or seven years, the mind is struck with the peculiar tendency (whatever may have been the motives) of that policy to a direct and unequivocal co-operation with the avowed objects of France. What has been the great and primary object of France? The destruction of England. Despairing of effecting his purpose by invasion, or the chances of ordinary combat, the tyrant of France conceived the gigantic project of accomplishing the destruction of Great Britain by a total interdiction of her commerce with all other nations. All the great Powers on the continent of Europe were either compelled or seduced into a co-operation with this great continental system, which, in the language of Bonaparte, in order to be effectual must be complete. The history of the various decrees and regulations by which this system was to bind up the commerce of the world, and the practical conformity of this Government by its embargoes, non-intercourses, non-importations, &c., has been so fully and clearly stated by an honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BIGELOW) as to forbid even an attempt at repetition. The honorable gentleman, however, seemed to think, that while France demanded and enforced compliance from the nations on the Continent, in the most public, official, and dictatorial style, there was no official document to prove that a similar demand was made on the Government of the United States.

It is true, sir, the public have not been peculiarly favored with official knowledge of our relations with France, and as Congress only gets such scraps and extracts as the Executive deems fit to communicate, and some of them most secret and confidential, it is not a matter of surprise that such a record as the gentleman speaks of should not be found on our tables in hac verba; but, sir, we are not without evidence, and that, too, of the most public and positive character, given by Bonaparte and his Ministers on this very point. Turn to the Berlin decree of 1806, and the Milan decree of 1807; there you will find all nations, without exception, required to conform to the maritime code of France, and denunciations, threatening the enraged vengeance of France to alight on those who refuse or neglect to comply. When the American Minister at Paris humbly asked whether the treaty which then existed between this country and France was thus to be violated, by including America in the scope of those decrees, the answer was at first a little equivocal, but soon became certain by the capture and condemnation of our vessels, and the explicit declaration of Champagny "that the law was general, and admitted of no exceptions." What demand could have been more public than those decrees; what more explicit than their practical operations on our commerce, and what more official than the written declaration of the Minister of Foreign Affairs? I ask gentlemen, what better testimony could we have given of prompt and ready acquiescence than by our embargo of December, 1807; the recommendation of which was the immediate consequence of despatches from France, and not a knowledge of the Orders in Council of Great Britain? This self-destructing measure met the smiles and approbation of Bonaparte; he pronounced it a magnanimous resistance to the maritime tyranny of Great Britain. While this measure was continued and enforced with vigor, it was applauded by the great author of the continental system. Whenever the sufferings and clamors of our own oppressed citizens caused a temporary relaxation, we were denounced and punished for disobedience. I will not tax you, sir, with the disgusting recital of the multiplied and uniform declarations of the Emperor of France, and the language of all his State papers, showing the character of his continental system, and proving the estimate placed by him on our compliance. Those decrees are declared to be the fundamental law of his Empire; the flag is to be considered an extension of territory, and the nation which suffers it to be violated, forfeits its neutrality. In March, 1811, (previous to a knowledge of our unfortunate non-intercourse law of that month,) the Emperor, in an address to his Council of Commerce, thus expresses himself: "The fate of American commerce will soon be decided. I will favor it if the United States conform themselves to these decrees. In a contrary case their vessels will be driven from my Empire. The commercial relations with England must cease." Thus, sir, we are not left to conjecture to know what was the judgment of Bonaparte on those who refused to give full effect to his continental system. In what light he considered our restrictive system, and particularly the law of March, 1811, may be collected from the following extract from the Mercure de France, a Parisian journal of high authority, published in April, 1811; after speaking of the measures adopted against England by the European allies of France—"the Americans (says this journal) on their part, are establishing in the New World, another continental system, which draws still closer the blockade to which England has subjected herself by menacing France," &c. The French gazettes all hold a similar language, and take it for granted that we have become members of the Imperial League. These opinions emanate from the Emperor himself.

If further evidence of the demands of Bonaparte on this country to conform to his system, were necessary to prove that nothing short of unconditional compliance, or war with England, would appease him, I would refer to the correspondence of Mr. Barlow, our late Minister to France. When this gentleman submitted his project for negotiation, and placed, as he says, our relations in a point of view both novel and impressive, the Emperor did not know how he could reconcile the provisions to the principles of his great continental system. But, sir, in the absence of all other testimony on this subject, I have a document before me, the authenticity and official character of which is now no longer to be denied or questioned, which proves the most unequivocal and formal demand on our Government to accede to the maritime confederation. I allude to the celebrated letter of General Turreau, late Minister of France, to Robert Smith, Esq., late Secretary of State, dated June 14, 1809. Among the least of the abominations contained in this letter is the following paragraph:

"I have thought it was not incompatible with my duty to submit to the wisdom of your Government, the new chances, which the changes brought about in Europe offer to the commercial interests of the United States, and the inconveniences which may result from their refusal to accede formally to the principles of the maritime confederation."

That we have been formally and officially required to conform to the views and policy of France, I think I have fully established; how far we have yielded to those and that policy by our restrictive systems, and how far embraced them by our war, I leave to history to decide, and the impartial world to judge.

Mr. Chairman: It is time we should pause; it is time we should seriously reflect, whether any, and what essential, practical, attainable good is to result from the prosecution of this war; the great object for which it was declared—the Orders in Council—has now ceased to exist. The question of impressment alone remains; this question I do believe can be so arranged as to exempt our native seamen from abuse, and to give to Great Britain reasonable security against the employment of her seamen on board our public and private vessels. The right asserted by Great Britain to impress her subjects from on board our merchant vessels may remain undecided. The abuses of which we complain have arisen in a great degree from the troubled state of the European world, and the peculiar inducements which our merchant service held out for the employment of foreign seamen, and not solely from the assertion of an abstract principle—a principle which, I may be permitted to say, is recognised and practised on by France and every maritime nation of Europe. But, sir, if the right is denied; if the claim, set up by Great Britain, to impress her own subjects, is totally unfounded, have we the power of compelling her to abandon it? Is there a gentleman in this House; is there an intelligent man in the nation, who does, or can believe, that the abandonment of this right is to be extorted by the war in which we are engaged? I believe not, sir.

It is not a little remarkable that we should now be at war for an object which did not produce the declaration of war; for a principle which was never even attempted to be adjusted by the present Administration, previous to the commencement of hostilities, and which was totally overlooked or disregarded in the arrangement made with Mr. Erskine in 1809, and is not named in any of the conditions to our restrictive laws by which commerce and intercourse were to be restored with Great Britain. This perhaps exhibits a phenomenon in the history of wars and politics. Believing the question of impressment susceptible of practical arrangement, I have always deemed it unfortunate that the instructions given to Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, in the attempted negotiation, during the Administration of Mr. Jefferson, required an absolute abandonment of the right, instead of leaving a discretion with the Commissioners, or devising some equivalent by which the abstract right might have remained untouched, and reasonable security afforded against the complaints of both parties. To show that our Government, in their negotiations on the subject of impressment, uniformly stickled for the abandonment of the right, instead of attempting to regulate its exercise, I will refer to the instructions of Mr. Monroe, in 1804, and

The Loan Bill.

H. OF R.

the correspondence which terminated in a treaty with Great Britain, signed by our Commissioners, Monroe and Pinkney, and an arrangement on the subject of impressment, which those gentlemen declared to be both safe and honorable to the United States; but all of which, unfortunately, were rejected by Mr. Jefferson.

The first article in those instructions requires from England the renunciation of the "claim to take from on board our vessels, on the high seas, any person whatever, not in the military service of the enemy." In the observations of Mr. Madison on this article, he says: "Were the right of Great Britain in this case not denied, the abuses flowing from it would justify the United States in claiming and expecting a discontinuance of its exercise. But the right is denied, and on the best grounds." In the progress of the discussions on the subject of impressment, we are informed by Monroe and Pinkney, "the British Commissioners felt the strongest repugnance to a formal renunciation of their claim to take from our vessels, on the high seas, such seamen as should appear to be their own subjects; and they pressed upon us with much zeal, as a substitute for such an abandonment, a provision that the persons composing the crews of our ships should be furnished with authentic documents of citizenship, the nature and form of which should be settled by treaty; that these documents should completely protect those to whom they related," &c.

This proposition was rejected. Our Commissioners were asked to state what equivalent they could offer for securing to Great Britain the services of her seamen, if the right of impressment were abandoned.

The only proposition in reply was, that provision might be made for giving the aid of the local authorities of the United States to apprehend and restore deserters from their vessels; and that laws should be passed, to be reciprocal, making it penal for the commanders of American vessels to take deserters from the public or private vessels of Great Britain. This proposition only relating to cases of real desertion, was of course not deemed a sufficient equivalent. Had we then thought of going the length of excluding British seamen from on board our vessels, (as has been since done by what is called the seamen's bill,) the result might have been different. If indeed our Administration were disposed, at that time, to accept a treaty on any terms.

The British Commissioners having assured Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney that their Government was willing to do anything in its power to satisfy the United States on the ground of their complaints, which might be done without a relinquishment of their claim, they presented a note containing an arrangement on the subject of impressment, which was acceded to by our Commissioners, and of the contents of which they thus speak: "We persuade ourselves that by accepting the invitation which it gives, and proceeding in the negotiation, we shall place the 'business almost, if not altogether, on as good a footing as we should have done by treaty, had the project we offered them been adopted.' This arrangement, (as I before stated,) was rejected by our Executive, and whether the price of this war will purchase a better arrangement, or give greater security to our seamen, is to my mind extremely problematical.

An honorable gentleman, (Mr. INGERSOLL,) I will not say the "principal Representative," but certainly the principal speaking Representative from Pennsylvania, in an elaborate speech the other day, passing the Orders in Council, and scarcely glancing at the question of impressment, in his deep researches, brought forth a new, and hitherto unforeseen cause for the war, and an additional inducement for its continuance.

This discovery is found by that gentleman in the violation of the principle "that free ships make free goods." This principle may be convenient to France, or nations possessing little maritime strength, and who are frequently engaged in wars; but to us, who are capable of being our own carriers, whose interest it is to have our own vessels employed in our own trade, and not in that of other nations; and who are, or may become, a great commercial and maritime Power, such a principle cannot be desirable. That it is not the established law of nations, I have no hesitation in asserting. It is unnecessary; it would be worse than idle now to discuss the principle which the gentleman has so much labored. Let it suffice to know that every Administration in this country has practised on the contrary doctrine, and no one of them contended for the doctrine now advanced, as being necessary for the interest of this country, or sanctioned by the law of nations. The treaty made by Mr. Jay with Great Britain in 1794, contained no such principle. The celebrated instructions to Monroe and Pinkney, written by the present Executive, and sanctioned by Mr. Jefferson, expressly disclaimed such a principle. For the satisfaction of the gentleman, (Mr. INGERSOLL,) and that only, I might add the authority of Mr. Clay, one of the Commissioners intrusted with the negotiation to be opened at Gotenburg, directly militating against the doctrine "free ships make free goods." Having mentioned the name of one of our negotiators, (Mr. Clay,) I may be permitted here to observe, that although I am not without hope and expectation of a favorable termination of the war, bottomed on the propositions of the British Government, which have been acceded to by our Administration, I confess this hope and expectation is not strengthened by the knowledge I have of the sentiments of the gentleman to whom I have alluded; on the contrary, I do not conceive that any attainable treaty with Great Britain can be signed by that gentleman, consistently with his declarations publicly uttered in this hall, and afterwards deliberately written and published to the world. That I may be distinctly understood, and avoid doing the least possible injustice to a gentleman who has his admirers, and who is not present to hear me, I will not trust to my recollection for a recital of his opinions, but refer to a speech delivered by him on this floor, on the 8th of January, 1813. From this speech it appears that Mr. Clay was one of those who would not acknowledge that had the Orders in Council been repealed before the war was declared, the declaration would not have been prevented; after expressing this sentiment, he says, "I have no hesitation, then, in saying that I have always considered the impressment of American seamen as much the most serious aggression." What is meant by the term American seamen, is explained in another part of this speech, and is made to comprehend all persons except enemies' subjects. Speaking of the British principle of impressment, he says, "What is this principle?" She contends that she has a right to the services of her own subjects. That in the exercise of this right she may lawfully impress them, even though she finds them in our vessels, on the high seas, without her jurisdiction. Now I deny that she has any right without her jurisdiction to come on board our vessels, upon the high seas, for any other purpose but in pursuit of enemies, or their goods, or goods contraband of war." He then proceeds to say, "when nations are engaged in war, those rights in controversy, which are not acknowledged by the treaty of peace, are abandoned."

The British principle of impressment, being the right now in controversy, unless that principle is surrendered by Great Britain, no treaty (according to the doctrine of Mr. Clay) can be made without the abandonment of the object for which he says the war was declared, and is now prosecuted. Who is there among us so sanguine as to believe the British claim to impress her own subjects from our merchant vessels will be abandoned? Is not the principle now substantially admitted, or at least the controversy waived by the Administration, in their acceptance of the proposition to negotiate on the basis of the public law of nations, and the maritime rights of Great Britain? And is not the point of honor substantially yielded by this House by what is called the seamen's bill?—a bill (although some of its provisions are extremely objectionable) which I voted for; and on the principles of which I rest with some confidence for an arrangement of the question of impressment. This bill met the decided disapprobation of Mr. Clay. He threw upon it an air of ridicule and declared "Lord Castlereagh would laugh at our simplicity;" he complained that the Administration had erred in the steps which it had taken to restore peace, "not by doing too little, but in betraying too great a solicitude for that event. An honorable peace (says the gentleman) is attainable only by an efficient war. My plan, (says he) would be to call out the ample resources of the country, give them a judicious direction, prosecute the war with the utmost vigor, strike where we can reach the enemy at sea or on land, and negotiate the terms of peace (at St. Petersburg? No. At London? No. At Gottenburg? No) "at Quebec or Halifax." With such sentiments as these, am I not warranted in saying that no attainable treaty can be signed by Mr. Clay, without involving him in the grossest inconsistency, or without a total revolution in his opinions? I trust, as the Administration appears to have yielded, he will also bend to circumstances.

To return to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. INGERSOLL,) the peculiarity and contradictory character of whose remarks excited some attention. He mentioned the treaty negotiated by Mr. Jay in 1794, and approved by General Washington. His breast appeared to labor with denunciations against that treaty, to which his lips refused to give utterance. One evil consequence of that treaty, he remarked, was the displeasure of France, and our subsequent troubles with that nation. Are considerations of so humiliating a character, said Mr. P., to govern a nation which boasts of its spirit and independence? Are they to influence the ardent spirits whose motto is "free trade and sailors' rights," and who have now put everything dear to the country at hazard? Has it come to this, that peace with any other nation is not to be sought for, for fear of offending France? I am not without my suspicions that this fear of offending France was not among the least of the causes for rejecting the treaty of Monroe and Pinkney, in the year 1807, without even submitting it to the Senate.

The violent, outrageous opposition to Jay's Treaty, under which this country enjoyed the most unexampled prosperity, during its continuance, is sufficiently remembered, and recorded in the history of those times. Nothing but the god-like influence of Washington could have allayed the storm of faction excited by those, and the friends of those, who now talk so much about the dangers of opposition. The effigies of Mr. Jay and other distinguished advocates of this treaty were burnt in various sections of the country, and even that of General Washington did not escape those rude indecencies.* Mr. Chairman, the opposition of those days was not, as now, confined to the honest and conscientious expression of opinion, and the exposure of wicked men and measures. No, sir, the Constitution formed no barrier to Democratic fury. The laws were resisted, and the standard of rebellion reared on their ruins. The country was threatened with the revolutionary scenes of France, and the pretended Republicans were then as clamorous to embark hand and hand in the cause of France as their successors are now for "free trade and sailors' rights." How those scenes terminated, and how some of the principal actors have been rewarded, it is unnecessary to relate.

* I am confident I am not mistaken in stating that General Washington was burnt in effigy. The fact is recorded in the publications of the day. But, as I am informed by the honorable Speaker (Mr. Cheves) and others, the effigy of General Washington was not among those of Mr. Jay and others, which were burnt in Charleston, South Carolina, in the year 1794.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. INGERSOLL,) in his great zeal for hunting up the causes and objects of the war, told us at the last session, (when taxes were the order of the day,) that if this war occasioned the establishment of a regular system of taxation, it would be well worth the cost. I trust the gentleman is satisfied with the progress which is making in such an establishment. If he is not, I hope the people will be before the present loan is obtained, and the countless millions which are expended, repaid.

The gentleman stated, in a speech delivered some weeks ago, that, with or without the original causes of the war, Canada must, and ought to be ours. He said, also, that the military reputation of the country demanded the further prosecution of the war; it was necessary to retrieve the character which had been lost or tarnished by the disgrace and disasters which had attended our military operations. In this sentiment, there is a tincture of ambition; it might become a military despot thus to think and speak. I recollect just such a sentiment fell from the French Minister soon after Bonaparte was driven out of Russia. The Emperor could not make peace without having another battle. He had too much military fame to lose, &c.

The gentleman, (Mr. INGERSOLL,) however, in his last speech, (perhaps forgetting what he had before said, or possibly changing his opinion) declared that we were the weakest people in the whole family of human societies, and that we had performed wonders in this war, eclipsing the deeds of our fathers in the Revolution. I object not to this apparent inconsistency in the gentleman's remarks, especially when they tend to diminish the inducements for continuing the war; but if he continues to present additional causes for the war, and inducements for its continuance in every speech he makes, I must assure him, that whatever satisfaction I might derive from hearing him on other topics, none is experienced from efforts tending to remove the prospect of peace further and further from our view. One more remark of the gentleman, and I am done with him. He attributes the success of Great Britain and her triumphs over Bonaparte, not so much to military or naval prowess as to the operations of finance. At the same time he says, the Ministry who have accomplished those things are the weakest England ever had. I will only remark, that if military and financial operations are successful in proportion to the weakness of those who direct them, we too are not without hopes of victory; our Treasury may yet be overflowing.

Mr. Chairman, there was a time, and that not very distant, when the people of this country shrunk with horror from the idea of the calamities of war. There was a time when the present Chief Magistrate considered none but a defensive war legitimate, or warranted by the spirit and genius of our political institutions. He then thought, or pretended to think, that of all the enemies of public liberty, war is perhaps most to be dreaded, because it comprises and develops every other. War is the parent of armies; from these proceed debts and taxes. And armies, and debts, and taxes, are the known instruments of bringing the many under the domination of the few. In war, too, the discretionary power of the Executive is extended; its influence in dealing out offices, honors, and emoluments, are multiplied; and all the means of seducing the minds of the people are added to those of subduing the force of the people. Such sentiments as these were once entertained by the man who brought us into this war, and who is exercising that dangerous extended discretionary power, which he himself in other times so justly deprecated. But those times have changed, and he has changed with them. In 1798 we had a handful of men; they were commanded by Washington and Hamilton; the men now in power, and their advocates then trembled for the public liberty. If there was cause to fear an army of six thousand men in 1798, under such commanders, who can measure our danger now with an army of sixty-three thousand, directed by an Armstrong, and governed by a Wilkinson?

Mr. Chairman, much clamor has been heard from the majority against the course of Opposition, which the minority find themselves bound, by judgment and conscience, to give to the fatal policy which is forced on them. I should not notice the remarks of gentlemen who sounded their complaints and denunciations on this subject, were they not subversive of the great first principles of civil liberty, and calculated to encourage the wicked and mislead the ignorant. In what does our opposition consist? Are your laws resisted? No; we obey them all. Do we refuse to pay our taxes as far as we are able? No. Do we refuse to do militia duty when constitutionally required? No. The head of our offending must consist in this—we do not always speak well of you and your measures, because we cannot consistently with truth. We yet claim and exercise the privilege of inquiring into your policy, discussing your propositions and condemning wicked men and measures, as our judgments dictate. Because we will not give up those plain, unsophisticated every-day rights, and because their exercise is not at all times most soothing to the majority, those rights are attempted to be wrested from us, by the introduction of a new political dictionary, by which inquiry is made to mean toryism; discussion, moral treason; and the exposure of weak or wicked men and measures, hostility to the Government! Sir, my opposition is and shall continue to be directed by the best dictates of my understanding, for the best interests of my country. It shall be tempered with a prudent zeal. It shall be bounded by the law and the Constitution, and, if assailed within those ramparts, the ruffian tyrant shall be repulsed at every hazard, because he aims his blow at the vitals of the Constitution and the liberty of the citizen. In time of war, inroads on the essential principles of free government are most easily effected. It is then that Executive power makes its encroachments, and machiavellian corruption is set afloat. It is in times like those that the true patriot ought to redouble his vigilance in guarding and defending the passes to his liberty. I am sufficiently acquainted with human nature to know the ill effect of giving the sanction of high authority to false doctrines; the ignorant, and often the good man, is deluded, and the wicked always avail themselves of it, to let loose the worst of passions to gratify private hatred or party malice. I may be permitted here to remark, that even in the section of country where I reside, and where the majority are opposed to the policy of the war, men were found who joined in the cry, "War is now declared, opposition must cease;" trusting, I presume, to the purse and sword which the war had placed in the hands of the Executive, some were found sufficiently emboldened to declare, the time is near at hand when no man would dare to own himself a Federalist. In the district represented by my honorable colleague, (Mr. YANCEY,) I have understood, but vouch not for its correctness, that a ticket, and perhaps the only one, given at one of the separate elections, for his opponent, who was denominated the peace candidate, was, at the close of the election, tarred and feathered; and the innocent voter, who dared to think for himself, was in some danger of sharing the same fate. I mention this circumstance, not from previous reflection; it occurred to me at the moment, and certainly not with a view of exciting the sensibility of my colleague, or reflecting on any of his respectable friends. It is a practical illustration of incorrect doctrines, and the danger of factious majorities.

The gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. GRUNDY) has favored us with an improved edition of his former doctrine of moral treason. I trust that the gentleman is now as tired of hearing this absurd term of his own creation, moral treason, as he ought to be of the rope which he informed us was so twisted round our necks that it could only be cut by the sword of war. He attempts now to enforce his doctrine by the authority of the late Dr. Witherspoon, who attempted to reconcile the conscientious scruples of some of his more ignorant countrymen, in favor of the American Revolution. Sir, the gentleman from Tennessee does the most manifest injustice to the memory of that worthy man by the analogy he has drawn. The object of Dr. Witherspoon was to quiet the scruples of conscience in the midst of Revolutionary throes, when there was no Constitution prescribing the rights and duties of the citizen; when there was no law but that of power to govern the conduct of men.

The object of the gentleman from Tennessee is to compel us to act against the dictates of conscience; to take from us the shield of the Constitution, substitute force for law, and put us under the ban of the empire. Were that venerable statesman to rise in these fallen times, and witness the gross perversion of his virtuous sentiments, he would blush for the degeneracy of those who prove themselves so unworthy of that rich inheritance, the Federal Constitution, which he contributed to create, and which was handed to us, clothed with all the attributes of human perfection.

Some gentlemen have proposed to grant to the gentleman from Tennessee a patent right for his application of the sentiments of Dr. Witherspoon to his own doctrine of moral treason. I must deny even this credit to the gentleman; it is due, if to anybody, to an honorable colleague of mine, (Mr. FORNEY,) who does not often favor the House with his remarks, although he sometimes addresses circulars to his constituents.

The gentleman (Mr. GRUNDY) has illustrated his doctrine in another way. He says, if a man joins or gives aid and comfort to the enemy, he is guilty of treason;—a fortiori, if the same person, instead of joining and giving aid and comfort to the enemy, refuses to lend his money to the Government, or advises others not to lend, or happens to dissuade his friend or some half a dozen giddy young men not to abandon their families and homes for the dangers and corruptions of the camp; for thus exercising the freedom of opinion, and forbearing or refusing to do that, which, by no principle or law, was he bound to do, he, agreeably to the logic of the gentleman, is guilty of this new-fangled crime of moral treason. Thus the effect of a lawful and Constitutional course of conduct, and not the motive, constitutes the crime. This case the gentleman calls his field of argument. If this case establishes the doctrine of moral treason, I think it will not be difficult to prove that the gentleman himself is a moral traitor. It is probable the gentleman has some money which he can spare; if he does not lend it to the Government, as they are in great want, he is guilty. It is very probable the example which that gentleman could set, by enlisting in the Army of the United States, would induce some hundreds of his constituents to enlist also. If he refuses to do those things, the effect is unquestionably more injurious to the country than were he actually to join the enemy; consequently, by his own doctrine, he is more guilty.

The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) argues differently from his friend from Tennessee. He says it is the motive, and not the effect, which constitutes the crime. He admits the right of opposition to a certain extent, beyond which it swells into faction, becomes corrupt, and seeks the destruction of the Government. This may be very true, but I deny its application to the minority of this House or this nation. All our acts are lawful; every expression breathes the genuine feelings of patriotism, and, when most warm, it is the honest glow of indignation, roused by the oppressive and ruinous acts of an overbearing majority, or by the introduction of slavish doctrines, subversive of the first principles of civil liberty, and foreign to our Constitution and the genius of our happy form of Government.

Sir, when I reflect on the right guaranteed to every freeman in this country by the charter of our liberties, I feel humbled and degraded, as the Representative of thousands of free and enlightened citizens, in finding myself under the necessity of repelling doctrines fitted only for anarchy or military despotism; in asserting rights sanctioned by the experience of more than thirty years, and which are so plain as to be perfectly understood, and are enjoyed even by the beggar in the streets. Let me tell the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) if he wishes to establish an ordeal for trying men's consciences, I have no objection, provided we can get just judgment; but I shall certainly object to that gentleman being the presiding magistrate. Let me tell gentlemen in the majority, if they wish to quiet opposition, they must change their destructive course of policy; they must seek the advancement of the nation's interest, and not solely that of a party. In proportion to the wickedness or folly of those in power, in that ratio will be the opposition of good men, while a vestige of spirit and independence remains. And should the liberties of this people be encroached upon, step by step, till you arrive at the threatened conscription, you will find opposition in every virtuous breast.

After the turbulent scenes of 1798 and 1799 had subsided (in which, by the by, the present majority acted a part, far surpassing in violence of opposition anything which has characterized the present times) the country experienced almost a perfect calm; opposition was scarcely heard of among the people for about four years; they continued to prosper during the existence of the treaty with Great Britain, and were first roused by the expiration of that treaty, and the refusal of Mr. Jefferson either to renew it or accept the subsequent treaty negotiated by Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney. These discontents were strengthened by the fatal embargo of 1807, have continued, and will continue to increase as the policy of Administration becomes more and more destructive of our best interests.

The opposition of a minority is, in the nature of things, harmless. If limited within the bounds of the Constitution, it is lawful, and often necessary. If it transcends those bounds, there is always the disposition and the power in the majority to restrain it. The truth is, and at this day this truth is unfortunately too evident, that factious majorities are the real enemies of public liberty. To this source may be traced the destruction of Republics in ancient and modern times, and from this cause we have some reason to tremble for the safety of our Constitution and country. Permit me, sir, to fortify this opinion by an authority which gentlemen in the majority cannot disregard. I refer to no less authority than the present Chief Magistrate of the United States. In a speech of Mr. Madison, made in the Virginia Convention, when he advocated the adoption of the Federal Constitution, he thus expresses himself:

"Since the general civilization of mankind, I believe there are more instances of the abridgment of the freedom of the people, by gradual and silent encroachments of those in power than by violent and sudden usurpations; but, on a candid examination of history, we shall find the turbulence, violence, and abuse of power, by the majority trampling on the rights of the minority, have produced factions and commotions, which, in Republics, have more frequently than any other cause produced despotism. If we go over the whole history of ancient and modern Republics, we shall find their destruction to have generally resulted from those causes."

This extract requires no comment; it shall have none from me but my sanction.

I had intended, sir, to submit some remarks on the doctrine of retaliation and expatriation, but fear I have already exhausted the patience of the Committee, as I certainly have my own strength. I will, therefore, conclude my remarks by reading an extract from an elegant author (Goldsmith) who was a good Whig in his day, an excellent judge of the human character, and no inconsiderable statesman. This extract may not be inapplicable to the present times, and not totally irrelevant to the question of opposition, which has been incidentally discussed:

"There is," says this author, "a very honest gentleman, with whom I have been acquainted these thirty years, during which there has not been one speech uttered against the Ministry in Parliament, nor struggle at an election for a Burgess, to serve in the House of Commons, nor a pamphlet published in opposition to the Administration, nor even a private censure, passed in his hearing, upon the conduct of any person concerned in public affairs, but he is immediately alarmed, and loudly exclaims against such factious doings, in order to set the people by the ears together, at such a delicate juncture. At other times, says he, such opposition might not be improper, and I don't question the facts that are alleged; but, at this crisis, sir, to inflame the nation—the man deserves to be punished as a traitor to his country. In a word, according to this gentleman's opinion, the nation has been in a violent crisis, at any time these thirty years, and were it possible for him to live another century, he would never find any period, at which a man might with safety impugn the infallibility of a Minister.

"Opposition, when restrained within due bounds, is the salubrious gale, that ventilates the opinions of the people, which might otherwise stagnate into the most abject submission. It may be said to purify the atmosphere of politics; to dispel the gross vapors raised by ministerial artifice and corruption, until the Constitution, like a mighty rock, stands fully disclosed to the view of every individual who dwells within the shade of its protection. Even when this gale blows with augmented violence, it generally tends to the advantage of the Commonwealth. It awakens the apprehension, and consequently arouses all the faculties of the pilot at the helm, who redoubles his vigilance and caution, exerts his utmost skill, and becoming acquainted with the nature of the navigation, in a little time learns to suit his canvass to the roughness of the sea, and the trim of the vessel. Without these intervening storms of opposition to exercise his faculties, he would become enervate, negligent, and presumptuous; and in the wantonness of his power, trusting to some deceitful calm, perhaps hazard a step that would wreck the Constitution."

When Mr. PEARSON had concluded, the House adjourned.

The Loan Bill.

FEBRUARY, 1814.

THURSDAY, February 17.

Mr. LEWIS presented a petition of the congregation of Trinity Church, in Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, praying to be authorized to raise money by means of a lottery, to be applied to the erection of a church for said congregation. —Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. INGHAM, the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims were discharged from the petitions of A. J. Chevallie, agent for Amelie Eugenie de Beaumarchais; and the said petitions, together with all papers relating to the claim of the said Beaumarchais, were referred to Mr. LOWNDES, Mr. BURWELL, Mr. GRUNDY, Mr. TAYLOR, Mr. STOCKTON, Mr. GASTON, and Mr. OAKLEY.

Mr. INGERSOLL, from the committee appointed on the petition of Oliver Evans, reported a bill to extend the time of Oliver Evans's patent for steam engines; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported the bill from the Senate "authorizing the President of the United States to cause to be built, equipped, and employed, one or more floating batteries for the defence of the waters of the United States;" and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill "to authorize the President to retain in service certain volunteer corps" were read, and concurred in by the House.

On motion of Mr. DESHA, of Kentucky, the resolution of the Legislature of Kentucky, presented yesterday, relating to the establishment of some manner of deciding State controversies, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

On motion of Mr. HUNGERFORD, of Virginia, the House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole, on the 1st instant, on the report of the Committee of Elections on the petition of John Taliaferro, contesting the election of said John P. Hungerford. The House concurred with the Committee of the Whole in rejecting that report, which was favorable to Mr. Taliaferro, by a vote of 67 to 38.

A motion was then made by Mr. SHEFFEY, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That John P. Hungerford is entitled to a seat in this House.

The SPEAKER decided, that, inasmuch as the House had decided to overrule the resolution submitted by the Committee of Elections, "that John P. Hungerford is not entitled to a seat in this House," it was his opinion it had expressed finally its determination that Mr. Hungerford is entitled to his seat in this House; and that, consequently, the motion of Mr. SHEFFEY was not in order.

THE LOAN BILL.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole on the Loan bill.

Mr. JACKSON spoke as follows: Mr. Chairman, it seems agreed on all sides that this shall be a continuation of the debate on the Army bills—that the discussion shall be conducted upon the scale then assumed; in that vast extent the investigation will be legitimate.

Although it be true that the province of the majority is to act, and of the minority to speak, it is sometimes equally so that the majority should give the reasons for their measures, and above all they should place in a just view the specious and fallacious ones of their opponents. This nation is progressing in intellectual acquirements as rapidly as its unprecedented increase of numbers and the development of its vast internal resources; and it is due to ourselves, to the politician of to-day who was not on the stage yesterday, and to the advancement of truth, to venture occasionally upon a larger view of our affairs than would be strictly admissible, if the argument were to be solely intended for this House, and did not find its way to the nation. These considerations have guided me in the investigation I have made, and which I shall claim the indulgence of the House in communicating upon the present occasion.

The minority urge upon this bill—contemplating a provision of the ways and means for carrying on the war—the same objections relied on by them when the Army bills were before us. These objections may be resolved under three heads—

- 1st. The justice of the war in its origin.
- 2d. The justice of its continuance.
- 3d. The mode of waging it.

First—It is unjust, say they, in its origin, because there was no real cause of war; and the pretences for it might have been avoided if the treaty of 1806 had been accepted.

In discussing this point I shall purposely pass over many, very many, minor injuries inflicted by the lawless violence of Great Britain—which, though constituting cause of war, according to the best established opinions of intelligent jurists, this nation devoted to peace, and anxious to avoid all collisions whatever, has not made the ground of the war, or a condition of its termination.

In 1806, in consequence of the piratical seizure of many merchant vessels engaged in the colonial trade, the Government were called upon by the united mercantile interest of this country to put on the armor and assume the attitude of resistance. These merchants in their memorable memorials, &c., announced the seizure of their vessels by Great Britain as lawless and piratical; they showed incontestably that the trade had been carried on in express conformity with the rules prescribed by the British Admiralty, and the decision of Sir William Scott, the Judge of their highest Court having maritime jurisdiction; in fine, that, by these fraudulent deceptions, they were decoyed upon the ocean to the prosecution of a trade lawful according to the settled principles of national law, and lawful according to the decisions of the British Government; and were awakened from their delusion, which reposed on the honor and faith of that nation, by a fraudulent concealed order, under which their vessels and cargoes were seized simultaneously in the four quarters of the world, and ruin and beggary entailed on thousands.

This detestable outrage remains to this day unatoned for and unredressed.

Prompted by the value of the spoils seized on that occasion, this grievous outrage was but the inconsiderable precursor of others more grievous. Our vessels trading from one port belonging to an enemy of Great Britain to another port of the same, or another enemy—and at that time she was at war with all the maritime nations of Europe—was held to be good prize, and the notice of this new principle was conveyed through the seizure of the vessels thus employed. Orders of blockade were issued in defiance of the rule laid down by themselves. And the rapid succession of injuries treading on the heels of each other did not permit the mind to dwell upon either, before it was excited afresh by more transcendent injuries.

The Americans deriving their right to navigate the ocean from the recognition of their character as an independent people, and the munificence of a beneficent God who made the sea free to all, were required by Great Britain, who had usurped dominion over it, to carry their cargoes to a British port, land them there, and pay a tribute for a license to carry them to their place of destination. And on discovering the national indignation which this measure excited, we were told, in language of superadded indignity, that they had gratuitously commuted the tribute for a prohibition of the trade altogether.

In the subsequent modifications which Great Britain adopted of her piratical orders, we were told that we might trade to the nations with whom she was at war, provided we compelled them to receive the manufactures and products which they had prohibited—a pretension which, however much it might have suited the interests of our merchants to see those nations accede to, we had no right whatever to contend for—a pretension, too, which is at war with the laws of the British themselves, who prohibit almost all descriptions of manufactured articles in time of peace as well as in war, and which the policy of this country in fostering our own manufactories strongly inclines us to imitate. To illustrate the injustice of the claim, let us recur to our laws which prohibit the importation of slaves; and suppose a foreign nation were to demand the privilege of sending slaves hither, would we, could we, listen to it for a moment?

It was admitted by the British, and those in this country who contend for their claims, that these measures would be unjust in the abstract, but were just in retaliation for injuries inflicted on us by France. In vain was it answered, that retaliation to be lawful must fall upon the head of the aggressor, and not on us, who were a third and innocent party; and although there might be some pretext for such retaliation, if we had submitted to injuries which were prejudicial to Great Britain, and thereby exposed ourselves to the imputation of conniving at the conduct of her enemy, we showed that they had resorted to it before a knowledge by us of the injury retaliated for; and that the United States possessed the spirit and determination to maintain their rights against lawless invasion from every quarter, and would do so if the British would permit them, either by doing justice, or cease the practice of doing injustice towards us. We gave them to understand that war itself would be resorted to, and had only been delayed from the consideration that we were unable to contend at the same time with two of the most powerful nations on the globe, but would not shrink from a contest with one of them, if the other would withdraw her hostile edicts. But this argument and these assurances were disregarded; the enemy had taken his attitude; it was war on his part, peace on ours; he had not declared war, but was in the daily habit of committing acts of hostility, while his language breathed peace and good will towards us. Yet, in defiance of all this fairness and pacific remonstrance, we were told here, and the sentiment was echoed back by the British Government, that the conduct of this nation proceeded from partiality to France, and unjust hostility to Great Britain; that to these alone all our embarrassments owed their origin. When the intelligent men of the two countries called for the proofs, they found nothing but idle clamors and bold assertions. The charge in the famous protest of the minority after the declaration of war, and the reiteration of it by the Prince Regent, were substituted for proof; and when a specification was demanded, the arrangement with France, touching a repeal of the decrees of Berlin and Milan, was pointed to as affording it. On this ground, or any other, we were always willing to meet our opponents, and on this, as often as they were met, they had been already vanquished. They urged that the President had taken the promise of the French Government for the fact of repeal, and on it had founded his proclamation; that the French had broken the promise, and fraudulently precipitated us into war. To this we answered: if it were a new case, without precedent to support it, the confidence due to independent nations demanded a reliance on the declaration; that it was no answer to this position that the confidence might be abused, for without it all the advantages of civilization would be lost to the present generation, and we should be thrown back into the dark ages, and revive the deplorable doctrine, that no faith was due to the engagements of other nations; no reliance to be placed except on the sword of our own.

But our recent history afforded an example which Great Britain and her friends, too, must respect; for it was an example in her favor which elicited the most unqualified approbation of the Executive conduct; and gentlemen were so zealous to testify their pleasure at that time that a formal vote of thanks was proposed and supported by them in this honorable body.

In comparing the two cases, the mind is lost in conjecturing wherefore was the conduct of the President condemned for the latter proclamation,

H. OF R.

The Loan Bill.

FEBRUARY, 1814.

when it was so decisively applauded for the first? And a minute analysis of the facts connected with each but serves to increase the dilemma.

The arrangement with Mr. Erskine for the repeal of the British Orders, it will be recollected, promised their abrogation at a future day. I think it was the tenth of June; not having looked into the documents recently, I am not certain that I am correct as to the dates, but this I well recollect, that it was adopted with avidity; in the language of the resolve, with a promptitude and frankness honorable to the President; and on the faith of it, before the day had arrived, the President issued his proclamation, notifying the fact and renewing the trade, then suspended by our non-intercourse act, from and after that day.

The repeal of the French decrees was notified by the French Government to take effect from and after the first of November, and the proclamation of the President in consequence thereof was not issued until after that day. If there was any departure from the course of unequivocal impartiality in the two cases, it was certainly not to the prejudice of the British Government, as in their case the proclamation was in anticipation of the time fixed upon by themselves, and in the French case it was not until after the time had arrived. When Opposition found that they were driven from this untenable ground, they took their stand on another; the French declaration they said was fraudulent on the face of it, and couched in terms that were offensive.

It was answered, that but two topics of just inquiry were presented in considering the subject—first, had the French promised and was it fair to presume a repeal of their decrees in virtue of such promise?—and second, was the promise unequivocal and in terms unexceptionable? 1st. That they did promise a repeal no one will deny, and in point of fact we have express proof that it was conformed to, and not violated; our agents abroad state this, and the exemption of our vessels from capture under those decrees, is confirmatory of the assertion. 2dly. As to the mode of making the promise; it will be recollected that we had prescribed a condition in our law to be performed in the event that either France or England revoked their edicts, and the other refused to do so within three months after such revocation, and the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees was made to depend upon our fulfilment of this condition—namely, a renewal of trade with the party repealing; and unless the outstanding belligerent repealed his decrees, a non-intercourse with him. I cannot discover any just cause for the criticism. It was in the nature of a neutral compact, requiring the fulfilment by each of the condition it had prescribed, as the consideration of its observance by the other; and it was exclusively in our power by observing good faith to render the contract absolute, or by violating our engagements defeat it. We kept our promise, and for the honor of our nation let it be understood, in no instance of our history has it been imputed to the Government that its promise was disregarded. The subsequent decree of the French Government, dated in April, 1811, is a proof that they considered we had performed our engagements. And I understand it, as its terms import it to be, no more than an absolute confirmation of the previous conditional repeal—a declaration that we had performed the condition.

I say nothing as to the charge whether this decree was not antedated; it is certainly fairly liable, from the circumstance of its concealment, to all the animadversions heaped upon its suspicious appearance. I am speaking only of its character and tendency; and I insist that the construction I have given is fair and reasonable. If so, the assertion that the repeal was not until after the proclamation, has not a shadow of reason for its support. Gentlemen, in the fertility of their invention, attempt to derive an argument from the subsequent repeal of the British decrees, against the justice of the war, which they call an act of rashness and precipitancy. And they allege there was every reason for believing the British would repeal their orders when they were notified of the repeal of the French decrees. In vain have we referred to the declarations of Mr. Foster that such repeal would not take place unless France not only rescinded her decrees so far as they violated our rights, but permitted the British manufactures to be admitted into the Continent also. We also showed that their Minister for Foreign Affairs declared the same thing; and that all pretext might be done away we quoted the "declaration" of the Prince Regent to the same import. Affecting to disbelieve the confessions of the British themselves as proof of their intentions, a new species of reasoning was resorted to, which, as all new discoveries are to be secured by patent privileges, I hope the gentleman will obtain the exclusive right of using and vending. They said, you rely on the official declarations of the British Ministers and the Prince Regent to prove they would not repeal their Orders in Council unless the French decrees were unconditionally repealed—but they have nevertheless been repealed without such modification of the French decrees, and this proves the reverse; and, reasoning a posteriori, it stands thus: "we had a right to believe the event would happen because it has taken place," although they all declared prior thereto that it would not.

Mr. Chairman, although the subject of invasions of the right of property has been first considered in the order of my arrangement, I have always believed and still think it of most subordinate importance in the scale of national wrongs endured by the United States; for, in so far as the rights of persons are more invaluable than the rights of property, do violations of personal rights merit the prompt interposition of the Government; whilst spoliations of property admit of dilatory adjustment. Let it not be said that in the only free Government on earth, where alone all power is derived from, and frequently exercised by, the people; and the rights of persons not only constitute the key-stone of the arch of our political edifice, but the corner stone on which the arch itself is erected; and above all, let it not be believed that in such a Government a freeman can be despoiled of his liberty, or a citizen can be torn from his country, without producing more excitement than the capture of a bale of cotton or a barrel of flour. Impressments of our citizens are most certainly a primary cause of this war.

We are met at the threshold of this inquiry with the assertion that impressment was not urged as an argument for the war, and this, if true, would be a non sequitur. The justice of our cause has never been made to depend upon the conclusiveness of our arguments. It would be a strange mockery of justice for a judge to say to a party before him—"Sir, your cause is just; and I would be compelled to decide in your favor, if your advocate had not discovered an incompetency to argue it; on that ground alone I am constrained to decree against you." I ask, sir, if gentlemen are not mistaken in this assertion? Has not the practice of impressment been always urged as an intolerable injury by the Administrations of Washington, Adams, and Jefferson too, as well as the present? General Washington, twenty years ago, declared that it was an outrage not to be endured, and threatened reprisals. And will it be said that the Father of his Country would seriously contend for trifles, and assume a principle as the head of this nation which was to be given up as untenable? Sir, I think too highly of the character and virtues of that great man, whose reputation is the common property of his countrymen, without respect to the political distinctions set up by those who claim exclusive right to it, to subscribe for a moment to the unworthiness of the imputation; and permit me here to say, that the first general impression made on my youthful mind, was love and veneration for that great man, which no excitements of party spirit have ever unhinged or eradicated.

And who, I ask, among us will have the hardihood to assert that he unjustifiably resisted the practice of impressment? Not the Washington Benevolent Societies, I presume; for their "Aristides" was the organ through which the Presidential instruction was communicated. Sir, I do not allude to the appellation given to the venerable gentleman in derision; I am willing to allow him all the virtues claimed by his admirers, and attribute his errors to human frailty. Another distinguished favorite of Opposition, (I mean the Chief Justice,) while Secretary of State, wrote with energy and ability against this growing outrage. The honorable Mr. King, too, when Minister at London, reiterated the same complaints; and Mr. Jefferson made it a sine qua non of negotiation. Now, I ask, with these facts staring gentlemen in the face, can they pretend that impressment was not considered an inadmissible pretension? Evading an answer where none can be given, they tell us that Washington, Adams, and Jefferson, did not go to war for it. It is true, they did not, and still the admission proves nothing. The first found his country exhausted, and by slow degrees recovering from the shock of a revolution; the Government of it, which the sense of common danger and the united patriotism of the times alone rendered capable of sustaining any pressure, suddenly changed for a new system, against which the talents of some of the firmest patriots and strongest champions of liberty in the nation had been arrayed. The predictions of these men floated as beacons to guard against the dangers they had imagined; and in reducing order out of chaos, they were neither to be despised nor disregarded. It was his policy, and a wise one, to give the nation time to breathe and to grow strong; and in the mean time to enter a protest against this abuse, rather than go to war then to redress it. Let it be remembered, too, sir, that the injury then was small compared with its subsequent extent. It grew with our growth, and strengthened with our strength. Under the last Administration, it was of most alarming magnitude; under those of General Washington, and Mr. Adams, though each injury was an act of war, it might be compared to the murder of Pierce and the attack on the Chesapeake, admitting in the first instance of explanation without disgrace, and ultimate reparation. But if an hundred vessels had simultaneously murdered as many citizens, and attacked and destroyed all our vessels of war, no one could have forbore to identify the Government with its officers, and to hold it responsible for the outrage. Forbearance, under such circumstances, would have been pusillanimous and dishonorable; we must have repelled the hostile blow by hostile acts on our part, or surrendered the rank we have assumed as an independent nation. So, too, the first impressments of our citizens being disavowed, and reparation promised, the Government wisely preferred to rely on the justice of the British rather than on their own means for obtaining redress and future indemnity. Experience fatally proved the fallacy of this security; the cries of one American were drowned by those of his brother, who clung to his country and to liberty until the violence of the enemy had torn him from both, and riveted on him the fetters which had been forged for our citizens. Thousands of them in this manner were seized and carried off and still endure the slavery and degradation to which they have been doomed, unless in cases where a kind Providence has been pleased to close their eyes in death. And yet, that justice might be done to the long forbearance and pacific policy of this Government, year after year it sought redress in vain, and the answers of the British were a practical commentary on the insolent answers of their commanders, that "his Majesty's navy must have sailors." The nation was driven to the wall, where individual resistance becomes lawful in the sight of Heaven and all human laws, even though death ensue; there the constituted authorities took their stand, and the war was declared for "free trade and sailors' rights." Not, however, contented with a discussion of the avowed causes of the war, which is artfully evaded by the Opposition, they venture to presume others never contended for by the Administration, and level their artillery against those pretended causes. They say we claimed that free ships should make free goods, and that there should be no belligerent right of search. Sir, I deny the assertion in toto; and I believe if we could procure, by the common consent of nations, the adoption of a provision that there should be no search whatsoever, our interest would forbid it. I will acknowledge, sir, that on this point my private opinions have undergone a change. I do not recollect that I ever avowed them. I had believed that if the flag covered the vessel and cargo against all search, it would contribute much to the freedom of the seas, if, as a necessary condition of this privilege, no vessel were allowed to abuse the flag; to carry any other than its own; or to violate the law of nations—in relation to contraband of war, and carrying enemies in the military service of an enemy. Without these securities the privilege would not be desirable; and when I look to the experience of other nations as well as our own, I look for them in vain. Unfortunately for the honest merchant, and we have many, there are others of a different stamp, whom no laws will restrain, by whom no principles will be respected—even now they are in secret correspondence with our enemy, and subverting his schemes of murder and conflagration, by furnishing the instruments of death, and the means of subsistence. To illustrate my views, I will suppose a case. We are at war with a foreign nation who effects a landing in Louisiana; our navy nevertheless gives us the command of the American seas—and I am indulging in no improbable hypothesis, for we are destined to become a great naval Power—the invader cannot subsist his army without fresh troops, other implements of war, provisions, &c., and these he knows will fall a prey to our naval superiority; a corrupt neutral, stimulated by gain, ministers to his necessities, carries men, arms, and ammunition, to relieve him. Our gallant tars believe this fraudulent trade is practised; but they dare not search the vessels employed in it, because of their abused immunities. Should we restrain them, and stay their hand from tearing the flag from the mast of the enemy in disguise, and making him pay the forfeit?

It is said, too, that we are fighting for the establishment of a new law of blockades, that "there should be an investment by land and water;" this is equally incorrect. We stand in regard to them upon the British doctrine; we demanded the observance of their own rules; which they disregarded by substituting proclamations and orders for men and ships; it was their paper blockades, against which this Government contended. We are accused of insisting on a violation of the public law of Europe, in protecting naturalized men. And whilst the genius of free Governments, and of our Constitution, as well as the uniform practice of all the nations of Europe, and of Great Britain in particular, are overlooked, gentlemen gravely advocate her abstract rights and municipal regulations. If a plain man were asked what is the public law of Europe? I apprehend he would answer, the universal practice of all the States of Europe, exercised by each, assented to by all, disputed by none. Yet, if tested by this construction, the advocates of the British pretension in regard to us, have nothing whereon to predicate an argument. The question of impressment, however, has nothing to do with the others, although gentlemen attempt to hide it in a mass of imposture, and in the jargon of the law of despotism. The single point is, will you protect your natural-born citizens in the enjoyment of their personal liberty at sea, as well as on the land? Let the career of our sailors be the answer, those gallant spirits who have borne our thunders on the mountain wave, and taught the enemy that he is not invincible; who carry from the mast-head the motto of "Don't give up the ship," as an earnest, that, so far as the badge of sovereignty is confided to their keeping, the national honor has nothing to apprehend, if the Government respond to the sentiment—as I would have the Legislature speak to the Executive in relation to the execution of his functions, Don't give up the crew. I ask, Mr. Chairman, will you tear such a man from his ship; from his family; from the wife of his bosom, and the children of their love; from his aged parent who assisted to rear the fabric of liberty, and rejoices now in the evening of his days that his eyes will be closed by a brave son worthy of his father? No, sir; rather tell Liberty to tear the Constitution to pieces; to depart from this Hall, and scatter it to the winds; to pull down the dome of this magnificent temple; to raze the monuments of freedom to their foundation; to leave us forever, for we have insulted her, and all our pledges and pretensions were a disgraceful mockery of her principles.

It is said we have gone to war to protect British subjects; that we naturalize and employ their sailors. In the very nature of things, few if any can be naturalized; and it is a pretence merely. The seaman who conforms to our naturalization laws, which require five years residence in a State or district, and testimonials of good character, rarely, if ever, returns to the sea, so long abandoned by him; and, in fact, as I have been informed by an honorable gentleman in the minority who is conversant with such subjects, (Mr. Jackson, of Rhode Island,) but few naturalized seamen are to be found. Sir, we don't want naturalized seamen, as our law which forbids their employment evinces. I have said, on a former occasion, and the remark has been recently quoted with an air of triumph, that the men who come hither from Europe in search of an asylum, securing to them civil and religious liberty, go to the interior, they follow the plough or some mechanic art, they are valuable men and good citizens; but there are others who infest the seaport towns and wear our privileges to hide their foreign connexions, who are a pest to society and a curse to the country; and I would rejoice to see a provision in our laws preventing them from engaging in commerce or navigation. I would say to them, in explicit terms, Whilst you live among us and obey our laws, we will protect you; but the moment you go to sea beyond our territorial limits, you cease to be a citizen; you have no right there.

and our duty to protect you then ceases. But the rights and duties change in relation to persons in our territory, on the soil of our country. We have, by the Constitution, a power to naturalize foreigners, and I did not expect it would be contended that man has not a natural right to dwell where he pleases, to choose his form of Government and political society. This power of naturalization has received the sanction of all parties; it was first exercised by the Washington Administration; and even the old Congress of the Revolution, in their addresses, particularly to the inhabitants of Ireland, in the most eloquent language, invited them to come and live with us as members of our political family. Although no direct invitation is now given by this Government, yet when a foreigner comes under the faith of our Constitution and laws, conforms to their provisions, and becomes a citizen, a contract is entered into of the most solemn character and binding validity on his part, that he will serve the country faithfully as a citizen, and, on the part of the country, that it will protect him in the enjoyment of his rights; he owes obedience to our laws, is bound to give his money in taxes, and his personal services in battle, and if taken prisoner it would be disgraceful to us as a nation to permit the enemy with impunity to hang him up as a traitor. As a militiaman, suppose he is called to Hampton, that memorable scene of British honor and humanity, and while contending in your ranks to repel the ruthless invader he is captured, would you consent to his immolation? I have said that man has a natural right to choose his country and his political society, and even this proposition, so reasonable and just, is controverted, and a new principle of social duty is assumed here. "The sovereign (it is said) is absolute over 'the subject; he becomes a tenant of the soil on 'which he is ushered into life, and cannot be 'transplanted; he owes a perpetual allegiance to 'it, and is punishable for acts inconsistent with 'that allegiance." This definition of the sovereign power suits only the regions of despotism, where man is a slave; the whole of it reduces him to the condition of a Russian serf, who is sold with the estate of the lord to whom both belong.

Much as I detest the Godwinian principle, that the son owes no duty to his parents, (if, as the gentleman contends, such be his doctrine,) that which assumes that the duty of man to the land of his birth is as strong, is equally abhorrent. What! man belong to the soil? Man, whom God created in his own image and likeness, and to whom he gave dominion over the earth and sea, and all that in them is! Shall he be bound in gratitude to the land where he is accidentally born—from which his parents and all his race are either driven, or were destroyed there in his infancy by the tyrant hand of oppression, and from whose persecutions he flies to a clime where civil and religious liberty are consecrated by the laws, and enjoyed alike by the great man in his palace and the peasant in his cottage? We are asked, with seeming triumph, if France invades us, will we admit a citizen to go off, join the standard, and add to the force of the enemy? I answer, no. In time of war between two nations the migrations of the citizens of one to the other nation is unlawful; in time of peace it is far different. In war, the motive is clearly hostile and treasonable to his country; but in peace, the just presumption of reason and humanity being in favor of its continuance, no such idea is inferrible from the act, which is not only not unlawful, but permitted. The case put is in no wise analogous. Pursuing the argument, which, in effect, justifies or palliates the British practice, the gentleman (Mr. SHEFFEY) tells us impressment is only the abuse of the usage (I really apprehended he would say the right) of Great Britain, long established. Sir, I deny that the practice is of ancient date, and I deny, too, that it has been exercised against any nation, even the most unimportant, except the United States. Prior to the Revolution, this country being colonies of Great Britain, and our merchant vessels subject to the regulations of the parent State, any practice then need not be mentioned, because not applicable. During the Revolutionary war, impressments, in the nature of things, could not be practised, as nothing but superior force placed our seamen in the power of the enemy, and then they were held as prisoners of war only. Since the treaty of peace, this ancient usage, as it is called, was first commenced against the free citizens of this country. It was promptly met and resisted by manly remonstrance, indicating that, unless redressed, resistance of a different character would be resorted to.

Impressment, it is said, could have been arranged, in the opinion of high authority; and Mr. King has often been alluded to as being of that opinion. It is true that the English Minister agreed with him to desist from impressment altogether, except in the narrow seas; but there is no doubt that the exception insisted on was to prevent any arrangement, as was in effect avowed since. Mr. King refused to make the exception, and he declared that he would rather lose all than agree to it. Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney are also alluded to, as proving that the accommodation could have been effected. It will be recollected that after the death of Mr. Fox, who was the head and soul of his Ministry, and whilst the remnant that remained were descending from power, a treaty was formed with Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, in which they would not consent to insert any provision in relation to impressment, but agreed to an informal note, which it was supposed contained something valuable. Mr. Canning, soon after, was at the head of the Foreign Department, and on receiving a communication notifying him of the promise contained in this note, he addressed a letter to the ex-Ministers, Lords Holland and Auckland, who had written it, to know if they had promised any suspension or discontinuance of the practice of impressment. They referred him, at first, to the note itself, and, on his pressing them further, they declared that they "only intended to promise the utmost caution in the exercise of the right, but no suspension or discontinuance of the practice of impressment." (I quote the correspondence from memory, but I know that I quote it substantially.) Mr. Canning then wrote to our Ministers that no engagements were entered into by Great Britain except such as appeared on the face of the treaty. Sir, Great Britain never claimed the right to impress our natural born seamen. They always professed to exercise the utmost caution, and this was no more. An avowed disregard of it would have been war at once. Yet what had we to expect for the future by recurring to the past? Thousands of our seamen had been impressed; the cries of "I am an American citizen," were disregarded, and, as if to manifest a contempt of all appearances, Danes, Swedes, Germans, and negroes, were taken from our vessels under the plea that they were British subjects.

The gentleman from Virginia is for drawing a strange line of distinction. He will risk nothing for persons coming here for the last fifteen years. He will permit them to emigrate, but will not naturalize them. What! make the alien a nullity; like a monk, professed in good old common law, civilitur mortuus? It would be a dangerous situation to society to have persons in it owing a temporary allegiance here, and a paramount permanent allegiance elsewhere. If they have no rights they can be subject to no duties; neither entitled to hold property, nor prosecute suits, nor liable to pay taxes. Their situation must be that of an outlaw, who may be hunted and killed as a wild beast. To my mind, the apology offered for British impressment, that it is a "municipal regulation," is the most exceptionable. What! shall the municipal regulations of Great Britain be exercised on board our vessels? If so, with equal justice may they be exercised on the land also, and thus, we shall see British officers traversing our country, seeking out and seizing their victims, and carrying them off in defiance of our national sovereignty and independence.

We are reminded of the pretences under which other nations justify their wars, and are told that Great Britain goes to war for fooleries, such as the Spanish succession, &c.; and gentlemen advise us to pursue a more laudable course. It is worthy of remark that this Government was censured for refusing to become implicated in this Spanish war, which is now denounced from the same quarter as a foolery. And can it be that the rights of these States are compared to the fooleries of madmen, and debauched, corrupted monarchs? Our Government was formed for the common defence and general welfare; its primary duty is, to preserve the immunities of persons and the rights of property inviolate; and whatever may be said by the malcontents of the present day of the manly efforts to maintain these, posterity will not fail to do us justice.

It will do justice, also, to the opinion advanced by the Opposition, that we should have gone on, clamoring more and more about the Orders in Council, and prosecuted the culprits who kidnapped our sailors, by actions of false imprisonment in the Court of King's Bench, in England; and, instead of protecting our citizens by the national arm, we should have feed the lawyers who practice in their Inns of Court to recover indemnity in damages, to be assessed by a British jury in a British court. Sir, there are some propositions too outrageous to admit of discussion, and, permit me to say, I rank these among that number.

We are told that the rejection of the treaty of 1806 produced the war, and that it should have been ratified. I regret that a want of time prevents me from a re-examination of this question, because it is much pressed by Opposition, and may be fully refuted; perhaps a simple denial would suffice for a mere assertion, for it is not attempted to be shown that the assertion is justified. I deny that the treaty afforded any security against the abuses we have recited; it contained no indemnity for the vast spoiliations of property; and it is a principle of common law and reason, applicable to individual transactions as well as to national controversies, that a claim advanced in a settlement and resisted, for which no provision is made, is considered to be barred by such settlement. So far from healing up existing differences, and preventing future ones, the seeds of controversy were sown deep by the British, and the outrageous pretension was set up to chastise us for French aggressions, unless we resisted them in the manner they required. I refer gentlemen to the official note delivered by the British Commissioners at signing the treaty, in which they state that it is not to be considered as binding on their part, unless the United States, by their conduct and assurances, give security to resist France; and when the Minister was told that we had, by our conduct, given those assurances, he declared he was not satisfied therewith. Thus, sir, we were to bind ourselves by a treaty, which was or was not to be obligatory on the enemy, according to his capricious opinions of the degree and character of resistance we were to make to the encroachments of the French. And no one can be so credulous as to believe that any measure short of war would have been satisfactory. The acts of the British were obviously founded in the belief that we had no intention to maintain and enforce a respect for our rights. Gentlemen even now admit that they considered the intimation of the necessity of war as an idle threat. No doubt they did, sir; their friends here had asserted the same belief, and on this error their impositions were predicated. If after all that had been said and done by our Government, and the contempt with which it was treated, we had succumbed, we should, after having become the scorn and derision of the world, by refusing to fight for our rights and honor, have been compelled at last to fight for our existence as a nation. Among nations, as between individuals, no point should be urged unless sanctioned by right and justice; but, once urged, it should be maintained manfully and bravely. The advice of the good old Polonius to his son should be followed—"Beware of entrance on a quarrel; but, being in, be firm, and then thy enemy will beware of thee."

H. OF R.

We are accused of abandoning the prosperity and happiness of 1809, by going to war. I am at a loss to know in what that happiness and prosperity consisted. Was it in the depredations on our commerce and the capture of our seamen? If so, we were eminently happy, as every day's experience testified; and that species of happiness continued down to the declaration of war. Yet gentlemen say that Great Britain considers our war as an offensive war, and they concur in the opinion.

No doubt Great Britain thinks so; she argued herself into the same belief when she attacked the Spanish frigates, but the world did justice to her motives; their high offence was, that they carried millions of dollars, and Great Britain wanted the money. So, too, in her attack upon the peaceful Dane, when his capital was destroyed and his fleet was captured; when fire and the sword laid waste Copenhagen, and deluged its streets in the blood of its innocent women and children. The plea in both cases was the same—"Bonaparte, my enemy, will get your money and fleet, and thereby increase his means of annoying me, and I will defend myself against this apprehension." Such, in effect, was her language to us, in her just and defensive retaliation. Let us simplify this ground by applying it to individual intercourse. A man travelling on the high road is accosted by a robber, who demands his money, and accompanies the demand by a vindication of his conduct to this effect: "I rob you not with a desire to enrich myself, but I have an unprincipled enemy living on the road, who has need of your cash, and unless I get it he will, and it will add to his means of destroying me; besides, he will, after robbing, murder you, and to guard you against the perils that await you, I will rob you myself, and make you my prisoner, out of pure good will, and in my own defence." Such is the practice, such alone can be the justification, of Great Britain, and I do not wonder that she considers ours as an offensive war.

We are reminded of the pretences by which the partitioners of Poland affected to justify themselves—not that Poland had done them injury, but that the Polish principles were dangerous to the safety of crowned heads, who were alarmed at the example of a people capable of self-government. The gentleman might have referred, also, to the famous confederacies of Pavia and Pilnitz, which were formed on the same plea against France, and in which the British Government performed a conspicuous part. Sir, these examples afford other evidences of the facility with which the British cheat themselves into the belief—kind, honest souls!—that all their wars are defensive. Yet, strange to tell, they are illustrations of the opinion entertained here by the Opposition, of the soundness and justice of the American claims. I ask, emphatically, is it possible that any man can believe that our war is of a similar character, and waged on such flagitious pretensions? Gentlemen say yes; you have a lawless hostility against Great Britain, and your measures proceed from that source. I refer to two memo-able examples of the pacific temper of this nation, where the conduct of the British was universally condemned, viz: the murder of Pierce, and the attack on the Chesapeake. When the murdered Pierce arrived at New York, all parties vied who should manifest the strongest resentment. The Federalists, with Mr. King at their head, paraded the streets with the dead body, and one cry of vengeance animated the nation. So, too, when the Chesapeake was taken, all parties cried aloud for war; and, had the Congress been convened, and a declaration of war recommended, I do verily believe it would have passed almost unanimously. But the Executive then, as had been done by Congress on a former occasion, clinging to peace as the sheet-anchor of safety, resolved not to identify the Government with the act of its officer, but to admit of pacific explanation and atonement. Gentlemen mistake the fact; it is Britain that is hostile, and not this nation. Look at her conduct towards the Indians before the war was declared, and even whilst her Minister was denying the justice of opinions drawn from that conduct; these people, to whom we sent the missionaries of the Gospel and the implements of husbandry, were enticed to take up arms against us, by the holy "bulwark of religion;" they were made hostile by promises and by presents; by spirits to inflame their passions, and by arms to destroy us; and these facts, coming to the Executive from every quarter, were verified by corresponding circumstances. A vast body of armed savages were assembled at Tippecanoe, threatening the frontier, which more than once had been recently smoking in blood and conflagration. There, with the language of peace in their mouths, like their employers, they attacked our force, and, being defeated, they left behind them British arms, British scalping knives and tomahawks, and British ornaments. Their open, avowed, and immediate employment of them as soon as war was declared, is conclusive proof on that head; for how, I ask, could they otherwise have concentrated such a large Indian force in so short a time? Sir, I am humbled to find it necessary, in this House, to discuss the justice of the war, and to answer objections taken by my countrymen against the cause of our common country. I do greatly mistake if I have not shown that the war was just, necessary, and unavoidable at its commencement; which brings me to the second point, viz: The justice of its continuance.

We are told that the war should be discontinued, as the Orders in Council have been repealed. Their repeal was conditional merely, and the terms certainly not the most satisfactory. We were informed that, unless British vessels and British goods were freely admitted into our ports, the repeal would not be respected, and the right of passing the orders was expressly asserted. But, waiving these objections, I insist that impressions either are or are not justifiable. If not, as I have attempted to show, they should be provided against; and the Government has done all it could to terminate the war, by proposals to entertain for discussion this important question

The British were not required to abandon it without a reasonable indemnity; they were not even required to do more than suspend the practice during a suspension of hostilities, or to continue the war, and to negotiate on that point in the mean time. Yet, strange to tell, the British peremptorily rejected all these offers, although they well knew that in time of war they cannot impress; that if hostilities be suspended, they cannot impress during such suspension, as it would be an act of war. Yet they refused to forbear the practice and try the effect of negotiation. What! shall we be bound whilst treating of peace with the enemy, and he be at liberty to make war on us? The idea is too preposterous and extravagant. The plea of Great Britain was, that we harbored her seamen, we encouraged desertion; we were not prevented, by the circumstance of being at war with her, from removing this pretence, and the seamen's bill was passed. Yet, strange to tell, its passage was opposed by the minority.

The Emperor of Russia, the friend and ally of England, offered his mediation to effect a reconciliation. It was promptly accepted, in the liberal spirit in which it had been conceived; and our Ministers were sent on a peace mission. A stronger proof of the just views and sincerity of a nation than was then given by the Executive, never was afforded. The ally of our enemy was confided in by us—an ally at war with the nation to whom it is falsely pretended we are devoted: and a distinguished Federalist was appointed as one of the negotiators. The conduct of Opposition in regard to this mediation deserves particular notice. At first they accused the President of avoiding the mediation as long as he could, because of his aversion to a peace, and until he found the public sentiment running strong against him. After the mediation was accepted, and our Ministers had sailed, there were strong indications of its rejection by Great Britain, and it was finally rejected. Then it pleased Opposition to denounce the Executive for accepting the mediation, and its great leader declared that the mediation was tendered by the Russian Minister without the authority of his Emperor, and this tender was produced by the intrigue of our Government. The course the Opposition took on that occasion was not without example. They had practised it in the famous Erskine arrangement. Then the Opposition affirmed that they knew Great Britain had been always disposed to friendly intercourse, if they could meet a corresponding temper; and they hailed the accommodation as evidence of its commencement. They carried that feeling into this House; here a vote of thanks was proposed to be tendered to the President; he was called the man of the people, the friend of his country, &c. But Erskine's arrangement was rejected by his Government; and then, in the true spirit of liberality and consistency, the same gentlemen condemned the President for imposing on the young, credulous Minister; and a member of this House, who avoted the vote of approbation in the first instance, came forward and censured the President for confiding in the honor of the Minister, and stated that he should have first seen his patent powers under the sign manual of the King. Suppose the President had done so, and the Minister, feeling the indignity, had demanded his passports, and left the country—we should then have heard a general cry of condemnation. Whilst the Opposition were of opinion that the Russian mediation was sanctioned by Great Britain, the acceptance of it by us was wise, pacific, and just; it met their cordial approbation; but when Great Britain rejected it, they too condemned it, as an imposition, which the Executive had practised, knowing it must necessarily fail. I request gentlemen to mark the language of Alexander, in the tender of his good offices—he is satisfied the United States have done all they could do to avoid war. Let them mark, too, his relation to England, engaged in alliance with her, receiving her assistance in a struggle he was making for his throne, his empire, and independence. At this interesting crisis, Alexander bears testimony before all the world of his confidence in the just views of America; let Opposition learn a lesson of forbearance and liberality from his magnanimity;—he, if present feeling and interest would sway him, would have been ready to espouse the cause of England against us. Yet he, rising above such narrow selfishness, manifests his confidence in decided terms—whilst Opposition, having a common interest with a majority in the welfare of the nation, takes the unjust side of England. Great Britain foresaw that a refusal of the Russian mediation would expose her to just censure, unless covered by some plausible pretext, and has attempted to shield herself by the expression of her unwillingness to unite our dispute with the affairs of the Continent. What affairs, I ask? Not French affairs; there was no danger of the phantom “French influence” to be apprehended from the proffered mediation, as Russia was at war with France. I will answer the question for England. It was the desire manifested by the Baltic States, on a former occasion, to maintain the maritime rights of all nations, that Great Britain deprecated; they too like us entertained the notion that when God separated the sea from the land he made it free, like the air we breathe, for all nations. And I hope and trust that Alexander will add to his title of “Deliverer of Europe” the more glorious one of Deliverer of the World; that, having called into action the energies of his great mind, and the vast resources of his Empire; after having rolled back the mighty wave of French power which inundated the neighboring States, and swept away the ancient boundaries of Russia until it penetrated to Moscow, the capital of the Czars; after putting down the tyranny of the land, which threatened the subjugation of the Continent, he will not lay down his arms until he has executed the vast design, worthy of the cause which has produced the development of his powers, of putting down the tyranny of the seas.

This Russian mediation teaches another important fact, which must stamp with eternal infamy the charge of French influence. To Russia, fighting against France, the United States have confided their cause and its object; and have thereby shown that no relation whatsoever subsisted with France, which the enemies of France could regret or disapprove—in fine, that none of any kind existed not known to all the world. Great Britain has proposed to treat directly with us at Gottenburg, and the offer was accepted without delay. Not disposed to resent the rejection of all previous overtures made directly by this Government, and the indirect one which the mediation afforded, but zealously anxious to obtain a speedy and honorable peace, we find a steady perseverance in that object, nay, even a solicitude which the enemy may mistake for timidity, and which some warm spirits in this nation have reprehended, which brings me to a conclusion of the second point, viz: the justice of a continuance of the war; and I hope I have established the justice of its continuance, as well by showing that its object has not been attained, as in recurring to the proofs that the Government have made and are now making every honorable effort to produce its termination. Indeed it is said, that Administration are now bent on peace, and we shall soon have it; that they have struck their flag, and gentlemen are glad of it. And a lame attempt is made to distinguish between the national flag and the flag of Administration—it is admitted that the flag of Administration is to give protection to “free trade and sailors’ rights,” and I think those five words contain a Constitutional definition of all that concerns us with foreign nations beyond our landed limits. This anticipated surrender, which affords so much pleasure to gentlemen, might have been communicated by the King’s messenger; but that would not suffice, the supremacy of the Pope was to be duly acknowledged, a King must hold his stirrup, five Envoys with badges of humiliation must carry our submission to England; for it was thus the keys of Calais were surrendered. What are the proofs of this submission? this surrender of sailors’ rights? Gentlemen say, the Prince Regent refers to his maritime rights, and asserts that the United States have not discovered a disposition to treat on the basis of their recognition—that Lord Castlereagh proposes to negotiate on those terms, and that the acceptance of the offer is submission. We never contested the maritime rights of England, it was her maritime wrongs we complained of. The public law of Europe and the maritime rights of Great Britain are common to all nations; her maritime rights are as well defined as ours; we are all equals; and usurpation and oppression, though successful, constitute no new “right.” Sir, I object to the authority introduced by the gentleman, as well as to the justice of his deductions. Shall America be judged by the Prince Regent? shall its cause or its intentions be decided by his assertions? I hope not, sir, as on his evidence the United States are leagued with France; and on that of his representative, Lieutenant General Prevost, we are the allies of France. I shall not engage in the idle controversy, whether a surrender of our rights be or be not intended—I will not attempt to convince gentlemen of what Administration intend to do, when they will not understand or believe what they have done.

I do not envy those feelings which induce the assertion, that the surrender of our rights affords pleasure and cause of rejoicing. I thank God mine are of a different stamp. I shall rejoice to see not only the rights of commerce and seamen, so far as my countrymen are concerned, exempted from oppression, but the rights of all the world respected and consecrated by the laws and usages of nations.

I will now consider the third point, the manner of carrying on this war; which has also met with marked condemnation. It is said the war, as carried on, is an offensive war; it is not for the maintenance of our rights, but is a war of conquest. It is worthy of remark here, that Opposition asserted the same thing before a blow was struck, at the time of declaring war. Although the charge has been exposed with much ability by my honorable friends, I will venture to offer a few remarks in addition to theirs; and, before I do so, permit me to express my opinion in relation to Canada, for it is due to this investigation that I should be rightly understood on that point. Canada as a territory is not worth one cent to us—I would not have it; and as affording the means of stirring up the savages alone can it be important? If Great Britain remains pacific and just towards us, and does not excite the Indians, they may keep Canada with my approbation forever; it is intrinsically of no value to us. I speak more particularly as a Western man. We have already territory enough for many years to come, and, by refusing to enlarge it by acquisitions on the Northern frontier, we secure to the West a continuation of the vast emigration from the Northern and Eastern sections of this Union, which not only contributes to increase the ratio of our numbers and enhance the value of our lands, but by degrees will effect a more important object. The emigrants will communicate to their friends who are left behind, that the jealousies which wicked and designing men are industriously exciting are unfounded and unjust; and they will by and by learn to judge of us correctly, and we shall thereby acquire the greatly desirable object, a national character, which is only to be attained by extinguishing sectional jealousies. Conquest, Mr. Chairman, is not our character; the Louisiana case is a memorable instance of it. When the right of deposit at Orleans, which was sanctioned by treaty, was prohibited by the unauthorized act of the Spanish Intendant, leading members of Opposition were then for buckling on the armor of war; they proposed raising an army of fifty thousand men to take the country, which they said we must have at any sacrifice; for, that the island of New Orleans alone would justify the expenditure. The Government concurred in opinion of its importance, but rejected the course advised for its acquisition; it would not wage war—“first strike and then hear” the explanation which Spain had to offer. The Spanish Government disavowed the act of its agent, and the country was acquired by cession for $15,000,000, about one-third of the price of one campaign.

Yet, when thus acquired, the same gentlemen condemned the acquisition and declared the bargain was a bad one. I repeat the assertion; a desire of conquest does not constitute a trait in our character, as this celebrated instance proves. But, say gentlemen, your operations are offensive in their nature, and this changes the character of the war. My friend from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) gave the proper answer to this assertion—"the character of the war cannot be affected by the mode of conducting it; the causes of its origin alone give it a character, and that never changes unless the war is continued after the causes cease." This was the idea, if not the language of my friend, and surely the reasoning is conclusive. If the war was declared for just cause, how should a wise Government conduct it? I answer, make it fall as heavily on the enemy as possible within the lawful rules of warfare, and as lightly as it can on our own people. In order to do this it must attack him—put him on the defensive, and not wait to repel his attacks. It was said in the British Parliament, by Mr. Canning, that one of their "ablest friends in Congress" had declared that in a few months the British would destroy our towns and ravage the seacoast, and he upbraided the Ministry with the omission to verify this prediction. If the enemy had the power we know he would have executed it, as the defenceless villages on the Chesapeake show. And how has this been prevented? I answer, by invading his territory, compelling him to draw his forces there, and putting him on the defensive. If the character of the war depend upon the mode of carrying it on, if invading the territory of the enemy constitute offensive war, the war is offensive on his part; and thus, by the process of reasoning indulged by gentlemen, it is proved that each nation is carrying on an offensive war against the other at the same time, which involves the grossest absurdity. I suppose the enemy will be justified in his warfare—indeed he has been already—and we shall be told he attacks for his own defence and safety. It was for this purpose he carried his arms into Michigan, to the river Raisin, to Fort Meigs, Sandusky, Hampton, Erie, Black Rock, Buffalo, &c., where his footsteps were marked with butchery and bloodshed, conflagration, and rapine, which would have scandalized a cannibal. There was a paramount motive for invading Canada—there the Indians were hired by their cruel employers—there they were set on to deeds of blood, and there it was, that a price was promised them for the scalps of infant innocence and unprotected helpless women. And while the frontier man rushed to the battle at the call of his country, and opposed in fair and honorable combat the open invader—the red ally of England, who had been fattened and made strong by the bounty before he was so cruelly excited against his protector—the savage who was drawn from the wilds of his forest crept in behind him like a wolf into the sheep-fold, and awakening his family from the midnight sleep by his horrible yells—the conflagration of their dwellings lighted him to their hiding place and with more than savage fury he tore the infant from its mother's bosom and beat out its brains against her head. When the soldier came back to find his family and his home, not a vestige of either remained, all were consumed by the fell destroyer, who had fled with their bleeding scalps to the British Proctors and Eliots, who paid the stipulated bounty.

Sir, I refer gentlemen to the celebrated speech of their friend (Mr. AMES) upon the British treaty. He urged its adoption because it gave up to us our own posts, where the British, as he admitted, influenced the Indians to make war; and I believe the treaty went down in consequence of the eloquence with which he pressed that subject. How, I ask, then, can gentlemen reconcile it to themselves to condemn the Government for exercising all its efforts to prevent this outrageous warfare? The British attempt to apologize for their barbarities by stating that they cannot restrain the Indians. This, if true, is no palliation. The ready reply is, you violate all the rules of civilized warfare by the use of any means you cannot control within them, and are answerable for such use. But the assertion is not true. We have been at last reluctantly constrained to employ the Indians in our just defence, and in no instance have they scalped the dead or murdered the prisoners; they have obeyed the orders of the American officers; and no doubt the British have been equally obeyed by those in their service. Suppose this system of carrying on the war on the defensive plan recommended were adopted; it would lead to consequences the most absurd, and humiliating, and destructive. The enemy invades your territory, and then, and then only, he is liable to your attacks. After striking his blow, your forces are marched against him, and he is driven to the line with his booty and prisoners;—with difficulty he eludes your grasp, until he rushes, exhausted and resistless, into his own territory, and a few hundred yards beyond your boundary he pitches his tents in security; the soldier's arm is paralyzed, his musket is stricken out of his hands, and the enemy riots in security before his eyes, surrounded by the inviolability of a contemptible policy. There he recruits his strength, strikes another blow elsewhere, flees again to the place of security, and is safe. Just like the felons in the iron times of feudal vassalage, who ran to the consecrated places of safety, where the sword of justice could never reach them. Then, indeed, would the Cockburns of England have verified the predictions of their "friend in Congress;" the disposable force of Canada, which was kept in check, might have been transported to attack our seaport towns in succession, and the cruelties and outrages of Hampton would have been tender mercies to what we should have suffered. The plan of the Administration for the conduct of the war is not only condemned in unqualified terms by the minority, but they have had the kindness to give their advice how to manage it for the future. They say, "repeat the embargo, send all your vessels to sea, and we will unite with you there. Take the Lakes and the St. Lawrence in this, and we will support you." I consider that something is gained by this admission. It now seems that it is not immoral to rejoice with us for our naval victories; gentlemen are willing to aid us also in achieving others.

Let us examine this concession with the argument that the war is unjust; that the war is offensive, &c. Surely the war on the ocean will be peculiarly offensive to Great Britain; "the sea is Britain's own domain"—"all under sea is British ground"—"Britannia rules the waves." These are the favorite themes of the fast-anchored isle; and dare we invade her dominion? That will indeed be offensive war! Sir, I consider the point of the justice, &c., of the war as conceded by the minority, if we will consent to fight with them in their own way. I should like to know how the war is to be conducted there. "Free trade and sailors' rights" are to be given up; the flag is to be struck, and, I suppose, we are to fight if molested in the enjoyment of the degradation. Gentlemen say, you are injured on the ocean—seek redress there. Why, then, attack on the Lakes and St. Lawrence? There, too, the war will be offensive; it will fall upon the "innocent, harmless Canadians" and His Majesty's sailors, poor souls, who never did you harm, except you choose to call by that harsh epithet the impressment of your seamen and murders of your women and children. Let us test these professions of Opposition by their practice. We ask money for the navy, and even that is refused—we ask it for the civil list, for paying the interest of the debt themselves assumed, for the defence of our seacoasts, &c., and they will not give one cent. And the plea set up by them is, "we will not give you money to carry on a war which you have not competency to conduct." I am ready to admit that the war has been in some places badly conducted; though I feel convinced the disasters and disappointments are attributable to the officers who have been confided in, and not to say any want of capacity or foresight in the head of the War Department. If candor and justice are more than an empty sound, there can be but one opinion on that subject, namely, that the genius, and talents, and capacity of the Secretary are of the highest order. But what, let me ask, is the amount of the objection? Nothing more than arguing against the cause by the effect, against the object of the operations by the failure of them. The failure of those operations has given rise to much eloquent sarcasm, and to a personality I regret. I regret that the gentleman from New York, who manifests so high a sense of his personal honor, and a determination to maintain his rights, should have thought fit to assail the honor of others. I am sure the gentleman in his cooler moments must condemn his attack on General Smyth, a gentleman whom I have only seen at this place some years since, whom I do not presume to vindicate, whose conduct I too have not approved. I have understood, however, from an honorable source, that Smyth is not a coward; and the act alluded to, if evincing cowardice, implicates other gentlemen who advised the course he adopted, and surely the honorable member will not say they too are cowards.

I will notice another remark of the honorable gentleman. He said that invading Canada, the cornfields, wigwags, and hunting grounds of the Indians, justify the employment of them, to defend their rights and homes. What, sir, were they defended at Detroit, at Fort Meigs, the River Raisin, Buffalo, &c., where the Indian tore the scalp from the bleeding captive, before the tomahawk had terminated his sufferings!

Mr. Chairman, here lies the great misfortune under which our country groans: everything this Government does is condemned in language of the bitterest invective. No considerations of country can stay the wrath of its opponents. On the other hand, every act the enemy commits is justified or palliated. Nothing—not the dying groans of the aged and helpless, nor the cries of violated innocence—can excite their displeasure against the enemy. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SHEFFEY) says this censure is all right; it will do no harm to arraign Administration if its measures are wise and proper. Do gentlemen perceive the tendency of this argument? It is calculated to discredit themselves with the people, when they are even right. Having avowed their principles of action, and so often been driven from the untenable ground they have occupied, they will not be able to make the people listen to them. Great Britain teaches us a valuable lesson on this point. They have unanimously resolved to carry on the war against us, although they all know, and many of their distinguished statesmen have avowed, they are in the wrong. While here, every attempt is made to degrade the Government, to destroy the spirit of the nation, and snatch from the gallant soldier the meed of praise; for in this Hall, during this session, it has been affirmed that "necessity and vice were the only stimulants to enlistment." Why, Pitt and Fox, and Barré, have done the same in England, say the gentlemen. Sir, I reject the English precedents altogether, as not suited to a Government elective as ours is. I deny the application of them, if they were admissible. When these men stood up as the champions of liberty against the tyranny of the Ministry, which our fathers nobly and successfully resisted, they plead the cause of the American colonies against usurpation. The fetters of slavery had been forged for us; the cords with which they had bound us were drawn tighter every day. But, Sampson's hair was then unshorn, and, when he put forth his strength, they fell from his arms like slender threads. They opposed a wicked invasion of our rights; and if the same men were now living, and their principles were not changed, we should perceive a similar opposition to the subsequent invasions. Are the causes similar? Do we attack the unquestionable rights of England? Are we attempting the destruction of her commerce and enslavement of her seamen? No, sir, we are defending the great rights of this new, but wonderful people, whose high destiny cannot—will not—brook the lawless encroachments of any nation. Gentlemen pressing the example of England, say, “the Tories, when in power, were patriots in opposition; that there is no other difference among men than a change of situation produces.” I regard this as a precious confession. It amounts to no less than an admission that they are engaged in a mere scramble for power; and if in power, they would pursue our course. Yes, I believe they would. Sir, the party who have so often manifested an extreme sensibility at the outrages they witnessed, while in power, have given a pledge to the nation that its rights would not be prostrated by submission to British encroachments. “Our arms have failed, (say gentlemen.) What is the cause of it? The fault lies not at the door of Opposition.” Yes, sir, I admit they have failed in some memorable instances; but I insist that the Opposition have been the cause of failure. The people of the United States are a thinking, calculating people. They are accustomed to confide their interests to men of their choice, whose candor and veracity are not questioned by them. They will not go with the Government, unless actuated by the impulses of their opinions. It is not sufficient that the Government have declared war; they, too, require to be convinced of its propriety. With this general temper—and it is certainly one of the characteristics of free Government—look to the means which have been pursued by Opposition ever since war was inevitable. The leaders have excited the people to distrust us; “trifles light as air” were adduced and urged as confirmations strong as proofs of Holy Writ. Their favorite presses diffused the poison far and wide, but the antidote was never administered by them to the people. I will venture to predict that the address of their leaders will prevent many of the people from ever hearing that the charges imputing the Russian mediation to the fraud and trick of the Administration has recoiled upon its authors. As soon as war was declared, these leaders entered their protest against it, in which they said that we had no cause of war, and impeached the motives of the majority who declared war. The clergy of these gentlemen’s party responded to their accusations that there was no cause of war, and that it was an immoral and unjust one. Their Governors denounced us for “fighting against the land of our fathers, and the bulwark of our religion.” They all proclaimed that Great Britain was fighting the battles of the world, and endeavored to enlist our sympathies in her favor. When we said to Great Britain, first do us justice before you demand our sympathy; do not attack America because you are fighting France; the partisans of England replied, you are under French influence. The citizen was dissuaded from entering into your army: it was said, if he spilt the blood of the enemy in this war, he would become a murderer. When money was solicited on loans, a venerable gentleman, now a member of this House, said it would be wicked to lend money; he threatened, also, that the money would not be repaid—that the honor of the Government did not require a repayment. A most demoralizing sentiment, striking at the foundation of free Government: its basis is national faith, and he that destroys that, dissolves the Government.

I ask, sir, how stands the funding system? We all recollect the history of that nefarious speculation. The soldier’s necessities, in the poverty of your Government, had compelled him to sell your scrip at 2s. 6d. in the pound. The speculator came with it into the Congressional Hall, and voted to give himself the full nominal value. The discrimination proposed, which secured to the soldier a part of the funded debt, and the residue to the speculator, was rejected, and he retired to the haunts of poverty and wretchedness to drag out the remainder of a miserable life—rendered miserable by the injustice of his country. Yet, with a knowledge of these facts, no man dared to propose extinguishing the debt thus created, but by an honest payment of it, to the last dollar. This doctrine, which resolves the faith of the nation into the expediency of the measure that authorized the expenditure, was reserved for the pretended disciples of WASHINGTON, and its application to the payment of a debt created by the Government in its struggle to maintain the principles of the Revolution against the attacks of the same enemy who produced it.

Sir, the sinews of war are men and money. The Government appeals to the patriotism and interest of the people for those aids—they stimulate enlistments. The last, particularly, operates upon the money lenders; for, if it were patriotism alone that influenced them, they would not ask any interest, or at most six per cent., which is the general scale of legal interest; all beyond that, in legal acceptance, is usury. And, how can you expect that men who are induced by present interest, and ultimate security for the principal, will lend money, when the leaders of Opposition make them believe that they are sure of getting possession of the reins of Government soon, and will sponge out the debt?

These gentlemen say the people are against you, and that is in part the cause of your failure. When we ask why are they against us?—they say, you prove yourselves enemies to commerce—you carry on an unjust, offensive war—you are unable to manage a war, and we prophesied your failure. Mr. Chairman, no prophets are so true as those who effect their predictions—none are so dangerous as those who endeavor to effect them; rather than be convicted of false prophesy, they would see their country humbled, its rights invaded, its liberties destroyed.

But how are the people against us, we ask? Have we had a new election since the war, and acquired increased majorities? Yes, it is answered, you have—but it was the force of party that sustained you. Unfortunate minority! the energies of party are always against you. You, that have everything to gain by vigilance, are sleeping at your posts, while the great majority who apprehend no danger, alone are vigilant!

H. OF R.

You might as well tell me that the lamb is vigilant and the wolf sleepy.

But we wish to destroy commerce—and by the Constitution it cannot be restricted. This is a new notion. These sticklers for the Constitution, during General Washington's Administration, authorized an embargo; to be continued, to be revoked, and renewed at his will, and to any extent he pleased; yet they deny us the power to pass a law definite in its object and extent.

Great Britain, we are told, destroyed our commerce; it kindled the fire of the Revolution: We resisted then, and we have the spirit and the means to resist now. I shall not reason as to this threatened resistance; it is too outrageous to be opposed by reasoning. Let treason rear its head, it will and must be put down though it have a thousand heads; and the very land where it is excited to overt acts, will furnish the means abundantly; they will give a new application to the favorite sentiment of its leaders, and they will prostrate the monster, "peaceably if they can, forcibly if they must."

Sir, the threat is idle; those who use it neither wish or intend its execution; the commercial interests, which it is said were the strong advocates for the Constitution, will not favor it for the same reasons that then influenced them. What is the course of trade and commerce in this country? The ship owners and navigators live in the North and East—I speak as to the great mass of them—the bulky products, the principal exports of the country, are from the South and West, and these products are carried to market by the owners of the shipping. Suppose, in a state of separation, we gave England a monopoly of our trade, the transportation of our produce to a market, and the exclusive supply of foreign merchandise. I need not give you a picture of the distress and ruin it would produce to them, whilst I hazard little in saying it would not injure us. They know this as well, or better than we do; and if patriotism cannot bind them to the Union, interest will. Is it pretended that our efforts in favor of free trade proceed from hostility to commerce; and that the destruction of it by Great Britain before the Revolution was no more than we practise? Cannot gentlemen perceive the distinction between regulating commerce by a foreign nation, and by their own Representatives? If they cannot they are fit tools for despotism and unworthy of participating in the blessings of a free Government. A new species of complaint seems about to be set up—not that commerce is regulated by the Congress; but that men presume to do it "who never saw a ship through the medium of the eye." What, are we to be told we are unfit to resist the usurpations of England unless we saw the vessels and cargoes of our merchants captured and confiscated? Cannot we imagine the tyranny of impressment unless we see the prisoner in his dungeon? Will gentlemen take no part with their country against the cruelties of savage warfare, unless they see the scalplings and butcheries of our women and children? I should be ashamed of the argument, if one of our flat boats carrying a cargo of flour to New Orleans had been seized by the Spaniards when they owned Louisiana, and the crew sent to the mines—if one of my Western brethren had gravely told this House:—Gentlemen you cannot understand this outrage; it is idle and wicked for you to think it an indignity to the nation; therefore, it is improper for you to interfere in it, for you never saw a flat boat through the medium of the eye.

We are told, sir, that Massachusetts alone could have taken Canada, and this is a proof that the people are against us. It is proof of an alarming character when the energies of Government are so far paralyzed that the Union cannot effect what one of the States could if it were not for the Opposition. This say the gentlemen, is all right, Virginia did the same, she invited the people to meet and resist the Government of the Union. Virginia has been often misrepresented on this subject; it is to be regretted, that the facts were not better understood and respected in relation to her course. When the Constitution had been infracted by the passage of the alien and sedition acts, Virginia addressed the States as parties to the compact, inviting their serious attention and Constitutional co-operation; not to violate the Constitution, but to give efficacy to the Constitution; not to resist these laws by force and violence, but to effect a Constitutional repeal of them, either by changing the representation in Congress, or by a manly remonstrance calculated to convince the Congress of the correctness of their opinions and produce the consequent adoption of those opinions. And what was the conduct of the States except Kentucky? What was the language of the party, then, who now profess a regard for the example of Virginia? They denied the lawfulness of the course taken by Virginia, and denied it too not upon a question of expediency, which alone is involved by the act declaring war, as the power is not denied, but a question embracing a construction of the Constitution. Gentlemen advise us to desist from our efforts on the land, as Great Britain cares not for Canada. Sir, they are mistaken, as the force there and the allusion to it by the British Government serve to show. Stop, say the gentlemen, your war on the land. Raise an army to defend yourselves alone—quit the soil where you have the power to conquer, and go to sea where the enemy's force is all-powerful; do all this, and we will aid you—after peace in one line, viz: "Peace is restored between the United States and Great Britain," and we will assist you. I answer the gentlemen, we cannot adopt your advice to obtain your assistance in the defence which you offer in behalf of your country. "Non tali auxilio, nec defensoribus istis tempus eget."

Mr. Chairman, we are now about to treat of peace, and the inquiry which each one puts to himself is, shall we have it? I say yes, because I sincerely wish it, and we easily believe what we wish. I say yes, because we seek it in the spirit of peace and justice. I say yes, because the only pretext which Great Britain had for refusing to make peace with us has been done away; and I will also say, if we fail to have peace, the Opposition will be the cause. The hopes of the Opposition for the possession of power, so ardently desired by them, depend on war alone in their opinion; and although I will not despair of my country by admitting that they can realize their hopes, even though the war shall continue for many years, yet Great Britain has been taught to believe this Opposition is a majority of the people; they have been repeatedly advised to discriminate between the people and the Government; and I almost fear they are deluded by these pretences; if so, it will require a seven years drubbing to beat John Bull into his senses. It is said that the army is to be a paper operation, an idle threat, and Great Britain will not succumb to threats; so they were told in the Revolution; all then they said was mere threat, and they must fight us into submission. I differ with gentlemen as to the true policy of a nation at war whose views are sincerely pacific; while it offers the olive branch in one hand, it should grasp the sword in the other—not to threaten, for true courage disdains to utter a threat, but to show to the enemy that it is not impelled by pusillanimity and fear, to ask for the blessings of peace. Such a nation can make a concession if it please without infringing its honor; like a brave man who extracts praise from his adversary by his actions, which if adopted by a coward would cover him with contempt. If we fail in the peace mission, and the dispute must be settled by the sword alone, we shall be prepared for the worst, and, learning wisdom from the past, we shall be formidable indeed for the future; then "let Greek meet Greek," and in the mighty tug of war, the conquered will preserve his honor. Our war measures are dictated by the spirit of peace; we will go on in the career of peace, and if it be denied to justice, it will be yielded to force; we will fight for it, notwithstanding gentlemen refuse their co-operation. The plea of some is, that the Government have no capacity to conduct the war; by others, that they have not and cannot procure the means of conducting it. These arguments are at variance with each other. When they wish to prove the incapacity of Administration, they say the means within their control have been adequate, and misapplied. When they arraign them for extravagance, they tell you the force was inconsiderable. I have made inquiries concerning the number of men in the military service for the first year, with a view to correct the statement of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SHEFFEY) as to the enormous cost of the Army per man—and I find that we had

In February, 1813, 18,000 regulars	} average.
In December, 32,000 do.		25,000
12 months men, an average of		6,000
Militia in that year, average		30,000

Total men, - - - 61,000

Making the expenditure about $300 each man, instead of $1000, as by the computation of the gentleman.

We are informed however by him that ten millions of dollars are due for Army expenses, and the gentleman pledges himself there are at least five millions due, because, as he says, the claims were deferred at the War Office from month to month, in consequence of a rule that limited the expenditure in each month to one million and an half; and hence, in the scramble for the money, many claims were postponed for no other cause than a want of funds, and are yet unpaid. Therefore, the gentleman says he has a right to insist that the expenditure of this year will double the appropriation. Sir, I deny the statement of the gentleman in toto; and I feel authorized to assert that no legal claim, properly authenticated, has been presented without being paid; besides this, advances have been made for the recruiting service, and for the Quartermaster's department. The gentleman seemed to think it due to himself to specify some case, and he refers to the claim of Virginia, which he says is an equitable claim upon the Government. I concur in the opinion as to the character of the claim of our State. It is equitable beyond doubt, and the admission of the gentleman that it is not a legal one is fatal to his argument, because Congress must provide for it before the War Department can apply the law. Gentlemen are not content with refusing to us the means of attempting to get money; they deny our capacity even if the means are afforded. They say the public land and improved lands of the country afford no basis for the capacity of borrowing. The capacity to borrow depends first upon the wealth of the nation, and secondly upon the ability of the money-holders. The first affords a security to the lender for the ultimate payment of his money; and the second, the means of borrowing. The second depends too essentially upon the first for its existence, for the wealth of individuals increases the wealth of the nation. The public land, therefore, may be fairly resorted to as affording this security, if it were not ample besides. And the improved land of the country is the substantial representative of the floating capital, as well as the solid wealth of the community.

The gentleman says we have resorted to oppressive measures to create a capacity to lend; we have compelled the merchants to abandon commerce that we may have the use of their money; that the farmers are told, because they cannot lend, of the value and importance of engaging in manufactories; and the merchants, because they can lend, that manufactories will be a losing business for them. Sir, the argument of my honorable friend (Mr. EPPES) has not been fairly treated. He said nothing like this. Speaking of the ability of the community to lend, he remarked, that the merchants would invest their inactive capital in the funds, in order that when commerce was freed from the impositions of decrees and Orders in Council, the merchants would be enabled to withdraw the capital thus invested, and employ it in its accustomed channel; that they could not, with equal facility, change its destination from objects of manufacturing employment, for the reasons he then gave, and they were certainly conclusive. My friend said nothing of the profits, but the investiture merely. As to the character of our measures, if it be oppression to prevent a treasonable intercourse with the enemy, or improvident shipments of property, which he will necessarily obtain, and which will materially strengthen him to annoy us, I admit the justice of the charge. I shall say nothing of the motive ascribed by the gentleman. He says Great Britain will get your stock to the amount of one hundred or one hundred and fifty millions, and this should be avoided. If the prediction were to be verified, I answer agreed. I have no objection; it will be a lien on their friendship, and will induce the wealthy men of the nation to desire a state of peace, and therefore to have justice done to us. The gentleman denies that such lending by British subjects will add to our capital. The argument he uses is a strange one—the position he assumed is not less so. The capital of the nation is cash, if you please; and we want an hundred millions, which the British lend us, and receive our paper. Is not the capital increased one hundred millions? No, says the gentleman, no money will be sent. How then, I ask, can they buy our stock, unless the balance of trade be against us to that amount? If the balance of trade be against us we must pay that balance in specie, and it will be immaterial whether we send the dollars or the stock; so that it will add eventually to the amount of our capital by retaining the money if about to go abroad, or by getting money if no remittances shall become necessary. It will draw out, says the gentleman, six or nine millions annually; this is admitted; but whenever an individual finds it necessary for the purposes of improving his estate to borrow money, he will add greatly to its value, although he must pay interest on the money he receives.

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen take great umbrage at the charge of "factious opposition" to Government; even when found opposing the wisest measures, which depend for their support on public opinion, and are maintained upon ground susceptible of demonstration; and they tell us the majority are a faction. Sir, the true definition of faction is not the spirit of the head but its members—a real majority cannot be a faction; there may be, by possibility, an accidental preponderance of a minority for a season, and if so, it is properly speaking a faction; but if we look to the examples of the wisest nations of antiquity, we find no instances of an actual majority combining or effecting the destruction of the country, which was always the tendency and result of faction. Greece, for example, under its head was irresistible. But the factions began to operate on the members of the Confederacy; jealousies, intestine commotions, grew out of their intrigues, and the States were stimulated by Philip to civil war; and what the power of Xerxes could not effect by his armies when Greece was united, was produced by a factious spirit in the States, beneath which the grandeur and glory of the Republic fell. The example of Greece is fully in our view, and the same cause, the spirit of faction in the members, if it triumph over the patriotism of the people, will assuredly precipitate us into similar destruction. For the safety of my country and the last hopes of liberty on earth, I pray that this great national calamity may be forever averted.

Mr. JACKSON was followed by Mr. SHIPHERD, of New York, who occupied the floor till the usual hour of adjournment, without concluding his speech in reply.

FRIDAY, February 18.

On motion of Mr. JENNINGS, the Committee of Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act entitled "An act for the relief of the officers and soldiers who served in the late campaign on the Wabash," as to make provision, by law, for compensating those individuals whose horses died or were rendered useless in consequence of wounds, received in the battle on the Wabash, or whose property was destroyed in conformity to the orders of the Commander-in-Chief.

Mr. RICHARDSON, of Massachusetts, laid upon the table the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be directed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the appointment of Admirals in the Navy of the United States.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections on Mr. KELLY's petition, contesting the election of T. K. HARRIS, a member from Tennessee; which, after some discussion, was on motion of Mr. KENNEDY, of North Carolina, again ordered to lie on the table.

THE LOAN BILL.

The House again went into a Committee of the Whole, on the Loan bill.

Mr. SHIPHERD, of New York, concluded his speech against the Administration and its measures; the whole of which follows:

Mr. Chairman: If my honorable friend from Maryland, (Mr. HANSON,) as he observed, felt the task too great to follow the gentlemen, who had so fully and so ably discussed the subject before the Committee, I trust and hope that a recollection of what has transpired since, as well as before he made the remark, will be a sufficient apology in the mind of the Committee, if the argument should droop in my possession. If, sir, a genius that irradiates and embellishes whatever it touches, approached the great and momentous question with awe, surely you will readily pronounce a lenient judgment upon the exertions of the humble intellect, that engages in this contest with fearful emotions; that from no passion to declaim, no vanity of public show enters the list, but from a deep sense, a solemn conviction, that the bill on your table is a measure replete with ruinous tendencies to the best interests of this once happy nation. Yes, sir, a sense of duty has constrained me to take the floor, and, in the language of expostulation, to raise my warning voice against a measure calculated to produce evils the most dreadful. Urged by considerations so serious and imperative, I cannot be silent; and although I may give offence, which is not intended, perplex and delay, which is not my object, I shall invite, indeed claim, your attention while the opportunity is permitted, of contending for my country's interest, and pleading her cause.

With these feelings, I must be excused if I proceed, notwithstanding the danger of giving offence to the advocates of this bill. And, sir, before your attention is called to the question immediately under consideration, I shall ask permission to notice a few remarks, made on the Army bill, by a gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. MURFREE,) whom I very much respect for his talents and integrity, and who in debate observed, if my doctrine was correct, and the nations of the earth should all adopt it, there would be no more wars; and because there would not be, inferred that I must be incorrect; and the strong emphasis used by that gentleman evinced the triumph he felt in a supposed victory over his antagonist, who had advanced opinions against usages on which depended the salvation of this country. Sir, the consequences drawn from my premises are admitted to be correct. There would be no more wars, if all nations adopted what has been stated by me as the only true doctrine.

And what then? Then, sir, there would be peace! Dreadful dilemma! What an unpardonable heretic the man must be, that shall venture to maintain an argument in favor of principles, which are not only consistent with the precepts of the Christian religion, but, if adopted, would put an end to human butchery, and destroy the military profession altogether! I was not insensible of the risk which was run, in making the remarks that provoked the argument mentioned. It was expected that my observations would draw upon me the sneer and scoff of the sceptic, and perhaps the censure of men who maintain that wars are salutary, and tend to improve the condition of man, but it was not expected the honorable gentleman would have produced such an argument as he did.

Sir, I do most religiously believe the time is not far distant, when the clarion of war will give place to the voice of peace, and the arms of the warrior will form the ploughshare and pruning-hook of the husbandman; when the nations of the earth shall become brethren, and be linked in the chain of affection. Is there a gentleman in this House that could regret the approach of the happy time? Is there a benevolent heart in God's universe but would throb with joy, if the dawn of that propitious day was beginning to bless our world? Thus much for the argument of the honorable gentleman; and now, Mr. Chairman, you shall have my reasons against the bill on your table.

My opposition to that bill does not consist wholly in the idea, that it is avowed to be a war measure; but there are extrinsic objects which present themselves in formidable shapes, and which, I am of opinion, ought to prevent its passage.

First. By crowding the market in such rapid succession with loans—large loans—you cheapen the credit of your Government, and too obviously exhibit your poverty and dependence, and thereby produce a result much to be dreaded. The public stock will depreciate until the credit of the Government is ruined. I am much mistaken, if this mortifying circumstance is not already in being, in some small degree, and which has arisen from the publicity of that bill.

While loans do not exceed the means of Government, stock, even at five and six per cent., is good property, and is subscribed for with avidity; but whenever it shall overleap the resources of the nation so much, that payment even of the interest becomes precarious, it is bad property even at twenty-five per cent.

Sir, no nation ought ever to borrow money beyond that sum, for the interest of which at least it can pledge a fund as security to the holder of the scrip, and out of which it will certainly be paid. By so doing your money is obtained at a low interest. These pledges of public faith are too much like your life-and-sacred-honor pledges; they afford no security to those who may wish or be interested in the performance, and on the whole are poor stuff; but if you ask for no more than can be secured, your stock goes into the hands of substantial capitalists at a fair price, and your credit is kept good. But, sir, go on in this way a little longer, with your laws to borrow, and the good faith of Government the only pledge, and men of capital will keep aloof from your paper; and if it sells at all it will go into the hands of that class of citizens who are ever ready to risk, not their capital, having none, but their personal responsibility, by buying in, below whatever is hoped may rise to par. Can gentlemen feel willing that the public paper shall be bandied about through the hands of unprincipled men, whose touch contaminates, blights, and withers? The bonus to be given for this loan is not limited; it is left to the discretion of your agent. He may sell your stock at a discount, which, of itself, would be proof of bankruptcy. There cannot be but one consequence of such improvidence—the ruin of your credit; and if gentlemen expect to continue the war, and satisfy its exigencies, by tempting the cupidity of Jews or note-shaving speculators, by giving eight, ten, and perhaps fifteen per cent. interest, or if they expect to borrow of those who borrow of the banks to lend them—borrow at low to lend on high interest—they must also expect that their war will be short; and, short as it may be, longer than the resources which are to supply it with means. And if any one expects a favorable result, he must feed his imagination on dreams that will never be realized.

Say what you will, sir, of the soundness of public faith and honesty, let the public be deprived of the means of paying, and how will their creditors be satisfied? They will not take their pay in public faith. Honesty, however valuable with means, is of no importance to the creditor without. Money lenders wish "to touch something solid." Give them a guarantee, and you save the bonus; you save your credit; you save every way.

Should this bill pass, sir, and your stock not be purchased at all, the public credit would suffer extremely—the stock of the other loans will sink, to the ruin of the owners. Well, sir, is there no danger of such an event; or do gentlemen flatter themselves that they can go on forever borrowing money, without a cent to pay it—without any fund from whence it can hereafter be drawn? If they do they must be disappointed; high interest must lose its influence where there is great danger that neither that or the principal will be paid. There is another evil much to be dreaded from these loans, bottomed on public faith. If they are taken up they endanger the banks; this effect has already been produced with those from which the money for the former loans was drawn; distrust excited vigilance, and hence the specie of the Union was suddenly put in motion. Let one bank of extensive business fail, and the whole moneyed world would tremble like an earthquake.

It is said we can pay the interest of our loans, and the principal may lie unpaid for a long time. By what means, sir, is this interest to be paid? Your commerce, from whence you derived a princely revenue, is no more. With your wars, non-intercourses, non-importations, and embargoes, you have dried up the abundant sources of income. It is true, notwithstanding the silly, unnatural, and ruinous experiments which have been made with the commerce of the Union, by the vigor of its Constitution, by the abundant strength it had acquired under Federal nurture, although smitten and wounded, it still was enabled to feed the mouth that traduced, and fill the hand that smote it. The last bold and deadly blow has ended its existence; all hopes of revenue from this once productive source must be abandoned; our last suicidal act has accomplished the great object—not of starving the enemy, but of impoverishing ourselves.

England, say gentlemen, borrows money, and yet their credit is not impaired. Yes, sir, England borrows money without jeopardizing her credit; and, if we would learn wisdom by example, we might do the same. Too proud to copy, we prefer a new policy, although engendered in moon-smitten brains, to the old, which experience has consecrated. England cherishes her commerce, and, in time of war, so far from abandoning, she doubles her patronage, conveys her vessels to the most distant climes, bestows every needed assistance, and, as a remuneration, the Governmental coffers are filled with money. We might have done the same, and we, too, should be amply indemnified. But no, we will only imitate England in her worst examples—examples of folly—and instead of adopting those which would have a beneficial effect, in order to make all of a piece, we must have all wrong.

Will gentlemen venture a system of taxation, commensurate with the constantly accruing claims for interest and instalments of their numerous and large debts? Sir, the people will not submit to the unusual and oppressive burdens which taxation, equal to the object, would impose. They will seek in vain for a cordial compliance with such heavy requisitions, in the patriotism and loyalty of its citizens. Such expectations from a free people, long exempted from burdens, must arise in a mistaken opinion, that the patriotic spirit which animates the body politic is superhuman. I do not mean to doubt either the patriotism or loyalty of my countrymen in a reasonable degree; but I beseech gentlemen not to calculate for too much.

Love of country must and will depend upon the reciprocation of benefits by the rulers of the country. Do well by your citizens, if you intend to obtain a prompt and effectual support. Prove, sir, by your measures, a sincere desire to perpetuate the blessings of liberty, and protect the interest of your country, and you will then find in the affectionate liberality of the people means to answer all the exigencies of Government. You may for a while delude them, and by your slight of hand, your legerdemain, impose upon the understanding of the majority, but the moment your trick is discovered, you must be treated like other impostors, with their execration, if you venture to deceive them.

Let us now, sir, suppose our means to secure the payment of all these loans were ample, and thereby our credit was at par; where can be the policy of loading, not only the present, but unborn generations with debt? If we profess so much patriotism, let us evince it by our practice, act like wise and prudent politicians, sacredly regard the high trusts the people have placed in our hands for themselves and their posterity. Let us beware we do not attach to our memories the curses of those who are to follow us. The baneful effects of these indiscreet acts may be felt for centuries, and honesty and common philanthropy forbid experiments prejudicial to the interests of the future men of the Union. Sir, we are loudly admonished to hesitate and reflect well before we plunge down the precipice. As we value and would cherish the union of the States, cling to the Constitution, and preserve the country from revolution and civil war, it behooves us to avoid loading the nation with debt. The example of Great Britain would be dangerous to follow in this respect; the different nature of her Government renders those examples hazardous to be pursued. The unity of her Government, its consolidated strength, enables her to bear vastly more than this nation will ever consent to stand under; divided into separate States, any four or five of which might form a General Government, only load the people, until they stagger with the weight, and they will throw off their burden and seek their emancipation, by cutting the bands which, though once pleasant, will then be thought intolerable. And, sir, the debt will be more odious when the inducements to create it are remembered. It requires but common sagacity to perceive, that when the factious necessity of loans and taxes shall be discovered, the enthusiasm of the moment shall retire, sober reflection resume the stand, that it will be known with what prodigality the money of the nation has been lavished, and how causelessly it has been involved in debt. The people must sooner or later learn that the surplus fruits of severe labor will be required gradually to diminish that debt. An elevated sense of justice and moral obligation alone will then induce them to drudge on through life, deprived of the comforts, luxuries, and elegancies, to cancel the obligations of folly, and redeem the pledges of profligacy, made in the delirium of resentment, and goaded on by the thirst of revenge, for injuries which existed more in the heat of distempered fancy than in reality; more especially as it will be known on what disadvantageous terms the debt has been contracted. Certainly, sir, if we dispassionately examine this subject, we shall and ought to fear that the people, rather than be doomed, with their descendants, to pay what was at least indiscreetly contracted, will barter their Union for a release in full, and abandon their creditors, obligations, allegiance, and Union, by one bold stroke.

Mr. Chairman, if all that has been said is unsubstantial, yet there is another ground which certainly is tenable; and although the reasons which may be offered shall fail to convince the advocates of the bill of their error, they will at least leave the consoling impression on my mind that they ought to convince; and, therefore, I have discharged my duty in offering them to the Committee.

This money, if borrowed, is to be appropriated to the further prosecution of an unjust, impolitic, and unhallowed war; if, therefore, I had no other objection, I could not vote for the bill consistent with my feelings; and I design to vote for no measure which is avowed an auxiliary to the war.

Mr. Chairman, possessing the feelings and views of this subject that I do, I need not examine the causes of the war. On a former occasion, I attempted to prove that no cause could justify an offensive war; be the cause, therefore, what it may, I will not lend my aid to continue its prosecution. I shall only here remark, that the principal cause alleged ceased directly after the war was declared; when the news arrived, the people flattered themselves with deceptive hopes, that the Administration, being governed by the principles that generally actuate public men, would have put an end to hostilities before much blood was shed. But as one cause is taken away, another, which was esteemed of far less consequence, is made to possess vast importance. The impressment of seamen is now, as has been almost from the beginning, the ostensible cause of hostilities. Here, sir, I wish to be understood as saying, that in every instance where our native seamen have been impressed, I join the minority in pronouncing the deed execrable, and the perpetrators or abettors deserving of severe punishment. And as much as any man, I feel the strongest indignation towards men so lost to a sense of humanity and common justice. I have before said, and now say, if the evil exists, the Government have been remiss in omitting to provide a sufficient maritime force to convoy our vessels, and resist the aggressions. However, let it be remembered that the British Government pretend to no such right; they justify no such conduct in the subjects of the King; and if gentlemen on the other side are accurately understood, the war is continued for no such cause. The bone of contention is the claim on the part of the enemy, to take from merchant neutral vessels, in time of war, their own subjects, whether naturalized in a neutral country or not.

For those seamen are we fighting, and I am happy, on this part of the subject, to have the authority of an honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. JACKSON) to assert, that few indeed must be the number which has cost us much calamity, much suffering. That gentleman frankly admitted that few seamen were naturalized in this country; the nature of the case proves the correctness of the statement of the gentleman. Foreigners must reside in our country five years before they can become citizens, and seamen are not in the habit of residing on shore. We ought to presume that but few are naturalized, and still fewer, of course, are impressed.

This consideration most indubitably proves, that if the error was truth, that we are bound to protect such citizens on the ocean as well as by land, and avenge the invasion of their rights; that but very few of that description of seamen have been impressed. Admitting, however, that the number was much greater, the question then occurs, are we under any obligation to protect them, when their allegiance to us ceases beyond our jurisdictional line? Protection and allegiance go hand in hand, and who will pretend that a sailor on the ocean, or in a foreign port, owes allegiance to our Government? Whoever does, pretends without reason. The right to emigrate is warmly contended over the way. If a subject of a foreign prince has a good right to emigrate from his native country, a fortiori, he has a good right to emigrate from his adopted. If he can come here and be naturalized, and temporarily at least lay aside his native allegiance, no one can with reason deny his right to go back and resume it. If so, what becomes of this more than native allegiance? Sir, the position contended for by our Administration will not bear the touch of reason or argument. I understand the laws of nations to interdict expatriation; and although a subject may emigrate, he nevertheless is under obligation in time of war, if required, to return to the country that gave him birth. This is a right claimed by all civilized nations, and probably not disputed, until it was found to be a convenient subject of controversy with Great Britain.

Sir, I shall leave the further discussion of this question to other gentlemen, or to another subject, and shall only say, it appears very foolish to contend for a principle, which, if we could now compel our enemy to acknowledge, would be planting the seed of perpetual wars between us and the commercial nations of Europe, and would, in other respects, be sadly against our interest as a navigating nation. But the European nations will never be flogged into a belief that we are right; they know their own interests too well to yield to our demands; we must, therefore, either abandon this Executive phantom or doom our country to everlasting hostilities. Nothing can discover a more deranged state of the public mind than to see native American blood flowing, to defeat the legitimate claims of a Sovereign to his subject, and to maintain principles which I should much regret to see settled as a part of national law.

FEBRUARY, 1814.

The Loan Bill.

H. OF R.

If our adopted citizens stay within our territory, it is admitted we are bound to protect them, and, by the act of naturalization, they are entitled to participate in all the blessings of our free Government; but if they will risk themselves on the ocean, where all nations have an equal common right, they must, and ought to expect, to take care for all consequences, whatever they may be. If we are to protect them there, the naturalization law will be a sore thing to us. Rivers of native blood, and millions of wealth must be wasted to protect a few score of men, whose services can be but of little value to our country—men who, for a better price, would abandon us on the first fair occasion. It cannot be denied, that a vast portion of the foreign seamen have obtained protections as native Americans, by the perjury of their companions, and for such men our country and its citizens must be devoted—immolated.

Now, sir, let us inquire who are the men that most loudly complain for the violation of "sailors' rights and free trade." Merchants? No. Those concerned in navigation, the only employers of sailors? No; but men who rarely ever saw a ship or sailor. These men, who have not, nor ever will have any concern with foreign commerce or navigation, not only feel the most aggrieved by the impressments, but, strange to tell, they seem to know much more about the number and circumstances of the impressed, than the very men who own the ships and employ the hands, and we are considered guilty of a barbarous incredulity if we doubt the testimony of those gentlemen, when opposed to the evidence of men who employ the sailors, and who live in the great commercial cities of the Union.

Gentlemen from the interior possess amazing tenderness—they profess to feel a melting sympathy for their sufferings, and burn with indignation to avenge their wrongs, while the North and East, who employ nine-tenths of the sailors of the Union, are so hard they cannot feel for, and so blind they cannot perceive those mighty wrongs and agonies so pathetically described on the other side, of the suffering sailors kidnapped by the unrelenting Britons. There is good reason why they neither feel nor see. The evils complained of exist chiefly in the distempered imagination of party zealots, are seen with jaundiced eyes—hence, men with good sight and cool heads are not beset with these phantoms.

Mr. Chairman, I have pointed out the men who are fighting for "free trade and sailors' rights," and I have shown you the men whom gentlemen charge as being the enemies of both. Who are the former? Men who have no immediate interest in the subject of controversy. Who are the latter? Men who have acquired the support of themselves, their very subsistence, their wealth, by ships and by sailors. The former must have no experimental knowledge—the latter perfectly acquainted with every minutia.

The very sailors, sir, for whose grievances you continue the war, I venture to say, have been, and still are, opposed to your policy. They, like other men, must regard their interests, so far as to value the services from whence they obtain a subsistence. They can have no greater fancy for a system of starvation than other men. It is true, in profession, you are securing to them important rights; but in practice, you are annihilating the occupation for which they are only fitted; you have "taken away that on which they live;" you have robbed them of their bread. Before the war was declared, before any of those abominable restrictions which have maimed, crippled, and annihilated our navigation, were fastened upon it, the sailors whose interests lie so near the hearts of the majority, notwithstanding the dangers of impressment, had not the least inclination to abandon the ocean; the high wages allowed them all the support, all the affluence, the heart of a sailor desires—food, clothes, grog, and tobacco. How is it now, sir? in redressing their wrongs, you have destroyed their rights. They have been, and still are, compelled to pine in want on your shores, live on charity, or seek that employment and subsistence, which their country has denied them, in the vessels of the enemy; yes, sir, thousands of the very men whose supposed injuries have produced such calamities to this nation, have sought employment from the nation whose barbarity, as pretended, fills the sailor's heart with terror and dismay.

You will perceive, sir, the effect of your officious benevolence to the American tars, you must perceive the melancholy fruits of your overweening fondness to intermeddle with a concern you neither understood or regarded. There is no fiction here; the facts are true.

Can you, then, sir, wish any stronger evidence of the impolicy of your measures, than to see the foundation of your resentments pronounced—practically pronounced—fictitious; the merchant struggling, notwithstanding restrictions, to gain the element where the Government pronounced his interests in jeopardy, and preferring the risk to the safety you tender him? The sailor, whose cause it is said we are fighting, seeking protection, employment, and support from his despoiler?

Sir, who can be so blind as to believe your professions sincere? that you have laid your restrictions upon commerce from a friendship to that commerce; that you have declared war from a sincere desire to benefit the sailor, or the employment by which he lives? Experiments are not green; gentlemen must have learned the baneful effects of their policy long before the war was declared, and the opinions of men who best know, and are most interested, in giving correct information.

H. OF R.

The Loan Bill.

It is a truth, sir, no one can contradict, that the party in power have ever been the foes of commerce, navigation, and all their appendages. From Mr. Jefferson down, the benefit of abandoning the ocean has been constantly urged. Long have they contended that our true policy consisted in leaving altogether the carrying even of our own productions to the carriers of Europe, and become terrapins. Indeed the object was entertained with so much fondness by the late President, that in the raptures of prophetic vision, his strong passion burst forth while describing the glorious day "when the planter and manufacturer should be seated side by side." And, sir, this pleasing mania is by no means confined to that great inventor of modern hydrophobia. The last Message of the President to this House at the opening of the session, after recounting the splendid victories and splendid failures of the last campaign, congratulates us upon one glorious advantage gained by the war, that the people have been driven from commerce to manufactures; that our losses and disasters are overbalanced by this acquisition. This, although not a literal quotation from the Message, is its only obvious meaning.

An honorable colleague of mine (Mr. TAYLOR) some time since availed himself of this text, when speaking of the army bill, and delivered us a comment upon it to enforce the truth of the President's statement. I need not multiply proof that the party in power, from the beginning, have been the acknowledged foe of commerce and navigation. What blind infatuation, then, must bewilder the mind that can believe this war was declared to maintain "Sailors' rights and free trade?"

To rebut the proofs of the impolicy of Democratic measures derived from the opinion and practice of merchants, it is said there are no patriots, but, their affection fixed on their money-making business, their hearts and feelings are not warmed with the generous patriotic glow, and therefore their testimony is not to be relied on. Well, sir, if this was really true; if patriotism is a plant of such rare growth that it cannot flourish but near the heat of a tropical sun, or far removed from the blighting sea breeze; if our merchants of the North do not possess this inland, sun-burned patriotism, yet they have some regard to their interests, and from those interests we are to expect a correct statement. If measures are to be adopted for their benefit, nothing can be more fit or natural than that they who best know their interests, and who will declare the truth to promote them, should be consulted, and their advice adopted. Learn their interest, and you learn the interest of the sailor and of navigation. Who, then, sir, but perceives the counting-house to be the most authentic source of information. To that ought the Legislature when about to enact laws on this subject to resort, and from thence obtain the fruits of experience, opinions founded on practice, and lay aside the visionary theories that haunt the brains of political innovators.

Much as gentlemen may boast of their love of the sailors' and merchants' rights; much as they contend for "free trade," the whole have suffered more loss and privation from those laws, enacted professedly to protect their interest, than they would have done for half a century from the British, adopting the periods of the greatest spoliation as the data of calculation.

Mr. Chairman, I shall vote against this bill for another reason. It must be unsafe to intrust in the hands of men who have exercised their powers with the most palpable partiality towards the two great belligerents; whether this has been done with good or ill intentions, need not now be determined. It is sufficient for me if so is the fact. To be sure I have formed an opinion, but the argument requires not that it should be expressed.

When the war was declared, the wrongs for which we are fighting England existed undressed against France, in a much greater or more aggravated degree. Their decrees, which had made such merciless havoc among our vessels and sailors, it is true, were repealed, but no atonement, no reparation, had been offered or obtained for the injuries they had produced. If war was necessary against England, why in the name of justice was France exempted from the vengeance of our injured, despoiled, and insulted people?

Need I mention the decrees, by the authority of which our property was confiscated, because the vessel had been spoken with by the British? Need I mention that unprecedented outrage of all principle and right, a decree made with an ex post facto sweep, so as to catch in the infernal net of confiscation a large American fleet, in the ports of France, of immense value? Need I mention the impressment of our seamen, burning of our vessels, imprisoning and starving their crews, by the French? Need I mention the insulting letters of the Duc de Cadore, a Turreau, and others? Need I mention the shameful concealment of the repealing decree, until it was well known in France, that we really designed to declare war against Great Britain? These are all old and well-known truths, but they are no less applicable or authentic on account of age or publicity. They still exist as truths, and they still speak a language which cannot be misunderstood. From all these facts, sir, an inference results as certain, as conclusive, as the demonstration of mathematics. It is in vain to attempt giving any other construction to such prominent, indubitable transactions. Conviction flashes from them to the unprejudiced mind, and they speak a language too loud not to be heard, too plain not to be understood; sophistry and quibble lose their wonted efficacy when opposed to demonstration so perspicuous, so cogent.

It must create some surprise that gentlemen can acknowledge, (and many if not all of them do acknowledge the existence of these outrages,) and yet argue or pretend that the conduct of Government has been fair and impartial.

FEBRUARY, 1814.

The Loan Bill.

H. OF R.

If England had really been guilty of all the crimes imputed to her, it is too evident to be denied, that France was incomparably more guilty. I challenge gentlemen to show an instance of British aggression to be compared, in turpitude, with the French burnings and confiscations; or, insult in the whole British diplomacy, for unblushing impudence, to be compared with the letters of Champagne, Cadore, and Turreau. Why, then, I again ask, should we discriminate? There was no justifiable cause. With France we had a treaty, which was violated; with England, none.

If the Government honestly believed it was good policy to spare France and fight England, why has France been spared on paper? We have too many samples of the ability of the Administration to scold, to believe its silence in relation to the numerous and continued injuries and injustice she had done us, originated in any want of capacity to complain, and denounce with skill. Yet it is a fact that these enormities and insufferable outrages have passed in complacent silence, save now and then a gentle murmur breathed in suppliant tone, by our Ministers to his Imperial Majesty, or now and then a sentence from the palace to this House.

It is a truth degrading and disgraceful to the American Government and nation, that the same Messages which have been replete with anathemas against England, have contained but a single short five-line paragraph, and that "soft as the kindest note of love" against France: "That she had not in every respect behaved quite as she ought to, but all would be arranged agreeably to our mutual wishes, and shortly the two nations would be on the best terms of amity." Or that "the Emperor had gone to his wars, and of course no opportunity had yet offered to settle the little difference between us." This is the kind of complaint, Mr. Chairman, that for many years past has been made against a nation from whom we were enduring every wrong which it had power to perpetrate.

But, if possible, let us suppose all this had been done by our Government from the best of motives. It will not be denied that the declaration of war against England was calculated, if not intended to aid France in the great career of universal dominion. The nations of Europe had bowed to the monster, wore his chains, or were fascinated by his spells. The "fast-anchored isle," alone faithful to her own and the liberties of the world, was then, as appeared to human sight, "the world's last hope." And the declaration of war must necessarily tend to take away that.

It could not escape the perceptions of the advocates of the war, that if we were capable of weakening England, we should strengthen France. Every blow we gave her was a blow to promote the slavery of the world. It in reality, sir, was forming an alliance with the French Emperor. We were doing all he asked. Only fight his battles, and he would consent that we should give a name to the relation in which we stood. The practical effect, and not the name, was important in the mind of the tyrant. This objection, if alone, was sufficient to prevent a declaration of war against a nation who had stood single-handed the shield of mankind; and at that time the power and attitude of Bonaparte threatened subjugation to the civilized world. The British fleet seemed the only barrier to check his progress in his ambitious and sanguinary career to a despotism of the globe. For it will be remembered that then the Emperor Alexander had not hunted him from the regions of snow; had not chased him with scorpion whip, in disgrace and dismay, back to his country. No, sir, he had not; but if he had, confident I am, that this war would not have been declared.

I am sorry to say, sir, that I do believe, not only too friendly an intimacy with the Emperor Napoleon, but a too severe resentment against Great Britain, contributed to the unhappy state of our country. I do fear, sir, that this war owed its existence more to the inveterate ill will of the Government to the enemy, than any sense of wrong which we have suffered, or disposition to obtain justice for this injured nation. The conduct of the ruling party, their language in and out of office, has ever bespoken the most irreconcilable hatred towards that nation.

I need not produce cases where the unfriendly feelings of the Government have been manifested. For since the party came into power, the Executive acts of the Government, the debates in the Legislature, and the laws of the Union, have kept time with the malevolent notes of his Imperial and Royal Majesty. Every attempt at negotiation has been but an attempt to convince England how detestable she appeared in the eye of the American Government. I need, sir, only refer you to the palace messages, to debates on this floor, to the State papers in your Library, for evidence enough to conquer scepticism, and prove what riveted detestation of the English nation occupied the heart of the Government.

The British Minister, Mr. Jackson, was immolated to Executive prejudice before he reached our shores. He was insulted afterwards, and driven from his diplomatic station with absolute rudeness.

The same Cabinet, which but just before could tamely crouch under a load of insult from the French Minister, became of a sudden electrified with resentment of a very furious kind at some little insult of Mr. Jackson, who was then accused of misplacing his words, notwithstanding the difficulty was so trifling, that the critic's eye has since sought, but sought in vain, to discover it.

The Henry scheme was another instance, not only of ridiculous pusillanimity, but evincing the avidity which the Cabinet entertained to seize at every circumstance that could be used as an occasion of crimination against the British.

Although this miserable project, which could not spring from a sane mind, failed to excite any feelings but contempt for the projector, it no less proves how much prejudice may derange a mind which once had some pretensions to knowledge, and the incorrigible nature of that hatred which shall induce a man to attempt the destruction of a gigantic antagonist with straws.

So open and boisterous has been the resentment of gentlemen on this floor, that no one could doubt the design of the Government ultimately to have a rupture with the British. And one gentleman, in the warmth of his malevolent zeal, invoked "the red artillery of Heaven." For what use? "To unmoor the fast-anchored isle." Pious wish. To engulf in the ocean a whole nation—for what? Because they were British subjects. There was no other cause. And, sir, permit me to say, the gentleman but echoed the language and bespoke the feelings of the ruling men of our country. Such is the deadly hatred that rankles in their bosoms, they would impiously court the weapons of Omnipotence to gratify their vengeance. And, why, sir, all this hatred against England? A nation who has done more to enlighten mankind, to encourage the arts and sciences, and disseminate the knowledge of the Christian religion than all the world besides. By the pious enterprise of those people "the solitary places have been made glad, and the wilderness to blossom like the rose." The ambassadors of the Redeemer have been encouraged and supported by the English missionary societies to carry the Gospel among the worshippers of Brahma.

Is it, sir, nothing to us that we descended from them, speak their language, have adopted their religion, from them drawn our maxims of jurisprudence? Is it nothing to us that their Government secures the liberty of the subject, and the uprightness and talents of their courts of judicature, his rights? Is the similarity of manners, customs, and pursuits adopted here, to those adopted there, nothing to the American people? The Constitution we all unite in commending, most evidently was drawn in imitation of the British.

With all these inducements to a good understanding, and with the adoption of the amazing value of British commerce to us, strange as it may seem, they are the last nation on earth whom we should favor, and the first in the implacable hatred of our Government.

England has her faults—great faults—for them I am not her apologist. When criminal, I would neither excuse or conceal her crime. But, sir, the honest mind which would condemn her vices will commend her virtues; and although now an enemy, we owe her justice—to withhold it, argues a degenerate soul.

For these remarks I may be represented by some lurking fiend of a "Tyro" as a British partisan, but whether so or not, I shall be bold to declare the truth. Thank God, the taste or feelings of the majority cannot by law govern mine, and I am left free to judge for myself; and while I shall not seek to give offence, I shall by no means stint the truth, lest men who profess to believe no man a patriot unless he hates and detests Great Britain should be offended.

I fear, sir, the hatred of England and attachment to France originated from one cause—in the vile principles of a Voltaire and Godwin, and the whole illuminated fraternity. Principles which have been wasting the nations of Europe, since the French Revolution, and which have too long trampled over the virtues and piety, and consequently the happiness of the American people.

It is avowed by gentlemen over the way that a conquest of the Canadas is one inducement for continuing the war. On a former occasion, sir, I had the honor to address this Committee, in opposition to any further attempts to accomplish any object attended with so much peril. Permit me now to say if you had the Canadas, if we could show ourselves capable of conquering this people, I fear we should pay too dear for a trifling object at best.

A gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. INGERSOLL) observed, that Canada must be conquered for the glory of the achievement. Sir, there can be no glory if you do the deed. Does the gentleman pant for such cheap glory? A nation of eight millions, and the descendants of men who in a mighty and truly glorious struggle, bearded the British Lion in person, and wrested from his paws our infant Independence, and hunted him foiled and dismayed from our shores! To deserve fame, we must do more than conquer the Canadas, the whole population of which is less than a sixteenth of our number. If, sir, the gentleman wishes to ennoble his country by great military achievements, and spread a lustre over this epoch of her history, why not march at once to the mouth of the Lion's den, clench him by the mane, and drag him forth to slaughter? If he can do this, and fame is worth fighting for, the end would then be attained.

Only invade the island of Great Britain, march through the country, and compel the kingdom to submit to your superior strength, and our nation then will make a figure in the history of battles.

[Here, on motion of Mr. NELSON, the Committee rose, reported progress and obtained leave to sit again, and the House adjourned. The next morning Mr. SHEPHERD proceeded.]

Mr. Chairman, with much pleasure I pay the tribute of thanks to the Committee for their vote yesterday, to rise at a time when I was exhausted. By so doing, they have afforded me the opportunity of pursuing my remarks, refreshed and invigorated. Particularly would I express my gratitude to the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. NELSON,) for the motion to rise; perceiving my strength much impaired by fatigue, he declared himself governed by this motive, to give me time for any farther remarks I should wish to make. Sir, this motion and the motive which induced it, was truly honorable. It was what might be expected from that gentleman, whose magnanimous mind disdains a mean advantage over an antagonist. He therefore acted like himself. It is the degenerate soul that would steal a victory; the noble mind wins it.

Yesterday, sir, when the Committee rose, I was observing, if national glory was the object, it was not to be obtained in the conquest of Canada. Permit me now to observe, sir, if a wish to compel Great Britain to give up her claims of impressment, as is most probably the design of the Government, the conquest of Canada would be equally futile; for you would be no nearer the consummation of your wishes than you are now. Sir, Great Britain is not conquered if the Canadas fall, and you have done nothing even then, towards conquering of her.

A nation omnipotent—for a gentleman on my left from Louisiana (Mr. ROBINSON) really declared that she possessed the most of the West India islands—in alliance with nearly all the continent of Europe; pursuing with her allies the most splendid victories the world has ever witnessed; with her forty millions of black inhabitants in the East Indies, and a thousand armed ships upon the ocean; will not submit as conquered, if we should obtain possession of the Canadas. This powerful nation, who holds the destinies of Europe and the trident of Neptune in her hands, who at no period of her history ever had the fame, the power, or the friends, as at this time, will not give up an iota of her pretensions, because a speck of her dominions may be for a time wrested from her. If all Europe combined could not make her yield, what ridiculous expectations must we entertain if we, for a moment, flatter ourselves that she will now yield to us that trident of the ocean, when all Europe are her friends? Before she would do so, sir, she would meet you on the banks of the St. Lawrence, with a mingled army of Sepoys from the East Indies, with the subsidized Tartar, Cossack, and Muscovite; the Swede and the Prussian; the Spaniard and Portuguese; the African from his native coast and the West Indies.

France, with whom she has been long contending, and for which contest her armies have been necessary, is now driven within her ancient limits. Spain and Portugal are emancipated. They have broken the tyrant's chains and are again free.

England can now send her armies to Canada, and were the two provinces in our possession, they would compel us to surrender them, or we must wage perpetual war.

Sir, do gentlemen believe that that proud nation would consent to make peace while Canada was in our hands by conquest? Is it thus they have learned the British spirit? Let gentlemen look into their own hearts before they form a definitive opinion on this subject, and then determine if we were invaded and a State taken from us, whether we would make peace, until it was either regained by force or restored by consent?

But other motives induce gentlemen to wish for the Canadas. The Indians, say they, are perpetually annoying our frontier, and if we had them this great evil might be remedied. Sir, do gentlemen believe, that the extending our jurisdiction over that country, would tame the spirit of the savage, and make him contented to cultivate the arts of peace? I fully believe that those children of nature will continue fond of war, until their minds are enlightened by science, their hearts softened by religion, their conditions meliorated by the improvement of arts. It is idle to believe, that in their obedience to law, you will find security for their peaceable behaviour, even if you had the country where they live. Depend upon it, sir, while the savage spirit remains, they will have war; and if two contiguous tribes will go to war with each other, there can be no safety or security to us, in extending our jurisdiction over the wilderness they inhabit. Do gentlemen discover what should prevent their retaliation of injuries upon our people, who may reside near or among them? Injuries will ever be offered them by the whites; that has been the case perpetually, since the first settlement of this country by Europeans. They either have been unjustly treated, or they suppose they have, and whether one or the other, will equally tempt them to unsheathe the scalping knife.

Revenge is a law with them, and they will ever seek this kind of redress for injuries—and this is not confined to themselves, but is handed down—the son fights to avenge the blood of his father, or the grandson his grandfather, or the descendant his ancestor. Think you then, sir, if we had this vast wilderness, the residence of the numerous tribes which are now formidable to the frontiers, they would want motives to butcher the inhabitants who should live near them? Sir, I cannot but think it would increase, rather than diminish this great evil.

If you obtain their country by conquest, you fix in the savage breast an hereditary feud, which may continue we know not how long. It is a far fetched argument to my mind, that you produce a peaceful quiet spirit in the Indian, by tearing from him his country by force of arms.

Another reason is given by a gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. HUMPHRIES) for conquering Canada—it would be convenient to us to have it. Yes, sir, and it would be very convenient for the Canadians to have the United States; it would not only enlarge their territory and the riches of their King, but would prevent us from molesting them; and, sir, permit me to say, they are as justly entitled to the United States, as we are to Canada; and they have as much reason to seize our country, to prevent our incursions, as we have to seize theirs, to prevent the incursions of the Indians.

The only difference between us in this respect, is, that we have the most power; and shall we, from the mere circumstance that we are able, unjustly despoil any nation, savage or civilized? God forbid! Honesty is the best policy, and "righteousness will exalt a nation;" rapine and injustice will depress and ruin it. In my soul I loathe and abhor that avaricious spirit, as well in a nation as an individual, that covets all the wealth, convenience, and territory, which is in sight. It is the base offspring of low-minded selfishness, and degrades man even below his fallen state.

And shall a nation whose country has been debominated "the asylum of oppressed humanity," who boast of their love of justice, and sacred regard for the liberties and rights of man, avow a principle which would degrade the Hottentot? No, sir. Let us exemplify by practice, that it was not in vain our country suffered so many privations, to erect here the temple of Freedom, and when our Constitution was finished, we held it up in one hand to the admiration of the world, and in the other the olive branch, as a token that we would never violate the principles of the former, or for ambition and avarice stain with blood the other.

Why that burst of execration from our lips, at the foul deed of conquering Poland, if such deeds are harmless? It would require nice discriminating intellects to distinguish between the turpitude of the two cases.

The conquering Powers there forgot right and humanity, in the plenitude of their powers; and had we power to take Canada, and did it to suit our convenience, we should be guilty of the same abominable outrage upon the principles of common justice; and much as the Indian is condemned for coming on our land, and murdering our citizens, it is no more criminal than for our people to go there and murder the Indians. The life and property of the savage, are as sacred in the sight of God as the lives and property of the citizens of this country. If there is any difference we are the most criminal—on account of our superior opportunity to learn justice and humanity.

The Indian, from his infancy, is taught that revenge is a virtue. The religion of the Messiah teaches us that it is abhorrent; therefore by how much more we know our duty, by so much more we are guilty if we depart from it.

Mr. Chairman, there is still another objection to the war. You are about to raise nearly seventy thousand men; for what? To defend your soil? No; but to invade the soil of your neighbor. The whole of these men are to be placed at the control, to obey the nod of a single leader. Who that leader will be is not known. Confident I am, he will not be a Washington, a Greene, or a Hamilton. They are no more; and if their mantles have fallen upon any of their survivors, no one of those survivors has been invited or induced to take the charge of our armies. The conducting of the military operations has, as yet, been chiefly placed in the hands of men who have given you pitiful security of future glory. What can we expect, sir, but ultimate ruin, when the Government shall select to high command men who have not scrupled to sow sedition among an army led by Washington, or barter away the independence of the country for Spanish silver? What security have you, sir, that such men, with such an army, will not, in despite of your interdictions, become Cæsars and pass the Rubicon of your liberties? The public ought not to confide in the integrity of such men. The risk is too great; and to derive confidence of safety from the impotence of the Army when opposed to the people, or by reposing on the loyalty of the troops, would be but wretched security. Should the arms of such an army, headed by an ambitious demagogue, be turned against the country, it would experience sad scenes, horrid discomfiture, and it would be a miracle if such a leader, holding out the immense plunder to be distributed among his troops, should not be able to merge their loyalty and virtue in the sanguine hopes of gain. What commander of an army ever failed to corrupt his soldiers if he attempted? Depend upon it, sir, we should have no security from that source.

These suggestions may be received with the fearless smile of incredulity by gentlemen who advocate the bill; but it is not weakness or jealousy that leads the mind to fears of this nature. It is a subject worthy of consideration. Men are still men; and the same lust of power that could tempt the Jacobin Absalom to rebel against his good king and indulgent father, might tempt your chief to seek a throne erected upon the ruins of your Republic.

When invaded, sir, we must have armies; but in that case, there is far less danger of any ambitious project to turn their arms against the country. In such case the people are most generally united by danger and necessity of common defence; but where you teach your officers, your soldiers, the lesson, and prove it by example, that the idea of justice and humanity is lost in the power of your arms, what else can you expect in case an ambitious and unprincipled man shall be placed at the head of your armies, sent to commit acts which lay aside morality and religion, than that he, whether he should succeed or fail in the enterprise, should attempt to profit himself by the means in his own hands? Sir, the man who could wantonly and wickedly attempt to promote sedition among the American troops in the last war, with the same black and diabolical heart, grown more hard by a repetition of vile intrigue and occult villainy, would not hesitate to seduce from their allegiance the American Army now; and that man still exists in our country, and, much to the disgrace of those who appointed him, in high and responsible office.

This war, Mr. Chairman, is wrong; it was wrongfully commenced; it has been wrongfully prosecuted. Such a scene of ridiculous misfortune and defeat perhaps never was known. Why then make further experiments? Stop while you have anything left. You have gambled away the national character, destroyed the national credit, and nearly exhausted the national finances.

Should a new army be raised, and a new loan be filled, the men and money are to be subject to the same indiscretion, the same profligacy; and, sir, prudence forbids that the public money should any farther be placed at the disposal of men who merge the dearest interests of the people in their own, or sacrifice to any extent the public finance in gratifying some favorite feeling or passion.

Six hundred thousand dollars of the public money was most imprudently put into the hands of a little Governor of New York, (I mean no disrespect to that gentleman, but that he was not a proper officer, to whom it should have been paid.) Why was this money placed in the hands of a Governor? Surely he was not a paymaster, or any other officer of the Union, and could not pledge any official responsibility. This money undoubtedly was a favor to the Governor, and secured his last election. Whether it has been accounted for or not, is yet to be learned.

FEBRUARY, 1814.

The Loan Bill.

H. OF R.

If there was no other objection to this bill, it is enough, that the money, if raised, is to be handled by men unworthy of confidence; I mean not to say that all are of that description. There are good men in office—nor would it here be proper to discriminate. It is enough for my purpose, that the Government will employ agents, who deserve not to be intrusted.

Again, look, sir, at the two campaigns already past, and read the future fortune of the Army; and, sir, the more perfectly to understand what has been done, I point you to a little book from the War Office, containing the epistolary correspondence of your Generals. That pamphlet alone is a sufficient sample to show the total want of arrangement, system, or concert. Time will not permit me to examine its contents; but take it in mass, and it proves how badly every operation was contrived, how wretchedly executed, and the jealousies, feuds, and insubordination of the officers. General Wilkinson attributes to the disobedience of General Hampton the failure of capturing Montreal; and in the same letter shows that there could be no necessity for his aid, as he expressly states, that six hundred men only guarded that city, while General Wilkinson's army exceeded five thousand effective men.

I am no judge, sir, but military men pronounce leaving the forts in Kingston and Prescott, to pour out an army upon the rear of the Americans, "to scratch them in the back," as an unpardonable oversight; and I confess reason seems to fortify the opinion. Whose fault this was seems not to be determined; indeed, the statements of the Secretary at War and the commander of the army are so equivocal, that those gentlemen, some time after, seem not to know what opinions they had given. What, then, but a disregard to the welfare of our country, or some fatal error, will induce us to make further experiments which promise but to waste the blood, the treasure, and the character of the nation, in abortive attempts to retrieve our losses?

Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen opposed to us do not agree in their opinion of what is right, what is the law of nations; and although their difference does not prove that they are all wrong, yet it is strong evidence that one is wrong; if, therefore, they cannot agree about their principles, while laboring to maintain the same cause, they cannot complain of the minority for differing altogether with one of them.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. INGERSOLL) declared that he was well satisfied all our difficulties had arisen from the denial of Great Britain that free ships make free goods, and he exhausted much time to prove the correctness of the position. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. JACKSON) frankly declared that no pretension was made, that free ships make free goods. In this essential and important point these gentlemen are at issue. Strange, then, they should so severely reprobate the opposition from this side to principles which they cannot agree about themselves! The gentleman from Virginia also declared that he would not have gone to war for naturalized seamen; while the gentleman from Pennsylvania stated that no peace could be made until the British would abandon the right of impressing them. Here we find those gentlemen contending against each other, not only as to the freedom of goods which have a neutral flag waving over them, but as it respects the only remaining cause of war. Shall the war then be continued, so long as its advocates really prove the right for which we are fighting is of a nature so equivocal, that the advocates of that war hold different language and different opinions as relating to the cause?

The gentleman from Virginia advanced one proposition which I cannot omit to notice. That "retaliation be to just must not fall on the innocent third party." Now, sir, I admit this to be true; and if true, what will become of the President's system of retaliation upon British captives? Their innocence is not, cannot be denied. They have no other guilt than every man who is connected in a defensive war.

This remark of the gentleman leads me back once more to the French. He made the remark as applicable to the relation between the United States and Great Britain, to show the unjust character of the Orders in Council, which are pretended by the British as a measure of retaliation against the French; and, said the gentleman, "if they intended to retaliate on France, they had no right to injure us." Be it so. And then permit me to ask how can the gentleman from Virginia, in the same speech, in the same section of his argument, justify the decrees of Berlin and Milan, as a retaliatory measure against England, for what he calls her paper blockade? It will not be denied, either that we are an innocent third party, or that we have suffered great loss in consequence of those decrees; and if all this be true, what becomes of the boasted impartiality of our Government in relation to both these belligerent Powers?

The gentleman further remarked that the late President did right in sending back the Treaty of 1806. Sir, this act of Mr. Jefferson cannot be justified. In the first place, admitting the treaty to possess such demerits as required its rejection, yet the President alone had no power to determine the point; he should have laid it before the Senate. And, secondly, I venture to say, the ratification of that treaty would have been a glorious thing to our country; and those glories, its peace, happiness, and prosperity, have been bartered away to gratify the scruples, the follies, and resentments of the then President against England, and his unjustifiable fondness for France. Sir, that treaty was a good one. It was so declared by the Ministers who negotiated it, one of whom is now the Minister of State, the other Attorney General.

[Here Mr. SHIPHERD read a paragraph of a letter from Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney to the then Secretary of State.]

Such testimony ought not to be overlooked or rejected. It is too high, too authentic. And yet it is said, notwithstanding the opinion of those gentlemen, the treaty was so bad that it was not necessary to lay it before the constituted authority to say whether it should be ratified or not.

One further remark, in answer to the gentleman from Virginia, and I have done. He declares that "the enemy have more patriotism than the minority here, for that he presents an unanimous front against us, while we are divided; although his cause is bad and ours good." It is true, that the enemy is united and we divided; but I cannot believe it follows that we are less patriotic, or that our cause is better from these premises. Whatever the fact may be, it would really seem, that union of a people in a cause was some evidence that it was just, and division that it was unjust. In the last war, the state of the public mind was very different. England then was divided; we were united. They then invaded; we defended. We now invade and they defend. And if any conclusions are to be formed from the facts, they are, that we are now wrong, as we were right in the last war; and that a common sense of justice has produced the union of the one and division of the other. Yes, sir, we are wrong; we have sinned, greatly sinned; we have shed innocent blood, and we may look for calamity and disaster; for the judgments of Heaven to light upon us, unless we abandon the impious career, and seek by repentance the pardon of our offences.

Mr. SHERWOOD spoke as follows: Mr. Chairman, after the very able discussion which the bill upon your table has received from both sides of the House—after the minute financial examination of the subject, the acute analytical investigation of the causes and effects of the war, and after the energy and eloquence of my honorable friends, it may seem presumption in one of my humble powers to claim the attention of the Committee. But, sir, I will endeavor to tranquillize any rising spirit of impatience by an assurance of my disposition to be brief; I will promise the Committee I have no ambition to detain them long, and, were I ambitious, I have not the vanity to believe I could long excite the interest of the House.

I am opposed to the bill before us for causes intrinsic, springing immediately from the bill itself—such as the immense amount contemplated to be borrowed—the enormity of the interest at which the money is to be obtained—the consequences to the Government in throwing itself into the hands of money lenders. And I am also opposed to it for causes extrinsic, arising from the ulterior application of the money to be obtained, and the consequences of such application.

The amount contemplated to be raised by this and the other bill is thirty millions of dollars—five millions by Treasury notes and twenty-five millions by loan. We have already for the purposes of the war raised by Treasury notes and loans forty-four million five hundred thousand dollars. Pass this bill, and the faith of the Government is pledged for a new national debt of more than seventy millions of dollars. And let me ask gentlemen if they are prepared to mortgage the estates of their constituents for the payment of this enormous sum? But, sir, the time is unfavorable for obtaining this enormous loan. The stock you have already thrown into market; much of it is not, as many gentlemen suppose, in the hands of your moneyed institutions; it is yet in the hands of your speculators, your stock-jobbers, who, without sufficient capital themselves, have contrived by obtaining liberal bank discounts, pledging their stock as collateral security, to raise money to meet the instalments which have not as yet become due. If, however, the pressure upon the banks, which seems to have commenced at the East, and is rapidly travelling on to the South, should increase, so as to diminish discounts, the consequence will be, that a large amount of the stock will be thrown into the market and sales necessarily forced. Should this event occur, and nothing is more probable, stock will be below par; and at this eventful crisis, when your stock of about forty millions may be below par, or, to say the best of it, not above par, you are to inundate the market with thirty millions of additional stock. And let me conjure gentlemen, before they thus put at hazard the credit of this Government, to pause and reasonably satisfy themselves who will vest his capital in this stock. Are your banks to subscribe any more? No, sir, it is believed some have already gone so far as to endanger their credit. Are your real moneyed capitalists to engage in it? No, sir, they have been tempted and entreated by your speculators, but generally tempted and entreated in vain.

But gentlemen tell us our merchants, whose capitals are restricted from their accustomed employment, will, at the present moment, readily invest in this stock; in this calculation the friends to this bill, I believe, are also mistaken. Merchants have no inclination to withdraw from their accustomed pursuits, and it would be very difficult to persuade them into a course which would prevent their resuming such pursuits whenever the channels of commerce are unlocked. Besides, sir, the merchant and other capitalists fear, if you load your Government with such an immense national debt, that some of your Western States, who will never own a dollar of it, will find that shaking off all liability is the most convenient mode of redeeming their pledge.

Again, we are told that our stock will fall into the hands of foreign capitalists. We shall, by the magic operation of this loan, extract funds from the enemy to enable us to carry on the war; and the honorable gentleman from Virginia, who last spoke upon this subject, (Mr. Jackson,) approved and enforced the argument. And is it come to this, that gentlemen on the other side of the House are willing to have the stock of our funds placed in the hands of British capitalists? And are they who were so sensitive to foreign influence—so tremulously fearful of the power of British gold, when a reincorporation of the United States Bank was applied for, now so changed? Are they who were then so much alarmed at the possession by British capitalists of four or five millions of bank stock, now ready to throw into the hands of the same capitalists five times that amount of your national loans?

FEBRUARY, 1814.

The Loan Bill.

H. OF R.

But let me ask gentlemen what reason they have to suppose that British capital will be invested in our funds? The first inducement to such an investment would be a full conviction of the faith of our Government, and that idea presupposes the integrity of the Union. And is not the latter supposition in direct hostility to the opinions which the gentlemen on the other side of the House daily make and pronounce for the British nation? Do not gentlemen daily tell us, the British consider this Government "formed of a divided people"—that "we are ready for a dissolution?" And from such premises can gentlemen draw the inference, that our loan is to be taken by British capitalists?

The enormity of the interest to be paid for this loan forms in my mind another important objection to the bill. The last loan was negotiated at a fraction less than eight per cent., while the interest at the banks, and the legal interest of most of the States, is six; private credit, and the credit of individual States, obtain any amount at the same per cent.; and yet, sir, this Administration, under the management of its present rulers, pays eight. Sir, if the Administration would exert itself to establish the credit of the nation upon a basis as firm as private credit; if it would show the moneyed men a redeeming fund, instead of driving back from your Treasury fifteen millions of annual commercial revenue; if it cherished the just interests of the people, and soothed and allayed instead of exasperating their passions; if it gave to calculating men a rational expectation that the halcyon days of commercial revenue would again be restored to this country; if, in short, the "restrictive energies," the "anti-commercial policy" of your Administration had not exhausted the streams of public revenue, and, indeed, dried up its very source, we might either have had in the Treasury a supply for our wants, or commanded it upon terms advantageous and creditable.

The gentleman from Virginia, to whom I just alluded, tells us that in loaning money to the Government there is "no patriotism concerned;" the exaction beyond legal interest is "usury." Now, sir, I cannot distinguish between the evil consequences of throwing the pecuniary concerns of Government into the hands of "usurers" and those of a private individual. To the affairs of the latter we know it would be ruin. If these gentry once get the noose about your neck, they are as relentless as death; give them eight per cent., they will ask you nine; yield them this, they will rise to ten; and so, drawing you within their grasp, the gripe of the usurer becomes the gripe of death. If the Administration must raise this enormous sum, why not apply to the people at once and collect it? Is it fearful the people will see and realize the ruinous tendency of its measures? Does it lack courage to show to each individual the proportion for which his estate is mortgaged? Does it suppose, by shuffling off the "hour of reckoning," its political life is "yet to be spared another day?" Does it suppose the people had rather pay twelve per cent. Government interest, (doubling the debt upon them in eight years,) than each now to pay his proportion, borrowing himself at six, if necessary? I believe, sir, the interest and feeling of my constituents, corresponding with my own, hostile to a national debt, which thus feeds and fattens the speculators and usurers of your country.

Again, sir, I am opposed to the influence which will be given to the money lenders, whom the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. JACKSON) designates as lacking patriotism. A moneyed influence in a Republican Government should ever be rigidly and firmly resisted. Every member of every branch of our Government should be kept free from temptation; free from suspicion of such an influence, and clear from the contagious atmosphere generated in its use. In aristocratical and monarchical Governments, perhaps, the reverse of this general proposition is correct; and hence, perhaps, the maxim in such Governments "a national debt is a national blessing." But in this country I trust such a maxim will never insinuate itself into the progress of our affairs, so as to reach and blunt the feelings of the people. Who can deny, however, that with forty millions of public stock, recently issued to the avarice and cupidity of the nation, and with an almost equal amount contemplated now to be issued, that our fears should be excited?

I shall regret to see, but the period may not be far off, when speculators, stock-jobbers, and usurers, will swarm about your Capitol, thrusting themselves into the very sanctuary of your Legislature; infesting your lobbies and galleries; kindly devising and advising the laws for your enactment. So deeply interested for the public good, their precious time will be wholly devoted to aiding you in financial arrangements. The period may be at hand, sir, when you will see them moving about your palace, and the departments of your Cabinet, disinterestedly helping your Secretaries to select suitable persons for the offices of your Government. Let this moneyed influence get the advantage of your means, and your Government will be to it "as clay in the hands of the potter;" it will mould and fashion it to its own liking. Yes, sir, let these usurers get foothold, and they will prey upon your vitals; you will see them hovering about your Treasury like crows about a carcass, croaking for the last morsel.

My opposition to the bill, Mr. Chairman, for cause extrinsic, arises from the avowed application of the proceeds of the loan to the carrying on the war of conquest in which we are engaged; a war, the retrospect of which humbles the just pride which Americans did feel, and, I trust, may yet feel; a war, the prosecution of which reason and experience forbid; for, in prospect, our country's honor, and its fame, and hope, are cast in shade, and we can scarcely collect a ray of light to irradiate the picture.

In viewing the subject of this war, avowedly prosecuted for the conquest of Canada, we are naturally led to consider the causes of its declaration, the cause of its continuance, and the consequences flowing from its prosecution. As it is not my present purpose to detain the Committee with a minute or critical examination of either of these topics, I shall limit myself to very few remarks.

But, sir, we are to be checked at the threshold of this discussion. We are told by the majority that the causes and consequences of the war are useless discussions; that war is duly declared by the constituted authorities of the Government; and to hold and inculcate opinions against it is to oppose Government—it is moral treason. Gentlemen have not yet gone so far as to pronounce the expression of our opinions as actual treason, but have coined a new grade of offence, and christened us "moral traitors." Whether this newly devised offence of differing with the Administration in opinion, and assuming the hardihood to express such opinion on this floor, and in this nation, is to be chastised with the arm and the power of the Administration, is yet to be learned. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Jackson) has told us, however, when speaking of this new species of treason, that it must be put down; the Administration must adopt a new motto, put it down "peaceably if they can, forcibly if they must."

Now, sir, before this motto shall be engraved upon the tablets of the Administration, I conjure gentlemen to pause! The people of this country are freemen in sentiment, freemen in action; and, before you can abridge them of the liberty of forming and expressing their opinions upon the measures of the Administration, you must abridge their existence. Are gentlemen aware of the consequences of establishing this motto? The mere suggestion is calculated to lead the sturdy yeomanry of this country to the jealous point of daring, and the attempt to enforce it would bring upon us the horrors of civil war. Before gentlemen assent to this motto, let them trace the effects; let them count the costs. This Administration never could enforce a doctrine so absurd, so tyrannical. Sir, the single State of Connecticut, adopting the opinion of a just right, which they believed authorized and secured by the Constitution, could not be put down by the whole force of the Administration south of the Chesapeake. I regret, sir, that this subject, in itself delicate, could not have been handled with a delicacy better adapted to assuage and soften down the irritations of human nature; but it is an incident to the freedom of opinion and discussion to resist every encroachment upon either in the language of truth and firmness.

The majority find it very difficult to agree on the just cause for the continuance of this war. The cause assigned for its declaration, the British Orders in Council inhibiting neutral commerce to certain French ports, ceased with their revocation. Whether these orders were really just cause of war as against Great Britain, or whether they were merely retaliatory of the French decrees, has been so often and so ably discussed, that I shall not attempt to consume the time of the House on that point. Suffice it to say they are now revoked. They were revoked within five days of the declaration of war. Nor will I take up the time of the House to inquire whether the Orders in Council were revoked in consequence of the repeal of the French decrees, or the coercive effects of our restrictive system. I will only observe that the British were pledged to revoke their restrictions whenever the French decrees were repealed, and due notice given of such repeal. They redeemed their pledge—they did revoke them. Neither will I examine whether it was the deception of the French Government practised upon our Administration, developed in their celebrated decree, bearing date 11th April, 1811, (now universally admitted to be fabricated,) that precipitately brought our Administration into this war.

The ostensible cause of war was these Orders in Council. So said the friends of the war in Congress when developing the views of the Administration; such, too, is the report of the committee who responded to the President's war Message; and so wrote the Secretary of State to our foreign Minister. This ostensible cause, then, is removed, and yet, the war is continued. On receipt of the revocation of the British Orders in Council, the British Provincial Governor proposed an armistice by land, and Admiral Warren seconded his views by a similar proposition by sea. Our Government rejected the propositions. If our Administration was disposed for peace, why not, after the revocation of her Orders in Council, and a proposition from the enemy for an armistice, why not accede to it? Could a moment more favorable have been expected? If the Administration had then consented to have stayed the arm of hostility and devastation, its friends would not have been driven to the necessity of hunting up other causes for the continuance of the war.

We are now told that impressment is the principal cause. The British contend for the right of searching neutral merchant vessels upon the highway of nations, and taking out such of their own citizens as they may find on board such vessels. This claim set up by the British frequently operates injuriously. From the similarity of habits and language of the two nations, mistakes are often made, and American sailors have been the victims of the enemy's policy; but whenever they have chosen to assert and manifest their citizenship, they have always been released. This claim of the British has uniformly been considered as one operating unjustly, and every Administration, from the days of Washington down to the present, have made it cause of complaint; none, however, have thought it cause of war. The principal irritations growing out of this subject have arisen from British subjects claiming American protections. Many worthless foreigners, renegade Irish, Scotch, and Englishmen, have not only attempted to palm themselves upon British officers as Americans, but have actually succeeded in the attempt. These impositions frequently detected, and, perhaps, attributable in some measure to the manner in which American protections are obtained, operate upon the real American sailor by alarming the jealousy, sharpening the scrutiny, and exciting the tyranny of the British officer. My object being to show that this complaint of impressment was not considered as a cause of war, I have merely adverted to the causes assigned contemporaneously with its declaration, and content myself with the inference which inevitably follows.

The Loan Bill.

Gentlemen who feel the force of these recollections are driven to assign other causes; and, what is not astonishing, when ingenuity alone is to be exercised, they do not agree as to what was really the cause of the war. An honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. INGERSOLL) thought it was cause of war that the British denied the doctrine "that free ships make free goods." Another gentleman (Mr. JACKSON) of the majority, showed that the British were correct, and if you allow the neutral flag to protect the goods that sailed under it, it might lead to the most abominable fraud.

Another cause urged by gentlemen is, that the enemy instigated the Indians to hostility against us. One gentleman, (Mr. I.) said it was a "momentous case of war," and he was surprised the Administration did not think of it when war was declared; "there never was so fine an opportunity for making a declaration of war." If this gentleman is right, then it is cause of just regret to the majority that they were, at that period, deprived of talents so astute and brilliant as his, for they undoubtedly would have had a declaration of war, surpassing in its effects the most finished proclamation of the present era.

A recurrence to the history of the session of Congress, in 1812, will convince this gentleman that he is mistaken as to the fact of the existence of this cause of war. The Administration were certainly not unmindful of the great advantage such a cause would have had in enlisting the feelings of the community in a vigorous prosecution of the then determined hostility; a committee of this House was therefore raised to inquire specially into the subject; and, although a labored report was prepared and printed, it was thought most advisable to suffer it to rest undisturbed upon the shelf—not unlike another late voluminous report. The barbarity of the circumstances is more apparent than their authenticity is satisfactory; and opposed to this doubtful presumptive testimony, was the positive disavowal of the British Minister, Mr. Foster, of the connexion of his Government with the Indian aggressions.

The Orders in Council have ceased. Impressment is a subject of complaint, not a cause of war. The instigation of the Indian hostility lacks authenticity. Our war is therefore continued without a sufficient cause.

If our cause was just, and the feelings of the people were united to avenge it, this Administration ought not to be intrusted with conducting it. The history of the progress of the war has fixed upon the Administration a character too prominent to be concealed, too just to be denied; its principal characteristics are impotency of management, and profligacy of expense.

The minority, who resisted the declaration of war, in a course of many prediction and almost miraculous prophecy, pointed out its evils. They warned you, as with a voice of wisdom, against the delusive scheme of conquering the Canadas; they foretold to you many of the disasters which have since been realized; they warned you of the danger of your seaboard; and they conjured you to avoid the desolation of your Western frontier: these warnings were regarded not, but they cannot be forgotten, and the truth of them will add poignancy to their recollection.

A recurrence to the events of the war is but little more than a review of our disgraces. Whether we commence with the "planting of our standard" in the enemy's province by Hull, or terminate with the progress of our last Northern campaign, the result is the same. Our armies wasted, our means dissipated, and a fair portion of our country laid in ruin. Though brave officers and good soldiers have labored to support the sinking honor of the country, their efforts have been counterbalanced by the weakness and the folly of the plans and the counter-plans of the principal managers. The report of the Secretary of War, on the causes of the failure of our arms, develops most strikingly the weakness, if not the wickedness, of those who conducted the last campaign. An examination of this correspondence will satisfy any gentleman that, instead of your armies being directed by the united energies of your officers, petty jealousies, malignant hatred, and much mysterious cunning, have distracted and defeated their operations; instead of seeking honorable fame, achieved by great and glorious deeds, they seem to have sought that comparative fame, which elevates itself by the destruction of others.

I will not detain the Committee to show the various changes of the plan of the Northern campaign; how one day Kingston was to be taken by a "direct attack" of the army, crossing from Sackett's Harbor, and the next day by an "indirect attack" by the way of Montreal; nor will I point to the cordiality with which the principal Generals so manifestly "harmonized" in the great objects of the campaign; nor shall I attempt to describe with what deep skill the prime juggler behind the scene moves the puppets for their destruction or his eventual fame.

When the war was declared, Canada was to be taken in ten weeks. All the power that Administration have wished, or could derive under the Government, has been at its disposal. Armies as large as the majority chose to vote them have been granted; money, as much as has been asked for, has been obtained; in short, Administration has commanded the Constitutional resources of the country, and what has it accomplished? We now have actual possession of Malden, and imaginary possession of the wilderness opposite Detroit, while the enemy have possession of the important peninsula connecting Lakes Erie and Ontario, and of the desolated remains of the once flourishing villages along the Niagara. Such is the progress your Administration have made towards the conquest of Canada—so they have fulfilled their engagements of glorious warfare.

But, sir, the profligacy of our present expense is equalled only by the diminution of the radical resources of the country. The estimate for the current year, and a reasonable allowance for claims of indemnity, added to a loss of commercial revenue, will probably fall little short of one hundred millions of dollars; while a permanent irreparable loss to the wealth of your country, arises from the diversion of foreign commerce, from a change of the industrious habits of the country, and from a want of the necessary labor for agricultural pursuits.

Two years have nearly expired since we have been engaged in this contest, which now is generally called a war for "sailors' rights"—a war to protect foreigners against their lawful sovereign on the high seas. Were it to protect the naturalized citizen on our own soil, who mingles and mixes in the homebred duties of social life, every feeling of my heart would be engaged; but for the protection of such "sailors' rights," I would not sacrifice one native American. And yet, sir, for these "sailors' rights," have you expended millions and millions of your treasure, loaded your citizens with taxes, and sacrificed the peace and happiness of every class in society. In this war for "sailors' rights," have your villages been pillaged, innocence violated, the peaceful dwellings of your citizens razed, and a whole country desolated? Yes, sir, armies have been swept away, many valuable lives have been lost—not so many valuable lives, for into your Army, generally, you have been unable to draw men either valuable to themselves, or valuable to the community.

From all these considerations, I cannot give my vote for this enormous loan. If, instead of purposes of conquest, the majority would devise a system for defending our own soil, I would yield them every aid, however badly I think of the original cause of war, of its continuance, or the managers of it.

I know my constituents are unwilling to barter their lives and their fortunes for the conquest of Canada, and, with me, would withhold every dollar which is intended for that object. Yes, sir, I would bar the main spring of your political clock, and let your journeyman politicians wind and wind in vain; no longer should be rung, in melancholy chime, the dreadful notes of desolation and distress from Georgia to Maine, from Champlain to Orleans.

When Mr. SHERWOOD had concluded—

Mr. GRUNDY addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I had determined to remain silent during this discussion, and nothing but the extraordinary course pursued by gentlemen on the other side of the House could have induced me to relinquish that determination. Not satisfied with replying to the arguments urged by the majority at the present, they have assailed sentiments advanced by me at the last session; nor has this been done by one or two only, but by all who have addressed you; yes, sir, from the greatest to the least—from the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. PICKERING,) down to the gentlemen from North Carolina, (Messrs. CULPEPER and PEARSON,) who spoke a short time since—this has constituted the burden of their song. But for this, I should have been saved the trouble of speaking, and you the fatigue of hearing me.

Before I proceed to an examination of their arguments, the Committee will indulge me a few moments in taking a view of the subjects under consideration, different from any yet presented.

The Committee of Ways and Means have recommended to the House the adoption of a bill providing for a loan of twenty-five millions of dollars; the majority seem disposed to grant the supply asked for, the minority say it ought not to be granted—the question then is, which party is right? This can best be decided by an examination into the effects which will result from the adoption of the one course or the other. If more public good will result from the passage of the bill than from its rejection, the minority are acting erroneously. If, on the other hand, more evil will arise from its passage than from its rejection, the minority are acting correctly. You are engaged, Mr. Chairman, in a war with a powerful nation, on whose magnanimity and justice, judging from past experience, you can place no reliance. Should this bill pass, you will be prepared to arm the American people, and (should negotiation fail) meet your enemy in the field of battle; you will be prepared to assert your rights by the sword; you will exhibit your Government in the attitude which is most commanding, with the sword in the one hand, and the olive branch in the other, saying to the enemies of your country—Choose ye which to select. This is what the majority recommend. What is the course advocated by the minority? Disarm the American people, lay down your weapons of warfare, and do what? Ask pardon and forgiveness, for your transgressions, and accept of such terms as the enemy will accord to you. Is this a course worthy of a great and free people? Would you not by this demonstrate to the world that you are unworthy of that liberty which you enjoy? I confess, Mr. Chairman, I am almost tempted to doubt the sincerity of gentlemen's declarations, when I look at the low and degraded state to which the country would be reduced, should the opposition to this bill succeed. Further, sir, by the money contemplated to be raised under the authority of this bill, you can comply with all your engagements; you can pay the officers and soldiers already in your service; you can support that navy of which all parties claim to be the patrons; you can pay the stipulated portion of former debts; in short, you will support the public credit;—reject it, and you cannot pay those at present in your employment; your navy must rot, your ability to obtain loans at any future period will be entirely annihilated; for once let it be ascertained that your punctuality is not to be depended on, rely on it, it will be idle to attempt to borrow. What, sir, has hitherto kept up the price of American stock at home and abroad? It has been that rigid regard to justice and good faith which has at all times characterized this Government. There are cases in which, probably, a government might fail punctually to comply with its engagements, and still the public credit might not be greatly affected. This would not, however, be one of those cases; because, in this instance, there would not only be a failure, but it would be unaccompanied with an honest exertion towards compliance. If, sir, the idea shall ever meet with public sanction, that one political party may incur a debt and their political opponents stand justified in refusing to discharge it, I pronounce that public credit is at an end, and this form of government will soon follow it. At the last session, a gentleman from New York (Mr. OAKLEY) furnished the best apology that could be made for his vote against the loan bill; but I have heard nothing of the kind from others; and even his apology was not very satisfactory. After the passage of that bill, he declared he would have voted for it, only he knew the majority were bound to pass it. He seemed justly to appreciate the importance of preserving the public faith. I thought the sentiment honorable to him; but I confess it did occur to me that he had adopted too easy a method to get clear of the trouble of doing his duty for himself. I did suppose that the better way was for each individual to do that which appeared right to himself, and not leave it to others to perform it for him. If, however, that gentleman can reconcile such conduct to his own conscience, it is not for me to censure or condemn. Who, Mr. Chairman, complain most of the defenceless state of the country? The very men who refuse to grant men and money for its defence. They say they need protection, and criminate the Government for the want of it; and at the same time use all their exertions to withhold from the Administration the means of protecting them.

Sir, members venerable for their age and experience, and more so for their pursuits in life, (for they profess to be the interpreters of the word of truth,) have said in debate that this is a wicked and irreligious war; and quote the expressions, "Thou shall not kill," &c., "Love thy neighbor as thyself," &c., in support of this charge. Do these gentlemen suppose that the book to which they refer, the authority of which all admit, is so little understood that misinterpretations of this kind can be practised successfully? Can it be believed, that that Deity, who, on many occasions, expressly commanded wars to be made; he who led his favorite people to battle, and was a shield and defence to them in the hour of danger, should condemn all wars as unlawful? These gentlemen have forgotten that the British Government, which they consider as the great promoter of Christianity, is in the habit of shedding human blood by her wars. Yes, that moral and religious nation is more frequently engaged in war than any other; not defensive wars only, but offensive foreign wars. Examine her history, and you will find that within the last six hundred and ten years she has been at war two hundred and sixty-one years with a single nation; and during that period she has never been invaded, though at particular periods greatly threatened. The same gentlemen affect to value the blessings of civil liberty, as enjoyed by us, and to revere the Constitution of the United States; and can they not remember that these are the effects of the war of the Revolution? If all wars are forbidden by the law of God, the Revolution was an immoral and wicked thing, and those who achieved it are liable to censure, rather than entitled to that praise which all parties unite in bestowing on them.

It is also alleged that it is unjust to invade Canada. In the Revolutionary war it was invaded; and I defy those who pretend they are the disciples of Washington, to show any difference in principle between the propriety of an invasion then, and an invasion now. Yet at that period the illustrious man who commanded the American armies, and all those who were united with him in rescuing this country from the unfeeling grasp of a foreign tyrant, decided that the conquest of the Canadas was just and expedient.

I come now, Mr. Chairman, to speak on that point which produced the necessity of my addressing you: Moral treason—that sentiment expressed by me at a former session, which has excited so much sensibility, and given rise to so much censure. To whom have I ascribed it? Not to those who exercise their Constitutional privilege of opposing measures before they are adopted by the constituted authorities; not to those who shall, even after their adoption, deliver their sentiments freely against them; not to those who shall fail to join the Army themselves, or decline to loan their money; but to those who shall exert their influence to prevent others from enlisting, and shall combine together for the purpose of preventing loans from being filled. Men of the latter description, I did say, were, in my judgment, guilty of treason in a moral point of view. I say so still. It is an opinion which reflection has doubly confirmed; it is an opinion I shall never retract. So far from it, would to God it were written in letters of sunshine in the very centre of Heaven, that all the world might read. It is opposing the laws after they are constitutionally enacted; it is attempting to prevent the operation of the laws by other means than a repeal of them; and the latter is the only way in which I believe the effect of any law can with propriety be defeated.

Gentlemen who are so very sensitive on this subject had better look back a few years, and see how they thought and acted when in power, and perhaps a review of this kind will show them the true difference between us on this point. We say such conduct as I have described is unjustifiable. We advise, we admonish, we entreat those who practise it, to desist. Not so in 1798. The party then in power acted; they passed their Sedition law; they recorded their disapprobation of such conduct; and a republican member of Congress, from Vermont, suffered the penalties imposed. And, sir, recollect, this took place in what is called the quasi war with France, and not at a period when dangers assailed the nation on every side, as at present.

Let us recur to that law, and see whether its provisions would not punish those guilty of such conduct as I have censured:

An Act in addition to the act, entitled "An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States."

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That if any person shall unlawfully combine or conspire together, with intent to oppose any measure or measures of the Government of the United States, which are or shall be directed by proper authority, or to impede the operation of any law of the United States, or to intimidate or prevent any person holding a place or office in or under the Government of the United States, from undertaking, performing, or executing his trust or duty; and if any person or persons, with intent as aforesaid, shall counsel, advise, or attempt to procure any insurrection, riot, unlawful assembly, or combination, whether such conspiracy, threatening, counsel, advice, or attempt, shall have the proposed effect or not, he or they shall be deemed guilty of high misdemeanor, and, on conviction before any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, and by imprisonment during a term not less than six months, nor exceeding five years; and further, at the discretion of the court, may be holden to find sureties for his good behaviour in such sum, and for such time, as the said court may direct.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall write, print, utter, or publish, or shall cause or procure to be written, printed, uttered, or published, or shall knowingly and willingly assist or aid in writing, printing, uttering, or publishing any false, scandalous, and malicious writing or writings against the Government of the United States, or either House of the Congress of the United States, or the President of the United States, with intent to defame the said Government, or either House of the said Congress, or the said President, or to bring them, or either of them, into disrepute; or to excite against them, or either, or any of them, the hatred of the good people of the United States, or to stir up sedition within the United States, or to excite any unlawful combinations therein, for opposing or resisting any law of the United States, or any act of the President of the United States, done in pursuance of any such law, or of the powers in him vested by the Constitution of the United States, or to resist, oppose, or defeat any such law or act; or to aid, encourage, or abet any hostile designs of any foreign nation against the United States, their people, or Government, then such person, being thereof convicted before any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding two thousand dollars, and by imprisonment not exceeding two years.

Now, sir, examine the extent of the provisions I have read. It is declared, that if any persons shall unlawfully combine or conspire together, with intent to oppose any measure or measures of the General Government, which are or shall be directed by proper authority, or to impede the operation of any law of the United States, &c. Suppose the first branch of the sentence should be construed to extend to cases only where open force was intended to be applied, yet the terms "to combine or conspire together, with intent to impede the operation of any law of the United States," would clearly embrace those who combine and conspire together to prevent the filling of the loans and the ranks of the Army. Observe, Mr. Chairman, in the second section, how careful those who now talk so much about the liberty of speech and of the press were to guard themselves from the attacks of their opponents. "To defame either House of Congress, or the President of the United States, with intent to bring them into contempt or disrepute," was made punishable. And this bill passed the Senate of the United States, containing only the two sections I have read, and without any provision that the truth might be given in evidence on the trial. Thus far I speak of the facts as the public records prove them to be. I examined them on yesterday. And I am informed by a venerable gentleman, then and now a member of this House, that, with great difficulty, a predecessor of mine (Mr. Claiborne) procured, in the House of Representatives, the insertion of the third section, which declares that the truth may be given in evidence on the trial. Without this provision, what would have been the condition of men prosecuted under that law? The principles of the common law would have been applied, and every gentleman of the law will admit, that in cases of libels, the truth could not be given in evidence in justification of the defendant. Here, then, according to the act of the Senate, the President and each House of Congress had effectually secured their conduct from investigation; and to the citizen who should arraign them before the bar of public opinion, truth afforded no protection. Have any attempts of this kind been made since the commencement of the Republican Administration? No, sir. And have not the President and both Houses of Congress been slandered, and basely slandered? The present majority wish not to hide their conduct from public view and scrutiny. All that is wished for is, that those who are opposed to them should so act as not to injure the public service. Those whose object is the public good need not the aid of sedition laws. They only need them whose actions cannot bear the light of truth. We wish to effect our object, not by fines and imprisonments, as our predecessors did, but by making it disreputable in the public estimation to injure the country by indirect means.

The Loan Bill.

H. OF R.

So fully, Mr. Chairman, am I satisfied of the correctness of the sentiments I have at all times entertained on this subject, that should it be my lot to be placed in a minority, however freely I might express my opinions of measures, no impediment should ever be thrown by me in the way of the execution, or operations of the laws, when once enacted except so far as an attempt to repeal them might have that tendency.

Gentleman from New York (Mr. GROSVENOR) had certainly not well considered the application of a sentiment expressed by him, or sure I am he would not have relied on it as a justification of the conduct of the minority in this House. He says, that opposition is useful and beneficial, and to prove this, he declares that had it not been for the opposition members of the British Parliament, the American Revolution would never have been effected. Grant it. We are in the habit of admiring and praising those who opposed the British Ministry during that struggle, because much good has resulted to the American people from their opposition. But if the interest of Great Britain required that she should retain the then colonies as a part of her dominions, have the labors of these men benefited their own country—have the people of Great Britain any cause to thank them for their exertions? Suppose the Opposition here should so far prevail as to compel the Administration to yield the great points in controversy between the two nations and surrender essential American rights—the same language we now use in relation to the Opposition in England, during our struggle for independence, might be applied to the Opposition in this country by Englishmen; but the American people could feel under no obligations to them.

Another gentleman from New York, (Mr. SHIPHERD) said, that we, the majority, are prejudiced against the religion of England. Sir, this is the unkindest cut of all. I had hoped that the vanity of the minority would have been satisfied in claiming for their party all the talents and political integrity of the country; but, not contented with depriving us of all respectability and comfort in this life, they even attempt to deprive us of every hope for happiness in the world to come. This charge we repel with indignation. If we do not make as many religious professions, it does not therefore follow that we possess less true religion than our political opponents. Sir, what does the gentleman mean by the religion of England? I presume he means what is generally understood to be the Protestant, in contradiction to the Catholic faith. If so, how small a portion of the American people profess the latter? They are few in number and respectable, considering their number; but, they neither have the ability nor disposition to excite prejudices against the religion of England. The great body of the people composing the present political majority, profess the religion of that country from which they descended, and cannot therefore on that account feel any prejudices against Great Britain.

We not only feel no prejudices against that nation, but we feel our partialities for it. It is the land of our fathers, and therefore we are partial to it; the English language is our language, and therefore we are partial to it; all our institutions, except those of a political kind, derive their origin from that country, and therefore we are partial to it; we are taught knowledge from English sources, and therefore we are partial to it. I confess, Mr. Chairman, I am under the influence of these partialities. But shall I, on that account, forget my own country? Shall I be actuated by such feelings so far as to permit that nation to trample under foot the sovereignty of the United States? No, sir, I love my country better than I love England.

The same gentleman has said, that that Government has done more to christianize the world than all other nations. Sir, look to India, and the crimsoned flood of the sacred Ganges will tell you what that Government has done to christianize the world. View the idol of Juggernaut, and the mass of human misery and death which is produced by an idolatrous superstition, which is not only permitted, but promoted, by this christianizing Government, for the express purpose of raising a revenue for the British Crown. Sir, a strong British guard is there kept to encourage superstition, and exact a tax from the deluded pilgrims who resort to that place to worship. That there are many associations of pious men in England, who have done much to benefit mankind, is readily admitted; but their acts are not the acts of the Government; nor has the Government at all times approved of them, else how did it happen that the missionaries Gordon, Morrison, and Lee, were not permitted to depart for India and China in British vessels, but were compelled to come to America to obtain passage in an American ship, in the execution of their mission? Sir, these things I should not have brought to the view of the Committee, had not the strange course in debate taken by gentlemen on the other side of the House rendered it necessary.

Mr. Chairman—it is insinuated that the Indian war has been produced by the conduct of the Government of the United States. I ask gentlemen to show in what manner this has been done? It cannot be shown; so far from it, every exertion has been used to ameliorate the condition of that unfortunate people, and save them from that destruction which a war with the United States must inevitably bring upon them. You have sent your agents amongst them to teach them the arts of civilization, and, while your Government was thus engaged, the agents and traders of Great Britain were employed in preventing the progress of your labors. You sent your teachers, your bibles, and your testaments; they sent their rum, their trinkets, and their baubles.

Sir, during the last Indian war, and after the treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain, the agents of that Government furnished the Indians with supplies to carry on their savage warfare, and ever since they have been busied in inculcating on their minds sentiments hostile to the people of the United States. They have been told, as the public documents abundantly prove, to be prepared to strike the blow, whenever a rupture should take place between Great Britain and the United States; and it was owing to their being overcharged with sentiments of this kind, that induced them to commence hostilities in the Indiana Territory, before the declaration of war.

Mr. Chairman, look at that Indian war which is now raging in all its fury in the Southwest, and account for its origin? What cause of complaint has the Creek Nation ever had against the United States? None is pretended; it originated in the manner pointed out to me by the captive chief of that nation, who is now confined in the town in which I live. When asked, why his people had made war on the United States, he replied: "A letter came from the North; a council of the chiefs was held; we were promised arms and everything else necessary, if we could make war on the United States; we were told that the British would assist us in recovering our lands and driving the people of the United States from them, and that the ancient order of things should be restored—upon these conditions war was decided on." This, sir, is the way in which Great Britain christianizes the world.

A gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. PITKIN) says, that the Administration has abandoned the ground first taken with regard to impressment, and an arrangement on that subject is all that is now expected, and not a formal relinquishment of the right on the part of Great Britain. Sir, a security against impressment is all that was ever asked; and to us it is altogether immaterial, whether it be by a renunciation of the right, or an arrangement by which the officers of the British navy shall be prohibited from entering American vessels and taking from them American citizens. And it only requires that this point should be fairly stated, to prove that the enemy can settle it, whenever he is disposed to act justly towards this nation. It has been alleged by Great Britain, that her seafaring subjects, whose services she needs, escape from her employment and enter into the service of the United States; and to reclaim them, she has been compelled to permit her officers to enter American vessels and seize them. By the passage of a bill, commonly called the seamen's bill, this Government has declared that this pretext for impressment shall no longer exist, for British seamen shall not be engaged in the American service, and adequate provisions are made to effectuate the object professed. If then Great Britain is disposed for peace, this subject can form no obstacle.

It is said, that England and her allies, since the late great events in Europe are omnipotent. On this point, gentlemen may calculate too strongly; it is one on which no man in this country can speak with confidence; but it seems to me not improbable that the influence of England on the Continent of Europe has already or will soon cease. Hitherto the power of France, which threatened to annihilate the Northern Powers, united them with England in opposing the Emperor of the French. But now, when France is reduced almost, if not entirely to its ancient limits, and ceases to be a terror to them, is there not every reason to believe, that having humbled the tyrant of the land, they will turn their attention to the tyrant of the ocean? Sir, I cannot believe that Alexander the Mediator, or Deliverer, if you please, will consent to surrender to Great Britain those maritime rights for which his Government has at all times contended. True, sir, while Russia was struggling for her existence, while a powerful invasion threatened the capital of her Empire, her maritime claims were permitted to rest, but they were never abandoned; and let it be recollected, that her maritime claims at all times have equalled, if not exceeded those of the United States.

Another gentleman from New York (Mr. SHERWOOD) has told you that the subject of impressment was never considered as a cause of war. This has often been said before and as often refuted—need I refer you to the uniform sentiment of this Government for upwards of twenty years, and under every Administration?

Sir, all parties when in power have concurred in declaring it to be an evil not to be borne. It is somewhat remarkable, that however great the differences of opinion on other political subjects, in this all concurred. Mr. Washington, Mr. Pickering, Mr. Marshall, Mr. Adams, Mr. Stoddart, Mr. McHenry, Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Madison, Mr. Monroe, Mr. King, have each in their turn declared the impressment of our citizens as practised by Great Britain to be a sufficient cause of war—and if persisted in, it would result in an open rupture between the two countries; and although gentlemen now say, that this formed no inducement for the declaration of war, at the session when it was declared, yet examine the public documents of that period, and it will be discovered, that it was considered and treated as a prominent cause of war. Indulge me in reading a paragraph from the first report made by the Committee of Foreign Affairs at that session; the language of the Committee is: "Your committee are not, however, of that sect whose worship is at the shrine of a calculating avarice; and, while we are laying before you the just complaints of our merchants against the plunder of their ships and cargoes, we cannot refrain from presenting to the justice and humanity of our country the unhappy case of our impressed seamen. Although the groans of those victims of barbarity for the loss of (what should be dearer to Americans than life) their liberty; although the cries of their wives and children in the privation of protectors and parents have of late been drowned in louder clamors at the loss of property; yet is the practice of forcing our mariners into the British navy, in violation of the rights of our flag, carried on with unabated vigor and severity. If it be our duty to encourage the fair and legitimate commerce of this country by protecting the property of the merchants; then indeed, by as much as life and

'liberty are more estimable than ships and goods, so much more impressive is the duty to shield the persons of our seamen, whose hard and honest services are employed, equally with those of the merchants, in advancing under the mantle of its laws the interests of this country.'

I could refer you to other documents of that session containing sentiments of the same kind, but this I deem sufficient to do away the effect of insinuations made by those who were not then members, and know but little on the subject. A gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SHEFFEY) has said, that the number of American seamen impressed by the British has been exaggerated. How is this proved? By bare assertion, and not otherwise. The official reports from the American Government, show the number to be 6,257: this statement I will rely on until its incorrectness is shown. But admit it to be incorrect, Lord Castlereagh, in the British Parliament, admitted that 1,600 American citizens had been impressed; this admission is surely good evidence against the British Government; and recollect these are admitted to be native American citizens, not British subjects naturalized in this country. Now let me ask the gentleman from Virginia, whether if 1,600 men were forcibly taken from his district by any foreign Power, he would not say it was sufficient cause of war, and would not condemn the Government that would refuse them protection? I am bound to believe he would; if so, is the principle changed when they are taken from any other quarter? Sir, so long as we are one nation, the same protection must be extended to every portion of the community.

One word more in reply to that gentleman, in behalf of my friend from Kentucky, (Mr. SHARP,) who is detained by sickness from his seat in this House. I understand the gentleman from Virginia as saying that his (Mr. SHARP'S) constituents were so uninformed on political subjects as not to have known of the existence of the Orders in Council until last year.

[Mr. SHEFFEY here explained, by saying that what he had said was in reference to a statement made by a member from Maryland at the last session, and not intending to make such charge himself.]

Mr. GRUNDY proceeded. It is then a matter of very little consequence; I will, however suggest to the gentleman from Virginia, that he perhaps should be the last member on the floor, who should provoke an inquiry into the comparative degree of intelligence and information which is to be found in different districts. I well knew that my friend's district would have nothing to fear from such a comparison with the district represented by the gentleman from Virginia.

We are told, that before the declaration of war the minority warned the majority of the consequences that were to follow, and predicted all the unfortunate events which have taken place; true, sir, they did, and much more; they told us that Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, and Charleston, would immediately be reduced to ashes, and the whole seaboard laid waste.

What, sir, has been done? Havre de Grace, Frenchtown, and a few other inconsiderable villages have been destroyed; what else? "Let the blushing streets of Hampton answer!" Sir, the enemy has made no solid impression on the country; they have carried on a kind of warfare calculated to irritate and unite the American people in the prosecution of the war.

A gentleman from New York asserted that we are waging this war to protect a set of renegade Irishmen. Sir, he is mistaken. It is an American war, carried on to secure American rights, and I have the fullest confidence that the nation will support the majority in every measure calculated to give vigor to it, until it can be brought to a just and honorable termination.

Mr. GASTON, of North Carolina, addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I fear I am about to engage in a very injudicious attempt—I fear that the patience of the Committee is exhausted, and that it would be idle to hope for their attention. It was originally my wish to claim their notice at an early stage of the debate; but I found this wish was not to be effected but by a competition for the floor, and I thought such a competition not justified by the nature of the remarks which I had to submit. Under these impressions I had made up my mind to wait until some favorable unoccupied interval should be presented; and I should not now have presumed to anticipate other gentlemen who seem disposed to address you, but for some extraordinary observations which have just been uttered, and which in my opinion demand immediate animadversion.

The gentleman from Tennessee, who has this moment resumed his seat, (Mr. GRUNDY,) seems a little sore that his doctrine of Moral Treason, which he promulgated at the last session, should have been so vehemently oppugned by the persons for whose benefit he had compiled it. I am not of the number of those, Mr. Chairman, who have deemed this doctrine worthy of examination. As originally understood, it was so preposterous and so repugnant to the principles of our Constitution, that every intelligent freeman found its refutation in the consciousness of his own liberty. By subsequent explanations and definitions it has been so attenuated and subtilized, that what was never very distinct, now almost eludes perception. According to the last attempt at exposition, if it have any meaning, it would seem to embrace systematic efforts to persuade capitalists not to lend money, and the unthinking youth not to enlist as soldiers to carry on the war against Canada. His denunciations of such a system—of the existence of which I know nothing; and which, if it exist, is innocent or criminal according to the motives from which it springs—pass by me altogether unheeded. But his unfounded imputations upon some of the best men and truest patriots of the country, and his attempt to support his doctrine by their example, ought to be repelled, and a very short notice will suffice for that purpose.

The gentleman has referred to the act of 14th

H. OF R.

The Loan Bill.

FEBRUARY, 1814.

July, 1798, the much misrepresented and abused Sedition law. It is difficult for me to express my astonishment at the construction which he affixes to the first section of this act. Need we wonder at any error, however gross, at any prejudice, however irrational, prevailing in respect to party measures and party opinions, when we find a professional gentleman assigning to a law a meaning which, but for what we have heard, would have been pronounced impossible on the part of any man of ordinary good sense? The first section of this law declares, that if any persons shall conspire together with intent to oppose any measures of the Government of the United States, and in pursuance of such intent shall counsel, or attempt to procure insurrections, riots, &c., they shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment. Can it be necessary to ask what was meant in this law by the expression "with intent to oppose any measures of the Government?" To oppose, in its plain original sense, necessarily implies physical resistance—the exercise of force. It is metaphorically used, indeed, to signify dissuasion, as the word to combat is applied to denote a controversy in argument; and a law prohibiting single combats might as well be interpreted to forbid controversies in discourse, as a law prohibiting opposition to the measures of Government construed to interdict the expression of honest opinions that may retard their operations. But the act is still more explicit. To constitute crime it requires not only that the persons should combine "with intent to oppose the measures of Government," but that in pursuance of such intent they should proceed to "counsel or attempt to procure insurrections, riots," &c. The design of the act is unequivocal—it is to check and punish incipient treason before it has manifested itself in actual war against the nation. It was altogether unnecessary, if there had been any common law applicable in the courts of the United States; for in every Government under Heaven the acts which it describes are made punishable. A doubt whether the common law had a federal existence alone occasioned the passing of the law. Yet we are gravely asked, if, in the year 1798, men had combined together to dissuade persons from lending money to the Government, or from enlisting in the army, whether they could not have been punished under this law? No, sir—no, sir. There was not a prosecuting officer in the United States so ignorant of his duty as to dare to bring forward an indictment upon such a pretext.

To the next section of this abused act the gentleman has given an interpretation as destitute of plausibility even as his exposition of the first section. To find a warrant for his doctrine of moral treason, or to lessen its odium by casting reproach on others, the gentleman has charged that this section subjected to indictment and punishment the publication of scandalous and malicious writings against the Government, although they might be true—and that had it not been for the third section of the act, which his predecessor moved in the House of Representatives after the bill had passed the Senate, the truth would have afforded no defence on an indictment for a libel against the Government. Sir, this position is utterly untenable—no part of it is true. The gentleman must be presumed to know, and ought to recollect, that when an offence is created by statute, every word of the description of the offence is material and essential. What are the words describing the offence? "If any person shall write, print, or publish, any false, scandalous, and malicious writing against the Government, &c." It is a necessary part of the offence that the writing should be false. If it be not false, then the crime has not been committed, the law has not been broken, and punishment cannot be inflicted. Why, then, I may be asked, was the third section, moved by the gentleman's predecessor, inserted in the law? The answer is, to avoid all cavil, all real or pretended doubt, all foundation for the charge that would have been made had it been rejected. It might have been pretended that on an indictment for libel at common law the truth or falsehood of the charge was not a matter of inquiry before the jury, so, on an indictment for libel under this act, notwithstanding its plain words, the falsehood of the publication was not material to constitute the offence; and had the proposed amendment been rejected, from the specimen we have this day had of the course of legal thinking of one of the bar of Tennessee, there is a moral certainty that the law would have been there stigmatized as designed to prohibit the publication of truth. To adopt the amendment removed all pretext for such misrepresentation. It was accordingly incorporated into the law; and to show that it was not introductory of any new principle, it was expressed as declaratory to the preceding section, "And be it enacted and declared, that it shall be lawful for the defendant, on trial, to give in evidence, in his defence, the truth of the matter charged as a libel." No, sir, the idea of punishing truth when published against the officers of the Government was reserved until more recent times—until the abused Sedition law had expired, and the champions of a free press were safely fixed in power. Surely the gentleman has not been so inattentive to the course of public proceedings as never to have heard of the case of Harry Crosswell. He, for an alleged libel on Mr. Jefferson, was indicted at common law, not under the horrible Sedition act; he was not permitted to prove the truth of his publication, and was thus convicted!

I have done, sir, with the gentleman from Tennessee, his moral treason, and his exposition of the Sedition law; and will endeavor to call your attention to subjects not altogether so foreign from the bill upon the table. The object of the bill is to authorize a loan to the Government of the United States. The precise proposition before you is to declare what sum shall be borrowed; "twenty-five millions of dollars." Enormous as is the addition which is thus proposed to be made to our debts, could it be shown to be necessary to accomplish any purpose demanded by the honor and welfare of the country, it assuredly would meet with no opposition from me. Is a loan wanted, or revenue required to enable the Government to pay off its just engagements? To give security and protection to any part of our territory, or any portion of our citizens? To afford to our gallant Navy (that precious relic of better days) such encouragement and extension as may enable it more effectually to vindicate our rights on the element where they have been assailed? My voice and assistance shall be cheerfully rendered to obtain them. Let the present proposition be withdrawn, and let it be moved to fill the blank with such sum as shall be adequate to supply any deficiency of the revenue wanted for these purposes, and I will second the motion. Nay, sir, should the present proposition be rejected, (for while it is pending a smaller sum cannot be moved,) and none of those who are most conversant with the state of our finances should come forward with a further proposition, I will myself undertake to move the sum which shall appear competent to effect all these objects. But, sir, this enormous sum is wanted not for these purposes; it is avowedly not necessary, except to carry on the scheme of invasion and conquest against the Canadas. To this scheme I have never been a friend; but to its prosecution now, I have invincible objections, founded on considerations of justice, humanity, and national policy. These objections I wish to explain and enforce, and thus avail myself of an opportunity of discussing some of the most interesting topics which grow out of the alarming state of the nation. I fear that all I can do will avail nothing; but, sir, representing a respectable portion of the American people, who are suffering with peculiar severity from the pressure of this unfortunate and mismanaged war; who, with me, believe no good is to grow out of it, and who apprehend, from its continuance, evils, compared with which all they have yet suffered are but trifles light as air; I should be unfaithful to them and myself if I did not interpose my best efforts to arrest the downhill career of ruin. In performing this duty, I shall certainly say the things I do think. Endeavoring to use such language only as is consistent with self-respect and decency towards those who differ from me in opinion, I mean freely to exercise the right which belongs to my station.

The Loan Bill.

Right! did I say, sir? The expression is inaccurate; once indeed there did exist in this House the right of free discussion. It was once deemed a Constitutional privilege for every member to bring forward any proposition he deemed beneficial to the country, and support it by whatever arguments he could adduce; to offer amendments to the propositions of others, so as to render them, in his judgment, more unexceptionable; and to state the reasons of his dissent from any measure on which he was called to vote, and endeavor to impress his opinion on others. No doubt a vast portion of the good people of this Republic yet believe that such is the course of proceedings here. Little do they dream of the complicated machinery, by means of which every privilege, except that of thinking, is made to depend on the pleasure of the courtesy, the whim of the majority. By certain interpolations into our practice, but which nowhere show their hideous first front in our written code, the system of suppressing the liberty of speech is brought to a degree of perfection that almost astonishes its authors. A gentleman wishes to bring forward an original proposition; he must first state it, and obtain permission from a majority of the House to let it be considered, before he can show the propriety of adopting it, or ask even for a decision upon it. Thus is annihilated the right of originating a proposition. But a proposition is originated by others, it is passed through the ordeal of consideration, and he is desirous of amending its defects, or of exposing its impropriety. This is, perhaps, deemed inconvenient by the majority. It may give them trouble, or bring forward a discussion which they do not wish the people to hear, or detain them too long from their dinners. A new species of legerdemain is resorted to. The previous question, utterly perverted from its original and legitimate use, is demanded; the demand is supported by a majority. In an instant all the proposed amendments disappear; every tongue is so fettered that it can utter but ay or no, and the proposition becomes a law without deliberation, without correction, and without debate. And this process is called legislation! And the Hall in which these goodly doings are transacted is sometimes termed the Temple of Liberty! Sir, this procedure must be corrected, or freedom is rejected from her citadel, and wounded in her very vitals. Inconveniences also result to the majority from the tyrannical exercise of power, sufficient perhaps to counterbalance all the benefits which can be derived from it. Gentlemen often complain that the minority do not pursue the practice which is adopted by minorities elsewhere. In England, say they, the Opposition address the House and the nation only on the great fundamental questions involving disputed principles, and do not hang on the skirts of every bill, fighting the Ministry, through all the details of their measures. Why is not the same course pursued here? The answer is obvious. Here the minority are not allowed to bring forward these great fundamental questions; they have no opportunity of showing their views, except such as may be casually afforded by some measure of the majority, on which they are good natured enough to allow debate. Unless they avail themselves of such a bill in every stage of it, as a peg on which to hang their observations, they must be utterly mute. Thus happens, too, that there is frequently not any discernable connexion between the topics discussed, and the subject supposed to be under debate. Perhaps the very course I am pursuing is an apt illustration of these facts. Some weeks since I submitted to the House a resolution which I thought eminently deserving of attention; a resolution "that pending our negotiation with Great Britain, it is inexpedient to prosecute a war of invasion and conquest of the Canadas." This resolution could not be discussed, for the House would not vouchsafe to it a consideration. But, as on the proposition now before you, debate is indulged; and has assumed a latitude that seems to permit everything connected with the war, I am willing to embrace the occasion to support my favorite proposition, to which a regular hearing has been refused. Grateful even for this opportunity, I acknowledge the courtesy which has been shown me by the majority; sorely as I feel the degradation of indirectly using as a favor what, as a freeman and the Representative of freemen, I ought openly to enjoy as a right.

It is very far from my design to enter into a particular inquiry as to the origin of this war, or as to its causes, whether technical or real. Such an inquiry would present a theme too important and too extensive to be taken up as collateral or subsidiary to some other investigation. At the present moment too it is not so essential to know how this war has been produced as it is to ascertain how it may be speedily and fairly brought to a close. So far only as a knowledge of the origin and causes of this war may be useful in producing this result, is it my purpose now to consider them.

An honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) claims for this war the character of defensive. He has properly remarked that a war defensive in its origin may be offensive in its operations, and, of consequence, that its character is not defined by the nature of these operations. But, sir, he is incorrect in supposing that its character is to be tested by the motive which occasioned its institution. War is offensive or defensive, simply as it is instituted by or against a nation. It is an appeal to force to decide controversies between sovereigns who admit of no other tribunal to determine their rights. There is a perfect analogy in this respect between nations at war and individuals litigating in a court of justice. He who commences the process is the actor. He who is summoned to the controversy has the defensive part; and it is, in this view, immediately immaterial whether the motive to litigation be found in the honest desire to claim what is due, or in the malignant wish to oppress and defraud. For the correctness of these ideas, I rely not on my own judgment. This ought not, without hesitation, to be opposed to that of the honorable gentleman who, independently of his personal claims to attention as Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations, must be presumed to be particularly conversant with all the questions connected with national law. Any person who has a curiosity to test these sentiments by the authority of jurists will find them explicitly recognised by Burlamaqui, vol. 2, part iv., chap. iii., sec. v.; and by Vattel, book iii., chap. iii., secs. xxxv., xxxvii.

Nor let it be deemed, sir, of no importance whether this war be called defensive or offensive. It is always of moment that things should be called by their right names. Many of the vices and most of the errors of men arise from the misapplication of terms. The reasoner who uses words to convey a meaning variant from their received signification, will probably occasion error, however precise his definitions. In spite of definitions, the hearer appropriates to his expressions the sense which usage has associated, and a confusion of ideas fatal to truth is the unavoidable consequence. Many phrases, too, besides their primary meaning, convey a secondary sense of commendation or blame. By an artful use of those, the sophist is enabled to convert the honest prejudices of man, the guards of his security, into the instruments of his deception. The sagacious Mirabeau, than whom none better understood the arts which render the human understanding and passions subservient to the tyranny of fraud; he who so long "rode on the whirlwind, and directed the storm" of the most furious of revolutions, compressed the elements of his science into one sententious maxim, "words are things." But the distinction between offensive and defensive war has peculiar claims upon our recollection. So fatal is war to the best interests of the human family that a tremendous responsibility always rests upon the nation that commences it. This responsibility attaches through all its stages, and is awfully increased into certain guilt by the neglect of any fair opportunity to restore the relations of peace. Besides, the consideration that the war was offensive in its origin—that consideration which emphatically creates the obligation to terminate its horrors as speedily as justice will permit—will frequently be found to present the greatest obstacles to efforts at reconciliation.

The advocates for this war, vying with each other in zeal for its justification and continuance, do not precisely agree in opinion, as to its causes, or as to the objects for which it is to be prosecuted. The gentleman from Pennsylvania who presides over your Judiciary Committee (Mr. INGERSOLL,) in an elaborate argument, seems desirous to prove (I am not certain which) either that the war is a consequence of the violation on the part of Great Britain of his favorite principle, "free ships make free goods," or is to result in the establishment of this principle. This comprehensive dogma the gentleman contends to be a part of the original unadulterated code of national law, consecrated by the Treaty of Utrecht, strenuously asserted by Britain herself, in her dispute with Spain, in the year 1737, recognised in her commercial treaty with France, in 1786, and vitally essential to our maritime interests. The gentleman from Virginia, whom I yesterday heard with much pleasure, (Mr. JACKSON,) dissents from his political friend, and declares that this maxim has never been asserted by our Government, under any Administration, as founded on the common law of nations. Although the gentleman from Virginia is, in this respect, unquestionably correct, yet it is not certain that the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee is altogether erroneous in attributing to the Administration an expectation of establishing by this war some such theory. That the neutral flag shall protect all from capture, is a very convenient doctrine for a nation frequently at war with an adversary of decidedly superior maritime strength. France, who, with occasional short intervals, has been for centuries at war with England, has very naturally wished to incorporate this doctrine into the law of nations. Her imperial master has adopted it as one of the elementary principles of his new maritime code, which he solemnly promulgated in his Decree of Berlin, of November, 1806, and in support of which he has used every violence and stratagem to array the nations of the world into one great maritime confederacy. At least, as early as the infamous Turreau's letter of June, 1809, the Executive of this country was perfectly apprized of the existence of such a confederacy, of the purposes which it was to uphold, and of the determination of France to bribe or compel our accession to it. The decree of the great protector of the confederacy, of the date of April, 1811, though probably not issued till May, 1812, announced in language sufficiently distinct that this claim has been so far complied with on our part as to exempt us from the further application of the penalties of disobedience. And our declaration of war against the sole recusant of this imperial theory was proclaimed by Napoleon to his Senate as a spirited and generous exertion to vindicate the new religion of the flag, which, like the superstition of the sanctuary, was to protect every fraud and shelter every crime. Extravagant, therefore, as the positions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania may be thought by the far greater part of this Committee, they may have more countenance from the Administration than is generally suspected, and, on this account, may deserve a rapid and transient examination. The assertion that, by the general law of nations, the character of the vessel gives a character to the goods is unequivocally denied. The actual reverse of the assertion is maintained by jurists generally with a harmony that forbids doubt.

The Loan Bill.

Instead of detailing these opinions separately permit me to give the language of one who wished well to the gentleman's doctrine, who had often carefully explored the musty volumes of national law, and who was never apt to carry his admissions beyond the line which candor prescribed. Mr. Jefferson, in his letter to Genet, of 24th July, 1793, expresses himself thus: "I believe it cannot be doubted but that, by the general law of nations, the goods of a friend found in the vessel of an enemy are free, and the goods of an enemy found in the vessel of a friend are lawful prize. It is true that sundry nations, desirous of avoiding the inconveniences of having their vessels stopped at sea, ransacked, carried into port, and detained under pretence of having enemy's goods on board, have, in many instances, introduced another principle between them, that enemy bottoms shall make enemy goods, and that friendly bottoms shall make friendly goods—a principle much less embarrassing to commerce, and equal to all parties in point of gain or loss—but this is altogether the effect of a particular treaty, controlling in special cases the general principles of the law of nations, and therefore taking effect between such nations only as have agreed to control it." If the gentleman will examine the treaties to which he has adverted, the commercial treaty of Utrecht, between England and France, (which, by the by, the House of Commons refused to sanction,) and the subsequent commercial treaty of Mr. Pitt, in 1786, he will find the language on this head unequivocal. The arrangement is declared to be made with a view to prevent the embarrassments and dissensions that would arise without such an arrangement; or, in other words, from the application of the principles of the common law of nations. Nor is it at all strange that Britain, in a commercial treaty, from which she expected to derive immense advantages, should acquiesce in such an arrangement as between her and France. For it is obvious that no practical effect could result from it, except when one was at peace and the other at war. And such a state of things has so rarely happened that its occurrence might be numbered among political impossibilities.

The "no search" clamor in England of 1737, which the gentlemen have produced the Parliamentary debates to prove, had about as much to do with the belligerent right to capture enemy's property conveyed in neutral ships, as the "no search" cry made about thirty years afterwards in the case of John Wilkes and general warrants. The dispute of 1737, with Spain, grew out of a municipal claim asserted by that Government, and of the rigorous practice of their guarda costas to search British vessels hovering on the coasts of the Spanish colonies for prohibited articles designed to be smuggled into them. A claim said to be repugnant to the Treaty of Seville, and certainly very inconvenient to the illicit trade between Jamaica and the Spanish main; and a practice enforced with all that barbarity which usually characterizes the minions of custom-house and revenue tyrants. How far the establishment of the gentleman's project would be beneficial to this country is perhaps not so clear. At a time when we had no capital to afford employment to our navigation, it certainly would have been advantageous. But since that period has passed away, the most enlightened commercial men will tell you they wish for no such innovation. Its effect would be to give us, when neutrals, the benefit of being among the carriers of the commodities of the weaker maritime belligerent for freight. But the effect of the old principle is to give us the profit which results, not merely from the carriage, but the purchase and resales of these commodities, with almost a monopoly in either market.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania has assigned another cause for the war, in which he has obtained the concurrence of several of his friends—the instigation by the British Government of Indian wars. Although, sir, this theme of popular declamation has almost become trite—although the tomahawk and the scalping knife have been so often brandished with rhetorical ambidexterity, that their exhibition almost ceases to excite interest—yet, far be it from me to think or speak lightly of the cruelties of savage warfare, or to conceal my utter abhorrence and detestation of them. But it is a different, very different question, whether the Canadians have armed the Indians to join in defence against a common invader, or had, previously to war, instigated them to hostilities against us. This last charge I do not believe—no evidence has been given to warrant it that I have yet heard. Over the affair of Tippecanoe, the commencement of Indian war, there hovers a mystery which ought to be dissipated, but which the Government will not dispel. I have sought, honestly sought, for information. Of official there is little or none. From private sources not likely, in this respect, to mislead, (for they are friendly to this war, and connected with the Western interest and feeling,) I learn that the great cause of Indian hostilities is to be found where experience and history would prompt us to look for it—is to be found in our cupidity for their lands, and their jealousy and distrust of our superior intelligence and force. Indian wars have been, until a few years back, almost uninterrupted in this country, both before and since the Revolution. They need no other instigators than are to be found in the inconsistent views, interests, claims, passions, and habits, of neighboring, yet distinct races of people. Sir, General Harrison's treaty of November, 1809, was the mine of the great Indian explosion. The Indians complained, I know not how justly, that in that treaty they were cheated of lands which the parties to it had no right to convey, and never meant to convey. There are gentlemen in this Legislature who know that Tecumseh immediately avowed his fixed purpose to vindicate by force and by union of the red men the rights of his tribe and the menaced independence of the whole race. And we all know (the fact is on record) that shortly after this treaty the British Governor General of Canada caused it to be officially communicated to the Government of the United States that the Indians were meditating hostile designs. Sir, the holy command, "thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor," applies even to an enemy. I will not sanction this charge without evidence, nor against evidence, lest I violate this high injunction. I am not a disciple of that new moral school which would construe this divine prohibition, as the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. GRUNDY) has expounded the commandment, "thou shalt not kill," as a "mere municipal regulation, applying solely to the Jews."

But this war, say its advocates, nearly one and all, was declared to protect our seamen against impressment—in fashionable phrase, for "sailors' rights." There is no doubt, sir, that the conflicting claims of the two countries on the subject of seamen, and the occasional abuse of the practice of search for British seamen on board of American merchantmen, had excited serious dissatisfaction in America—yet I hazard nothing by the assertion, that the question of seamen was not a cause of this war. I remember full well the characteristic special pleading of the gentleman from Tennessee on this subject, at the last session, "that he really could not tell whether, if the Orders in Council had been repealed, we should have gone to war about seamen or not;" but, sir, I consider this as little more or less than adherence to a cautious form, as a protestando, by way of excluding a conclusion, or in the nature of the commencement of an answer to a bill in chancery, in which the defendant takes care to save to himself, now and at all times hereafter, all and all manner of benefit of exception to the errors that may be discovered in complainant's allegations. I am aware, too, of the very conspicuous blazon which is given to our sailors' wrongs in the President's war Message, and in the manifesto of the Committee of Foreign Relations. But this proves no more than that, when war was determined on, it was deemed advisable to make out as strong a case as possible, either to excite the sympathy of the world, or to rouse the indignation of our own citizens. The impressment of our seamen was grouped in the picture with the dearly bought Henry-plot, the at least dubious excitement of Indian hostilities, and the adjusted controversy about constructive blockades.

No, sir, the question of seamen was not a cause of this war. More than five years had passed over since an arrangement on this question, perfectly satisfactory to our Ministers, had been made with Great Britain, but it pleased not the President, and was rejected. Yet, during the whole period that afterwards elapsed, until the declaration of war, no second effort was made to adjust this cause of controversy. From December, 1807, with very short intervals, we waged against Britain a commercial war to coerce her into an observance of the rights we claimed at her hands. In every step of this system, whether embargo, non-intercourse, or non-importation, we avowed the grounds of this contest, and the condition on which it should terminate—the Orders in Council and their repeal. In April, 1809, the famous arrangement with Erskine was made, hailed by the well meaning as a second treaty of amity between the two countries; yet it contained nothing upon the question of seamen. In the President's communication to Congress, at the commencement of the war-session, November, 1811, enumerating, in no light tone, our controversies with Great Britain, and recommending preparations for war, the impressment of seamen was not remembered. The Secretary of State was earnestly engaged in a correspondence with the British Minister, Foster, at the seat of Government, until the declaration of war; nay, until after it had passed the House of Representatives. The object of the correspondence avowedly was, to bring our differences to an amicable close. But, in this correspondence, the question of impressment finds no place, except incidentally, not as a substantive topic of discussion. And, in the official communication from our Government to our Minister in Russia, stating the fact of a war declared against Great Britain, and alleging its justification, with a view to be communicated to the Russian Government, [Mr. Monroe's letter to J. Q. Adams, of July, 1812,] his justification is rested solely on the British Orders in Council. These, then, were emphatically and exclusively the cause of war. And had it not been for very many weighty considerations to be found in the state of the world, in the nature of the war in Europe, out of which proceeded this violation of neutral rights; in the conduct of the other mighty belligerent, her injuries, menaces, and intrigues, and in the peculiar condition of this country, actually growing into unexampled prosperity under the very state of things of which we complained; had it not been for these, and considerations like these, that, trumpet-tongued, warned us from the gulf into which we were about to plunge, the Orders in Council would have justified the resort to war. At all events, they formed what might be termed a sufficient technical cause of hostilities, much better than often figures, with conspicuous effect, in the manifestoes of Princes, under the specious names of justice, independence, and violated rights. But, sir, scarcely had the fatal step been taken, and the destinies of our nation risked on the fortune of the sword, when the obnoxious orders were revoked. the causes of war removed, and an honorable opportunity afforded of returning to the happy state of peace, commerce, and successful enterprise. How grateful must not the Executive of a country, whose policy was fundamentally pacific, how grateful must it not have been for this happy rescue from the horrors of war! How rejoiced that all had been effected, without a struggle, which it was the object to obtain by a bloody and precarious contest! Exulting to show, that when it unsheathed the sword, not passion but duty urged the reluctant deed, surely it hastened to return the unstained weapon to the scabbard, and extend the blessed olive branch of peace. Was it so? Sir, I never can think of the conduct of the Executive upon this occasion, without mingled feelings of surprise, regret, and anger. It cannot be accounted for but by an infatuation the most profound; an infatuation which is not yet dissipated, and which should fill every breast with apprehensions of that dreadful result, which, in the wisdom of Providence, is preceded by the "darkened counsels" of rulers.

But it is entirely a mistake, says the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The Orders in Council never were revoked; they were, indeed, withdrawn, but under a declaration asserting the right to re-enact them, should the violence of France, acquiesced in by America, renew the necessity for them. Will the Administration, sir, bring forward this excuse? Will they take this ground? No, sir, they cannot; they dare not. The President has told the nation, that the revocation of the orders was substantially satisfactory; in his peculiar phraseology: "The repeal of the Orders in Council was susceptible of explanations meeting the just views of this Government." How could he do otherwise after his proclamation of the 2d November, 1810, declaring the French edicts so revoked as to cease to be injurious to our rights; a proclamation founded solely on the letter of the Duke de Cadore, of the 5th August, promising a revocation? Does the gentleman recollect the celebrated "Bien entendu," or proviso annexed to this letter: "Provided, that in consequence of this declaration, the British Government shall revoke their Orders in Council, and renounce their new principles of blockade, or America shall cause her rights to be respected, conformably to the act which you have communicated?" Does the gentleman remember the tortuous and labored efforts of Mr. Secretary Monroe to explain this proviso into a condition subsequent? To prove that it was designed only to exert the right of France to re-enact these decrees if Great Britain should persist in her orders, and we forbear from resisting them? Such a condition, subsequently annexed to a promised revocation of the French decrees, had no effect to impair its force; but the same, annexed in terms to the actual revocation of the British orders, renders it entirely null! No, sir, the Executive cannot take this ground; his direct friends will not take it for him. In the emphatic language of the eloquent Junius, this would indeed "resemble the termagant chastity of a prude, who prosecutes one lover for a rape, while she solicits the lewd embraces of another."

But can it be urged, say the gentlemen, that the revocation of the Orders in Council removed all our causes of complaint, and left us nothing more to demand of the enemy? No, sir, this is not urged. But it is contended that, as the revocation of the Orders in Council removed the cause of war, hostilities should instantly have been suspended, and a fair, manly effort made to settle by negotiation all unadjusted differences which had not caused the war. A question of much importance and delicacy remained to be settled in relation to the search for British seamen on board our merchant vessels, and the occasional impressment of Americans. Under every Administration of our country this question had excited great interest, and been attended with much difficulty. Of late, indeed, it had, in some degree, lost its interest, and partly because of the comparative rare occurrence of the practice. The restrictive anti-commercial system had expelled native and foreign seamen in vast numbers from our country, and almost removed the temptations to an exercise of what the British claimed as a maritime right. For five years before the war the dispute had in fact slept. Subjects more important pressed themselves on our notice, and while these pressed, that was postponed as a matter for future arrangement. But out of these new subjects a controversy arose which issued in war. It had scarcely been declared before the matter in controversy was arranged to our satisfaction by the voluntary act of the enemy. What was our plain, obvious course; the course of duty and of policy? Sheathe the sword until it is ascertained whether the dispute which had been laid aside for future arrangement, and which, in consequence of the adjustment of more pressing concerns, is now properly presented to notice, can or cannot be amicably settled. Even tyrants pronounce war the "ultima ratio regum," the last resort of Princes. Nothing can justify the exercise of force but the inability to obtain right by other means. You had not supposed your just claims on the subject of seamen unattainable by negotiation, or you would not have reserved them for years as a subject for negotiation; and if they be thus attainable, how will ye answer to God and the country for the blood and treasure uselessly, criminally expended? This mode of thinking, sir, seems to me very straight, and quite in accordance with the good old notions of practical morality. Besides, it is the incumbent duty of him who seeks justice, first to render it. Whatever our claims on Great Britain might have been in relation to seamen, she was not without her claims on us. At a time when her floating bulwarks were her sole safeguard against slavery, she could not view, without alarm and resentment, the warriors who should have manned those bulwarks, pursuing a more gainful occupation in American vessels. Our merchant ships were crowded with British seamen; most of them deserters from their ships of war, and all furnished with fraudulent protections to prove them American. To us they were not necessary; they ate the bread and bid down the wages of native seamen, whom it was our first duty to foster and encourage. To their own country they were necessary, essentially necessary. They were wanted for her defence in a moment of unprecedented peril. Ought we not, then, while seeking to protect our own seamen from forced British service, to have removed from her seamen the temptation to desert their country and to supplant ours at home? Why need I ask the question? Your seamen's bill, as it is called, enacted into a law since the war, is an acknowledgment that this ought to have been done. However deceptive some of its provisions may appear, its very principle is to restore to Great Britain her seamen, and save our own from her service. Unless you believed this principle right, it was the meanest of degradations, at such a time, to pass such a law; and if it was right, then you had justice to render, as well as to seek. Had you pursued this plain path of right; had you suspended hostilities, you would have consulted also the true policy of your country. An unconditional proposition for an armistice, upon the revocation of the orders, or an unconditional acceptance of the offer for an armistice, would have passed for magnanimity. The disgraces which have since foully tainted our military character were not then anticipated. The world would have believed, your enemy would have believed, that you suspended your career of conquest because the war had owed its origin not to ambition, but to duty; because you sought not territory, but justice; because you preferred an honest peace to the most splendid victory. With the reputation of having commanded, by your attitude of armor, a repeal of the offensive orders, you would have evinced a moderation which must have secured the most beneficial arrangements on the question of seamen.

But, sir, this was not done. No armistice could obtain the approbation of the Executive, unless it was preceded by an abandonment, formal or informal, of the British claim to search for their seamen on board our merchant vessels. As an evidence of this abandonment, the exercise of the claim must, by stipulation, be suspended during the armistice, and this suspension was to be the price of its purchase. Even without an armistice, no "arrangement" was to be deemed a fit subject for negotiation which should not be predicated on "the basis" of an exclusion from our vessels, by our laws, of their seamen, and an absolute prohibition of search by their officers. This, sir, was taking very lofty ground; but, at that moment, the Canada fever raged high, and the delirium of foreign conquest was at its acme. In a few weeks the American flag was to wave triumphant on the ramparts of Quebec. The proposition for an armistice from the Governor of Canada was utterly inadmissible. In the language of our Secretary of State, it wanted reciprocity: "The proposition is not reciprocal, because it restrains the United States from acting where their power is greatest, and leaves Great Britain at liberty, and gives her time to augment her forces in our neighborhood."

Mr. Russell, said Mr. G., did condescend to offer an armistice to the enemy, upon the condition of yielding, as preliminary, even a suspension of arms, all that could be extorted by the most triumphant war. But even he, in his pacific proposition, could not refrain from exulting at the glorious conquests that would inevitably be made if submission was refused or delayed.

"Your Lordship is aware of the difficulties with which a prosecution of the war, even for a short period, must necessarily embarrass all future attempts at accommodation. Passions exasperated by injuries; alliances, or conquests on terms which forbid their abandonment, will inevitably hereafter embitter and protract a contest which might now be so easily and happily terminated."

I cannot forbear, sir, from one remark at the "awful squinting" in this letter at an alliance with France. Gentlemen are sensitive when the possibility of such a connexion is intimated. The very suspicion of such a design in the Cabinet is viewed as a calumny. Here the accredited agent of the American Executive proclaims such a connexion, such an alliance, as inevitable; proclaims it in an official communication to the public enemy. The declaration is laid before Congress and the people by the President, unaccompanied by any disavowal. The Minister is not censured. For his very conduct in this employment he is raised to the highest grade of foreign Ministers; and in spite of the reluctance of the Senate to confirm his nomination, he is pressed upon them by the President until their assent to his appointment is extorted. I dwell not upon this topic, for I confess to you the honest fears which once congealed my heart are now dissipated. The sun of national freedom has burst forth from behind the portentous eclipse, that, "with fear of change," had perplexed the darkened world. Napoleon, no longer invincible: stripped of the false glare which splendid crime threw around his character, is no longer eulogised as "supereminent," but denounced by the champions of the Administration as an "usurper." No one courts the friendship of a fallen tyrant!

It is not for me to say in what manner the dispute about seamen is to be settled. On this subject I have no hesitation, however, in giving my general sentiments. It is the duty of this Government to protect its seamen (I mean its native seamen) from the forced service of any and every Power on earth, so far as the strength of the country can obtain for them protection. True it is, that in my opinion the number of impressed Americans bears no reasonable proportion to the number alleged. I live in a State which, though it carries on not an extensive foreign commerce, has many native seamen. At the moment of the declaration of war, the inquiry was made whether a single native seaman of North Carolina was then detained by British impressment. I could hear of none. I know that during our restrictive system many of our sailors entered voluntarily into the British service, and, when tired of it, complained that they had been impressed—instances have actually occurred at Plymouth and at London, of men surrendered as impressed Americans, who afterwards boasted that they had cheated their King. In the battle, I think of the President and the Little Belt, a neighbor of mine now an industrious farmer noticed in the number of the slain one of his own name. He exclaimed, there goes one of my protections. On being asked for an explanation he remarked, that in his wild days, when he followed the sea, it was an ordinary mode of procuring a little spending money to get a protection from a notary for a dollar, and sell it to the first foreigner whom it at all fitted for fifteen or twenty. The protected alien assumed, of course, the American name, and, if impressed, claimed to be liberated under it. The examinations which have been had before the committee of the Massachusetts Legislature, and especially that of William Gray, confirm the belief that the number of impressed Americans has been exaggerated infinitely beyond the truth. But their number has been large enough to render the grievance a serious one; and, be they more or less, the right to the protection of their country is sacred, and must be regarded. The Government would forfeit its claims to the respect and affection of its citizens, if it omitted any rational means to secure the rights of American seamen from actual violation. Seek to obtain this security by practical means. If you cannot, by substitute, obtain an abandonment of the right or practice to search our vessels, regulate it so as to prevent its abuse—waiving for the present, not relinquishing, your objections to the right. Do all that can fairly be asked of you to supersede the necessity of the practice. When this is done, and you should nevertheless fail—when war is rendered necessary to obtain a practical and reasonable security for American seamen, against the abuses of impressment, then, sir, that war is just. Whoever may question its expediency, none who admit that wars may ever be justly waged can feel any conscientious scruples in yielding it support. This, sir, is no late opinion of mine. It has been long and publicly avowed—not indeed as a pledge to my constituents, as my friend and colleague (Mr. MURFREE) has remarked—we do not deal in pledges—but because it is my habit to be frank when no duty commands concealment. Nor is it strange that I should feel attached to the rights of American sailors. I am a native of the seaboard. Many of the playmates of my infancy have become the adventurous ploughmen of the deep. Seafaring men are among my strongest personal and political friends. And for their true interests, their fair rights, I claim to feel a concern as sincere, and a zeal as fervent as can be boasted by any gentleman from the interior, or from beyond the mountains, who has heard of them but knows them not.

Has the prosecution of your scheme of invasion and conquest against the Canadas a tendency to secure these rights and advance these interests? This, sir, is a momentous question, on which it is the duty of every man in authority to reflect dispassionately, and with a fixed purpose to attain the truth. Unless this tendency be manifest, and morally certain, every motive which can be addressed to an honest heart and intelligent mind forbids its prosecution at the present moment. Make a fair comparison of its certain or probable ills with its possible gains, and then pronounce the sentence which justice, humanity, and policy demand; and a suffering nation will bless your decision.

It is not my design to consider the immense expenditure which this scheme has cost, and which a continuance of it will cost to this country.* Well worthy is this topic of consideration, especially at a moment when industry is without encouragement, and external revenue is utterly destroyed. But it has been examined with great ability by gentlemen who have preceded me, especially by the gentlemen from Connecticut and Virginia, (Mr. PITKIN and Mr. SHEFFEY,) and contenting myself with an earnest request, that their remarks be not forgotten, and that in your zeal for conquest you do not beggar your people, I hasten to present other views which have not been so fully unfolded.

There is something in the character of a war made upon the people of a country to force them to abandon a Government which they cherish, and to become the subjects or associates of their invaders, which necessarily involves calamities beyond those incident to ordinary wars. Among us some remain who remember the horrors of the invasion of the Revolution—"and others of us have hung with reverence on the lips of narrative old age as it related the interesting tale." Such a war is not between those only who seek for renown in military achievements, or the more humble mercenaries "whose business 'tis to die." It breaks in upon all the charities of domestic life, and interrupts all the pursuits of industry. The peasant quits his plough, and the mechanic is hurried from his shop to commence without apprenticeship the exercise of the trade of death. The irregularity of the resistance which is opposed to the invader, its occasional obstinacy and occasional intermission, provoking every bad passion of his soldiery, is the excuse for plunder, lust, and cruelty. These atrocities exasperate the sufferers to revenge; and every weapon which anger can supply, and every device which ingenious hatred can conceive is used to inflict vengeance on the detested foe. There is yet a more horrible war than this. As there is no anger so deadly as the anger of a friend, there is no war so ferocious as that which is waged between men of the same blood, and formerly connected by the closest ties of affection. The pen of the historian confesses its inability to describe, the fervid fancy of the poet cannot realize, the horrors of a civil war. This invasion of Canada involves the miseries of both these species of war. You carry fire and sword amongst a people who are "united against you (say your Generals) to a man"—amongst a people who, happy in themselves, and satisfied with their condition, view you not as coming to emancipate them from thralldom, but to reduce them to a foreign yoke. A people long and intimately connected with the bordering inhabitants of our country by commercial intercourse, by the ties of hospitality, by bonds of affinity and blood—a people, as to every social and individual purpose, long identified with your own. It must be that such a war will rouse a spirit of sanguinary ferocity, that will overleap every holy barrier of nature and venerable usage of civilization. Where will you find an authenticated instance of this ferocity, that more instantaneously compels the shuddering abhorrence of the heart, than the fact asserted by my eloquent friend from New Hampshire, (Mr. WEBSTER.) "The bayonet of the brother has been actually opposed to the breast of the brother." Merciful Heaven! That those who have been rocked in the same cradle by the same maternal hand—who have imbibed the first genial nourishment of infant existence from the same blessed source, should be forced to contend in impious strife for the destruction of that being derived from their common parent! It should not be so! Every feeling of our nature cries aloud against it!

* It was well remarked by Mr. Pearson, that the Constitutional rule of ascertaining the contribution of each individual to the satisfaction of the public debt, was to be collected from the system of direct taxes. Supposing the debt which will have been created by the Canada war by the close of the next campaign to be ninety millions, every man may ascertain how much of his property is mortgaged for its payment, by adverting to his portion of the direct tax. The whole amount of this direct tax is three millions—multiplying, therefore, each man's direct tax by thirty, will give the share of the whole debt, for which he may be considered as liable.—Note by Mr. Gaston.

One subject is intimately connected with this Canadian war, which demands the most thorough and deliberate examination. I tremble to approach it thus incidentally, lest I injure the cause of humanity and truth, by a cursory vindication. And yet I dare not altogether omit it, because I fear an opportunity of full consideration will not be presented, and it is of an urgency and a magnitude that forbid it to be overlooked. I mean, sir, the falsely called system of retaliation, which threatens to impart to the war a character of barbarity which has not its parallel in the modern annals of Christendom. Twenty-three persons of our invading army, who were taken prisoners by the enemy at the battle of Queenstown, in Canada, have been sent to England as British subjects, to be tried for treason. To deter the enemy from executing the law upon these unhappy men, our Executive has ordered into close custody, an equal number—not of American citizens invading our country—(this would, indeed, be retaliation)—but of British prisoners who have committed no crime. It is avowed that these shall be put to instantaneous death, if the men sent to England should be convicted and executed. The British Government has proceeded, in return, to confine a corresponding number of Americans, as hostages for the safety of the British prisoners, under the same determination and avowal. This has again been retaliated on our side, and the retaliation retorted by the enemy, so that an indiscriminate and universal destruction of the prisoners on each side is the menaced consequence of the execution of one of the presumed Englishmen ordered home for trial.

Before we enter upon this career of coldblooded massacre, it behooves us, by every obligation which we owe to God, to our fellow-men, and to ourselves, to be certain that the right is with us, and that the duty is imperative. If in a moment of excited feeling we should heedlessly enact the fatal deed which consigns thousands of the gallant and the brave Americans and Britons to an ignominious death, and should afterwards discover that the deed was criminal; that the blood of the innocent is upon us, and the cries of their fatherless infants have ascended against us to the throne of the Most High; how shall we silence the reproaches of conscience; how atone for the wide spread and irreparable mischief; or how efface from the American name the infamous stain that will be stamped upon it? With motives thus awfully obligatory to a correct decision, we are in imminent danger of error, from causes of which we are not aware. A portion of our population, inconsiderable in number as compared with the whole mass, but influential, because of their activity, violence, boldness, and their control of the popular presses—I mean, sir, that part of our naturalized citizens, who, not content with pursuing the private occupations of industry, undertake to manage the affairs of State, or teach us how they should be managed—have systematically and zealously labored to disseminate false principles, and excite prejudices and passions calculated to mislead the public mind. Divesting ourselves as far as possible from all hasty impressions, let us examine upon what foundation rests the right to put our prisoners to death, in revenge for the execution of the men who are to be tried in England for treason. If it shall be, that these men are native subjects of Great Britain, who have never pretended to shake off their allegiance by naturalization here, their crime in making war against their acknowledged country, and actually invading its territories, is so manifestly treason, and the right of their country to punish such treason is so complete, that I will not presume it necessary to argue upon either of these topics. If the enemy has a perfect right to regard them as traitors, we cannot have the inconsistent right to avenge, with innocent blood, their just doom. But it may be that some of them are British subjects naturalized in America. I believe this is not the fact. We have no official information; but from the most respectable unofficial sources I learn it is not the fact. If it should be, however, a very interesting inquiry presents itself. What is the effect of naturalization in severing the ties which bind a man to his native country, and in requiring, as against its claims, the protection of his adopted country? It is my conviction, that erroneous opinions prevail upon this point. It is a point on which this country, surrounded by foreign territories, into which our citizens are migrating in vast numbers, has a very deep interest to form correct opinions.

Every political association must be considered as originally founded on a contract between each of its members and the whole body. Each stipulates to yield obedience to the laws, and to refrain from acts destructive of the existence of the State; while the community, as such, stipulates to secure to each individual the enjoyment of his rights. The duration of such an association, if not denied by the original compact, is necessarily unlimited. When any of its members is desirous to free himself from his engagements, it is manifest that he cannot do it by his own act, at his own pleasure; for such a power would be utterly inconsistent with the notion of an obligation. He can be released from his contract only upon the occurrence of some event which by the terms of the association, it is stipulated, shall have such effect, or by the consent of the community to which he was bound. As is the state of the original parties to the association, such is that of their descendants. Children in every political community must be viewed as succeeding to the rights and with them to the consequent obligations of their parents; but for this principle the great inducement to the social state, the desire of providing for the security and happiness of a family, would be annihilated, and the trammels of Government never would be submitted to. But for this, that perpetual succession which keeps up the identity of the nation, although its individuals are all in a state of decay and renovation, which gives it a corporate being essential to its action, is at once destroyed. From these principles, or principles like these, it is, that all jurists agree that when a political society is formed the fundamental laws of that society may prescribe when and upon what terms only any individual of it shall be freed from his engagement to defend it. That such society possesses this right is a principle of universal law; no dictum can be found to contradict it. How such right shall be exercised must of course depend on the wisdom and virtue of the society itself, or of those who enact its laws. It must be perfectly obvious that in any case where the fundamental laws of the society do not permit the individual to release himself from his engagement the intervention of a third party cannot effect this release. A promise of A to B cannot be discharged by an act of C. The effect therefore which the naturalization in any country of the subject of another has upon the original obligations of that subject to his native country must depend upon its law, prescribing to what extent and under what circumstances these original obligations may be lessened or destroyed. The institutions of different countries vary from each other in this respect; some are more rigid and others more indulgent. But I know of but one State on earth, the State of Virginia, which allows the native subject or citizen so completely to divest himself of his original character as to raise against her with impunity the hand of parricide. Virginia by a statute does permit a citizen by a formal deed, executed before witnesses, acknowledged in court and recorded, to quit-claim and renounce his birthright, and thenceforth to be deemed as though he never had been of the State. All other States in the civilized world impose this restraint, that their original subject shall never wage war against his country.

With the fundamental laws of England in relation to this subject, we have a perfect acquaintance. In general, every man is there at liberty to quit the kingdom, to pursue abroad such occupations, and enter into such engagements as he may find beneficial; but on the express condition that he shall not violate his faith to his sovereign, the first great duty of which is, not to invade his territories and war against his subjects. I was surprised to hear a gentleman from Kentucky, whose good sense and independence I much respect, (Mr. MONTGOMERY,) argue that the permission to a British subject to leave his country, was an implied consent that he might throw off all allegiance to it. Such an implication is done away by the very terms of the permission. The law is as old as Magna Charta, and has been uniform down to this day. "Licuit unicuique de cetero exire de regno nostro, et redire salvo et secure, per terram et per aquam, salva fide nostra." 23d article Abbot's edition of Magna Charta. "It may be lawful for every one hereafter to go out of our kingdom, and return safely and securely, by land and by sea, saving his faith to us." In the reign of Elizabeth, occurred the case of Dr. Story, which gentlemen will find accurately reported.—2d Dyer, 298, b. 304. A native of England, he had long quitted that country; had become a subject of Philip of Spain, and had actually been received as Ambassador from Philip at the English Court. He was indicted for treason; he pleaded the fact of his having become a Spanish subject; the plea was overruled; he was convicted and executed. The case of Colone

Townly occurred in 1746. He was indicted for treason in aiding in the rebellion of 1745; was convicted and executed; notwithstanding the fact of his having become a French subject, and bearing a French commission. The case of Æneas McDonald, in the same year, was more remarkable. He had left Scotland, his native land, a mere infant, and ever afterwards resided in France. As a subject of the King of France, and an officer in his army, he accompanied the Pretender in 1745; was taken prisoner, indicted for treason, and convicted. He was, indeed, not executed. The hardship of his fate excited commiseration; and, upon the recommendation of his jury to mercy, his sentence was commuted to perpetual banishment. It is vain to multiply proofs. Nothing can be more certain than the English law, in relation to its subjects naturalized abroad, waging war against their country. The law of France is more strict, and equally precise. The edict of Trianon, of 23d August, 1813, with great decision, declares—"No Frenchman can be naturalized abroad without our consent," (that is of the Emperor;) and that "Frenchmen naturalized abroad, even without our permission, can at no time carry arms against France, under pain of being indicted in our courts, and condemned to the punishment enacted in the penal code."—Book 3, c. 75. During the French Revolution, in 1795, a corps of emigrants, whom oppression and brutal violence had compelled to quit their country, formed themselves into an army in the pay and employment of Britain, and as such engaged in the ill-fated expedition to Quiberon. They were made prisoners, and executed as traitors. What is our own law? In every State of the Union, except Virginia, it is precisely the law which obtains in Great Britain—no man shall exempt himself from the obligation not to war against his country; and, in Virginia, even, he can only get rid of this obligation by observing the stipulated forms which its law prescribes. Naturalization granted in another country has no effect whatever to destroy his original primary allegiance. A gentleman from Virginia (Mr. EPPES) informed us that, under a British statute, two years voluntary service in their navy, ipso facto, naturalized a foreigner. Be it so, sir. Let us suppose that, during our restrictions on commerce, an American citizen, a Virginian for instance, who had not gone through the stipulated formalities of expatriation, had entered on board the British navy, and after serving there two years, and thus becoming a naturalized subject of George III, had infamously joined in the invasion of his native land. Suppose this miscreant taken prisoner, heading a hostile band at the burning of Havre, or at the atrocious outrages of Hampton, and arraigned for treason in levying war against the United States, what defence could be made for him? Is there a gentleman in the House, with any pretensions to legal science, who will so far hazard his reputation as to allege that a defence could be made for him? Is there a judge in our land, from those who adorn the bench of our Supreme Court down to the humblest in capacity and office, who could be even amused by the miserable sophistry that naturalization in Britain repealed our law of treason? No, sir, the traitor would be condemned—inevitably condemned; and if the President were frightened from executing the sentence, by an insolent threat from Britain to put innocent Americans to death in revenge for the just doom of the convict, he would encounter the contempt and execration of his country. How is it, then, that we undertake, by such menaces, to deter the enemy from executing a like law, under like circumstances, against her unnatural children?

This law against the alienation of allegiance is no relic of tyranny; it is founded in the analogy of nature, and essential to the harmony of the world. There is a striking similitude between the duties of a citizen to his country, and those of a son to his father. Indeed, sir, what is the word country but a comprehensive phrase, embracing all those charities which grow out of the domestic relations of parents, children, kindred, and friends? When the boy has attained manhood, and the father's care is no longer necessary to guard him from daily harms, he is at liberty to quit the parental roof; to become the inmate of another family; there form connexions essential to his happiness, and take upon himself obligations of respect and tenderness as the adopted son of other parents. But is nature's first great bond utterly severed? Can he return at the bidding of his new friends to ravage and destroy the home of his childhood, and pollute it with the life-blood of those from whom he received life? Would this be but an ordinary trespass—a common homicide—which provocation might extenuate, excuse, or even justify? An association, sir, formed by a resurrection of the wretches who have died on the gibbet, would disdain such a principle in their code. What is the jargon of modern expatriation but the same principle interpolated into the code of nations?

The peace and independence of every State, and of none more than ours, demand that the citizen should not be released from the just claims of his country by the interference of foreign Powers. Give to such interference this effect, and every nation is made dependent upon the arbitrary exercise of a foreign right to control and regulate its vital concerns. The Spanish dominions to the South, and the British territories to the North, have tempted from us many of our boldest spirits. Let them go; let them there enjoy every privilege, if they can find it, which in our happy country is given to the fugitive European; every privilege which is essential to their comfort. Let them pursue in tranquillity their industrious occupations, realize the profits of enterprise, and be protected from every invasion of individual right. In return for these advantages, let them, like the Europeans whom we naturalize, render a cheerful obedience to the laws, perform every social duty which is assigned to them, and contribute to the support of the Government a fair proportion of their gains. But permit them not to forget the country which gave them birth and protected their infancy. Suffer them not with impunity to be converted into hostile tribes, whose numbers may be swelled from day to day by the factious, the restless, and the criminal, who have but to pass an ideal line, and the duty of obedience is converted into the right to destroy.

Unless I am greatly deceived, the law of England must be suffered to have its course with the individuals, if natives of England, and migrating to us since the Revolution, who are sent thither for trial. Whether they ought to be executed, if convicted, is a very different question. Considering the intimate connexion which common origin, language, and manners, and intimate commerce has heretofore induced between the countries, and the consequent interchange of their inhabitants; remembering, too, that general laws are often cruel in their application to particular cases, the Executive authority in that country is bound by the strongest motives to consult the dictates of humanity, and forbear the too rigorous exercise of right. But if these considerations should not there prevail, and the severe penalty of the law of treason is exacted, as of right it may be, shall we, without right, without the semblance of law, coldly murder those who are in our power who have committed no treason against us, and against whom crime is not pretended? Is this called retaliation? Britain executes British traitors serving in the American Army, regularly tried and convicted of treason, and we, in return, execute—whom? American traitors, serving in the British army, and convicted of treason? No, but faithful, loyal men, bearing arms in the cause of their native country! tried by no law! offenders against no law! Sir, the pretension is monstrous? I have met with no instance of such a pretension being ever asserted in a civilized country. Did Philip of Spain retaliate in this way for the execution of Dr. Story? Did France retaliate for the execution of Colonel Townly? Did Britain thus retaliate for the execution of the French emigrants taken at Quiberon? I have heard it said that Napper Tandy, an Irishman, naturalized in France, was surrendered upon a threat of retaliation from France. I doubt the fact—the only evidence of it is in a note to an evidently partial and one-sided account of his trial in a collection of Curran's Speeches. In no authentic register have I been able to find it. But, if it were true, the note itself states that the ground on which he was demanded, was not that he had been naturalized by France, and therefore not liable to be executed for treason; but because he had been unjustly seized at Hamburg, in neutral territory, and ought to be returned. Theobald Wolfe Tone, Tandy's associate, and, like him, an officer of France, but not like him, arrested in a violated neutral territory, was neither demanded or delivered. Condemned to death, he changed the mode of its execution by committing suicide. And shall my country, claiming to excel in humanity, as it excels in freedom, the nations of Europe, shall it be the first to avow a monstrous, unfounded pretension, and vindicate it by innocent blood? Shall it teach a lesson of barbarity to the hardened chieftains of slaughter, of which they were before ignorant? Shall it seek to protect foreigners from the vengeance of their sovereigns, at the cost of immolating its own native citizens? Shall it doom a revolutionary Winchester, or a gallant Winder, to a shameful death, because it cannot save alien traitors from their legal fate?

Think for a moment, sir, on the consequences, and deem it not unworthy of you to regard them. True courage shuts not its eyes upon danger or its results. It views them steadily, and calmly resolves whether they ought to be encountered. Already has this Canadian war a character sufficiently cruel, as Newark, Buffalo, and Niagara can testify. But when the spirit of ferocity shall have been maddened by the vapor steaming from the innocent blood that shall stagnate around every depot of prisoners, then will it become a war, not of savage, but of demoniac character. Your part of it may perhaps, be ably sustained—your way through the Canadas may be traced afar off by the smoke of their burning villages—your path may be marked by the blood of their furious peasantry—you may render your course audible by the frantic shrieks of their women and children. But your own sacred soil will also be the scene of this drama of fiends. Your exposed and defenceless seaboard, the seaboard of the South, will invite a terrible vengeance. That seaboard which has been shamefully neglected, and is at this moment without protection, has been already invaded. But an invasion, after the war shall have assumed its unmitigated form of carnage, and woe, and wickedness, must be followed with horrors which imagination can but faintly conceive. I will not trust myself to tell you all I feel, all my constituents feel, upon this subject. But I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that when he alludes to the probability that an intestine foe may be roused to assassination and brutality, he touches a chord that vibrates to the very heart. Yes, sir, I live in a State whose misfortune it is to contain the materials out of which may be made such a foe—a foe that will be found everywhere—in our fields, our kitchens, and our chambers; a foe, ignorant, degraded by habits of servitude, uncurbed by moral restraints—whom no recollections of former kindness will soften, and whom the remembrance of severity will goad to frenzy—from whom nor age, nor infancy, nor beauty, will find reverence or pity—and whose subjugation will be but another word for extermination. Such a foe, sir, may be added to fill up the measure of our calamities. Let me not be misunderstood—let no gentleman misconceive my meaning. Do I state these consequences to intimidate or deter you? I think better of my countrymen. I hope and believe, in the language of Wilkinson to Prevost, the Americans will not be deterred from pursuing what is right by any dread of consequences. No, sir, I state them to rouse your attention and awaken your scrutiny into the correctness of the course you are pursuing. If on mature deliberation you are sure that you are right, proceed, regardless of what may happen.

*"Justum et tenacem propositi virum—
Si fractus illabatur orbis, Impavidum serient ruinæ."*

"The man resolv'd and steady to his trust,
Inflexible to ill, and obstinately just;

From orbs convuls'd should all the planets fly,
World crush on world, and ocean mix with sky;
He, unconcern'd, would view the falling whole,
And still maintain the purpose of his soul."

But reflect well, I conjure you, before reflection is too late. Let not passion or prejudice dictate the decision; if erroneous, its reversal may be decreed by a nation's miseries, and by the world's abhorrence.

Mr. Chairman, turning from the gloomy view of the effects of the Canada war, my attention is arrested by another consequence likely to follow from it, on which I will not long detain you, but which is not less interesting nor less alarming. In proportion as gentlemen become heated in their pursuit of conquest, and are baffled in their efforts to overtake it, the object becomes valuable in their estimation, and success is more identified with their pride. The conquest of Canada, contemplated as an easy sport, without a fixed design either to keep it, to secure, or surrender it to purchase rights, has from its difficulty swelled into an importance which causes it to be valued above all rights. Patriotism was relied on to fill the ranks of the invading army; but it did not sufficiently answer the call. These ranks, however, must be filled—avarice is next resorted to—the most enormous price is bid for soldiers, that was ever offered in any age or country. Should this fail, what is the next scheme? There is no reserve or concealment. It has been avowed that the next scheme is a conscription. It is known that this scheme was recommended even at this session by the War Department, and that it was postponed only to try first the effect of enormous bounty. The freemen of this country are to be draughted from the ranks of the militia, and forced abroad as military machines, to wage a war of conquest! Sir, I have been accustomed to consider the little share which I have in the Constitution of these United States, as the most valuable patrimony I have to leave to those beings in whom I hope my name and remembrance to be perpetuated. But I solemnly declare, that if such a doctrine be ingrafted into this Constitution, I shall regard it as without value, and care not for its preservation. Even in France, where man, inured to despotism, has become so passive and subservient as almost to lose the faculty of feeling oppression, and the capacity to perceive it, even there, sir, the tyranny of conscription rouses him to the assertion of his innate freedom, to struggle against slavery in its most malignant form. No, sir, not the dread of all the severe punishments ordained for refractory conscripts, not the "peine du boulet," the "travaux publics," nor death itself, can stupify him into seeming submission.* He yields only to absolute force, and is marched to the field of glory manacled and handcuffed. And is such a principle to be introduced into our benign, our free institutions? Believe me, the attempt will be fatal—it cannot succeed but by military terror—it will be the signal for drawing the sword at home. Americans are not fitted to be the slaves of a system of French conscription, the most detestable of the inventions of tyranny. Sir, I hear it whispered near me, this is not worse than the impressment of seamen. It is worse, infinitely worse. Impressment forces seamen to serve in the public ships of their country, instead of pursuing their occupation in the merchant service. It changes their employment to one more rigorous, of longer continuance, of greater danger. But it is yet employment of the same kind—it is yet employment for which they are fitted by usage and education. But conscription is indiscriminate in the victims of its tyranny. The age, not the pursuit, of the conscript is the sole criterion of his fitness. Whatever be his habits, whatever his immediate views, whatever his designed occupation in life, a stern mandate tears him from the roof of his father, from the desk, the office, the plough, or the workshop, and he is carried far from home to fight in foreign climes the battles of ambition. But, sir, if conscription were not worse than impressment I should not lose my objection to it—I am not prepared to assent to the introduction of either conscription or impressment into my country. For all the British territories in the Western world, I would not. Fight for sailors' rights—yet rivet on our citizens a French conscription? Fight for rights on the ocean, and annihilate the most precious of all rights at home—the right of a freeman never to be forced out of his own country! How alarming is the infatuation of that zeal, which in its ardor for attaining its object, tramples in the dust objects of infinitely higher price!

What is the probability of success in this scheme of conquest, is a topic on which I mean not to enlarge. It is not necessary that I should, for others have ably discussed it. That you may take Upper Canada, that you may overrun the lower province I believe; but that you will take Quebec, while the mouth of the St. Lawrence is commanded by a hostile fleet, I cannot believe; if an opposite thought sometimes get possession of my imagination, I find it springing from that impulse of the heart which makes me fancy victory perched on the standard of my country, and not the result of an exertion of the understanding. But, sir, if you should conquer the Canadas, subdue Nova Scotia, and possess yourselves of all the British territories in America—if, after impoverishing your country by ruinous loans and grinding down your people by oppressive taxes, you should wade at last through the horrors of invasion, massacre of prisoners, a servile war, and a military conscription to the now darling object of your wishes—I pray you, sir, what is then to be done? What do you design to do with the conquered territory? We will keep it, say the gentlemen from Vermont and Pennsylvania (Mr. BRADLEY and Mr. INGERSOLL.) We will keep it, because it is an object with our people; because it will keep off Indian wars, and retribute us for the wrongs we have sustained. I believe, indeed, that, if conquered, there will be a powerful party to the North and West that will not consent to part with it—with whom it is an object. But how shall it be kept? As a conquered province? To retain it as such against the efforts of an exasperated, though conquered people within, and the exertions of a powerful, proud, and irritated enemy without—that enemy, master of the sea, always able to invade and to succor the invaders—will require a military strength and a pecuniary expenditure not less continued or less in amount than were demanded to take it. Such a conquest is never finished; when nominally effected, it is to be begun. But we will incorporate it into the Union—ay, this would be indeed a pleasant result! Let my Southern friends—let gentlemen who represent slaveholding States attend to this. How would this project take at home? What would their constituents give to have half a dozen new States made out of the Canadas? It is, besides, so notable an expedient for strengthening the nation, and so perfectly in accordance with the principles of our form of Government! We are to force men into an association the very life of which is freedom, and the breath of that life unrestrained choice! And to give vigor to the nation, we are to admit into its councils, and into a free participation of its power, men whose dislike of its Government has been strengthened into abhorrence by the exasperations of war, and all whose affections are fixed upon its enemy! But at all events you are to keep the Canadas. What, then, will you do about sailors' rights? You will not be a jot nearer to them than you are now. How will you procure them, or seek to procure them? Will you then begin in good earnest to protect or obtain them by naval means? Would it not be advisable to attend to this declared object of the war now, rather than wait until after the Canadian scheme is effected? Perhaps you mean to keep Canada and abandon sailors' rights. If so, why not avow to the people that it is conquest you fight for, and not right? But, perhaps, it is designed when the conquest is effected to give it back to Britain as an equivalent for the cessation, on her part, of some maritime right—for the privilege that our ships shall not be searched for British sailors. On this question you may make an arrangement practically securing all we ought now to contend for. You will, I hope, make it in the pending negotiation. But that by surrender of Canada after it is conquered you may purchase from her a disavowal or relinquishment of the right, no man can believe, who understands either the views or the prejudices of that people. They believe the right essential to their naval existence, to deter their seamen from general desertion. All classes in that country so regard it—we know there is not a difference of opinion among any description of politicians in the Kingdom upon this subject. If they have any jealousy of you, (and I believe some of them have,) it is not a jealousy of your territorial extent—but of your fitness to become their commercial and naval rival. Can it be believed, then, that they would compromise in a surrender of a claim, which surrendered, in their judgment, weakens them and invigorates you where alone they are apprehensive of a competition, for the sake of preventing an accession to your territory which extends your limits, while it takes away from your strength? Indulge no such delusion. Were Canada a thousand times more important to Britain than it is, it were yet of less value than her naval power. For the sake of it she would never yield a principle on which that naval power depends. No, sir, the return of conquered Canada, even with the hoped for agency in our favor of the Russian Emperor, would not weigh a feather in the scale against what she deems her first great national interest. As it regards, too, these fancied exertions of Russia in our favor, gentlemen surely deceive themselves. However attached Russia may be to the most liberal principles of commercial intercourse, she never will array herself against the right of the sovereign to compel the services of his seafaring subjects. On this head her policy is not less rigorous (to say the least) than that of England. I will not be more particular. A short time will probably show the grounds of my belief.

But, sir, among the reasons for prosecuting the invasion of Canada one has been gravely stated of a very peculiar kind. Canada, says a gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) should be invaded to protect our frontiers and seaboard from invasion—it is the most economical and effectual method of defence. Although this consideration presents nothing very splendid to our view, yet it would be worth all other reasons for the invasion if it were founded on fact. But, ask the people on your frontiers and on your seaboard, and what will they say? They will tell you, that it is the invasion of Canada alone which endangers them. The most effectual defence to them would be an abandonment of your scheme. Sir, an invasion of the United States, but for the purpose of diverting your forces from Canada or retorting on you the distresses of war, cannot enter into the scheme of British or Canadian policy. It is not to be prosecuted, but at vast inconvenience and expense, with great loss of useful soldiers, under a certainty of ultimate failure, and without hope of glory or gain. The Canadian yeomanry, freed from the terrors of invasion, will cheerfully resume their peaceful occupations; and such of the British regulars as are not required for ordinary garrison duty, instead of being employed in a miserable, predatory, yet destructive border warfare, will be sent to mingle in the European strife, where renown and empire are the mighty stake. Surely this is emphatically the age and the Government of paradox. A war for "free trade," is waged by embargo and prohibition of all commercial intercourse; "sailors' rights" are secured by imprisoning them at home, and not permitting them to move from place to place within their prison but by a license from a collector, like a negro's pass, and obtained on the security of a bondsman; and our frontiers and seaboard are to be defended by an invasion of Canada, which can alone endanger an attack!

H. OF R.

The Loan Bill.

But the real efficient argument for perseverance in the scheme of Canadian conquest has been given by the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. GRUNDY.) We made the war on Britain, says the gentleman, and shall we restrict ourselves to defensive measures? For what purpose was war declared if we do nothing against the possessions of the enemy? Yes, sir, it is the consideration that this war was originally offensive on our side, that creates the, I fear, insuperable obstacle to our discontinuance of it. It were vain to lament that gentlemen are under the influence of feelings which belong to human nature. It would be idleness to declaim against the sinfulness or the folly of false pride. All must admit that it is one of the greatest efforts of magnanimity to retract a course publicly known, and on the correctness of which reputation is staked. If honorable gentlemen could but perceive that this difficulty is one of pride only, and of pride opposing their country's best interests, I know that they could, and believe many of them would, make the effort. Painful as may be the acknowledgment of political error, yet, if they clearly saw that either this humiliation must be endured, or the nation ruined, they could not hesitate in their choice between such alternatives. But, sir, I wish not to present such alternatives to their election; so difficult is it to produce a conviction against which the pride of the heart rebels, that I will not attempt it. Gentlemen are not called on to retract. They may now suspend the execution of their scheme of invasion without an acknowledgment of its error. They may now, without humiliation, restrict themselves to defence, although the war was in its origin offensive. A second favorable opportunity is presented of restoring tranquillity to our once happy country. The first, the revocation of the Orders in Council, was suffered to pass unimproved. Let not this be lost—a third may not shortly occur. Your enemy has invited a direct negotiation for the restoration of peace. Your Executive has accepted the offer, and Ministers have been appointed to meet the Commissioners of the opposite party. This circumstance ought to produce an entire and essential change in your policy. If the Executive be sincere in the acceptance of this proposition he must have acted on the hope that an amicable adjustment of differences might be made. And while there is such a hope, such a prospect, on what principle can you justify invasion and conquest? Force is the substitute, not the legitimate coadjutor of negotiation. Nations fight because they cannot treat. Every benevolent feeling and correct principle are opposed to an effusion of blood, an extension of misery, which are hoped to be unnecessary. It is necessity alone which furnishes their excuse; do not then, at the moment when you avow a belief, a hope at least, that such necessity exists not, pursue a conduct which, but for its existence, is inhuman and detestable.

Besides, sir, if you are earnest in the wish to obtain peace from the Gottenburg mission, suspend in the meantime offensive operations, which cannot facilitate, and may prevent the accomplishment of your object. Think you that Britain is to be intimidated by your menaced invasion of her territories? If she had not learned, by experience, how harmless are your threats, she would nevertheless see but little cause for fear. She knows that the conquest cannot be completed in one, nor in two campaigns. And when she finds that every soldier whom you enlist is to cost you, in bounty alone, upwards of one hundred guineas,* she will perceive that the war is more destructive to your finances, the great source of military strength, than to her territories. The blow aimed at her recoils upon themselves. But the exasperations which must result from the wrongs mutually inflicted in the course of the campaign, may have a very injurious effect upon the disposition to pursue pacific efforts. They will be apt to create a temper on each side, unfavorable to an amicable arrangement. In truth too, sir, you are not prepared for such a campaign, as in honor and humanity you can alone permit yourselves to carry on. Suppose by the month of May or June you raise your men, what are they? Soldiers, fitted to take care of themselves in camp, and support the reputation of your armies in the field? No—they are a mere rabble of raw recruits; march them to Canada, and pestilence will sweep them off by regiments and brigades; while the want of discipline will unfit those whom pestilence spares, for an honorable contest with an experienced foe. Instead, therefore, of the hurry and bustle of filling your ranks with recruits and rushing with them into Canada, attend rather to the training and improvement of those now in service. Make soldiers of them; by gradual enlistments you may regularly add to their number, and insensibly incorporate the new levies with the disciplined troops. If it should hereafter become necessary to march into the field, you will then have an army under your command, not a multitude without subordination. Suspend, therefore, hostilities while you negotiate. Make an armistice until the result of the negotiation is ascertained. You can lose nothing; you can gain everything by such a course; then negotiate fairly, with a view to obtain for your native seamen a practicable and reasonable security against impressment, and with a disposition to aid Britain in commanding the services of her own. Such an arrangement might have been made on the revocation of the Orders in Council, could you have been then satisfied with anything short of an abandonment of the British claim to search. I doubt not but that it may now be made. More you probably cannot obtain. The time may come when, with greater effect, you can prefer, if necessary, higher claims. All is hazarded by precipitately urging more than your relative strength enables you to enforce. Permit your country to grow; let no just right be abandoned; if any be postponed, it may be advanced at a more opportune season, with better prospect of success. If you will quit this crusade against Canada, and seek peace in the spirit of accommodation, and (permit me to add) if you will forego your empiric scheme of embargo and commercial restrictions, you will restore harmony at home, and allay that wide-spread, and in some places alarming spirit of discontent that prevails in our land. And if your pacific efforts fail, if an obstinate and implacable foe will not agree to such a peace as the country can with credit accept, then appeal to the candor and spirit of your people for a Constitutional support, with a full assurance that such an appeal under such circumstances cannot be made in vain.

It is time, Mr. Chairman, that I should release you from the fatigue of hearing me. There is but one more topic to which I solicit your attention. Many admonitions have been addressed to the minority, by gentlemen on the ministerial side of this House, not without merit, and I hope not without edification, on the evils of violent opposition and intemperate party spirit. It is not to be denied that opposition may exceed all reasonable bounds and a minority become factious. But when I hear it seriously urged, that the nature of our Government forbids that firm, manly, active opposition, which in countries less free is salutary and necessary; and when I perceive all the dangers of faction apprehended only on the side of a minority; I witness but new instances of that wonderful ductility of the human mind, which, in its zeal to effect a favorite purpose, begins with the work of self-deception. Why, sir, will not our form of Government tolerate or require the same ardor of Constitutional opposition, which is desirable in one wherein the Chief Magistrate is hereditary? "Because," says the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) "in a monarchy, the influence of the Executive and his Ministers requires continual vigilance, lest

'it obtain too great a preponderance—but here the Executive springs from the people, can do nothing without their support, and cannot therefore overrule and control the public sentiment.' Sir, let us not stop at the surface of things. The influence of the Executive in this country, while he retains his popularity, is infinitely greater than that of a limited monarch. It is as much stronger as the spasm of convulsion is more violent than the voluntary tension of a muscle. The warmth of feeling excited during the contest of an election, and the natural zeal to uphold him whom they have chosen, create, between the Executive and his adherents, a connexion of passion—while the distribution of office and emolument adds a communion of interests,—which, combined, produce an union almost indissoluble. "Support the Administration" becomes a watch-word, which passes from each chieftain of the dominant party to his subalterns, and thence to his followers in the ranks, till the President's opinion becomes the criterion of orthodoxy, and his notions obtain a dominion over the public sentiment, which facilitates the most dangerous encroachments, and demands the most jealous supervision. In proportion as a Government is free, the spirit of bold inquiry—of animated interest in its measures—and of firm opposition where they are not approved, becomes essential to its purity and continuance. And he, who, in a democracy or republic, attempts to control the will of the popular idol of the day, may envy the luxurious ease with which ministerial oppressions are opposed and thwarted in Governments which are less free. Intemperance of party, wherever found, never will meet with an advocate in me. It is a most calamitous scourge to our country—the bane of social enjoyment, of individual justice, and of public virtue—unfriendly to the best pursuits of man, his interest and his duty—it renders useless or even pernicious the highest endowments of intellect, and the noblest dispositions of the soul. But, sir, whatever may be the evils necessarily inherent in its nature, its ravages are then most enormous and desolating when it is seated on the throne of power and vested with all the attributes of rule. I mean not to follow the gentleman from South Carolina over the classic ground of Greece, Carthage, and Rome, to refute his theory, and show that not to vehement opposition, but to the abuse of factious and intolerant power their doom is to be attributed. Nor will I examine some more modern instances of Republics whose destruction has the same origin. The thing is no longer matter of discussion, it has passed into a settled truth in the science of political philosophy. One who on a question of historical deduction, of political theory, is entitled to high respect, has given us an admirable summary of the experience of Republics on this interesting inquiry. In the tenth number of the Federalist, written by Mr. Madison, we find the following apt and judicious observations:

"By a faction, I understand a number of citizens, whether amounting to a majority or minority of the whole, who are united and actuated by some common impulse of passion or of interest, adverse to the rights of other citizens, or to the permanent and aggregate interests of the community."

"The inference to which we are brought, is, that the causes of faction cannot be removed, and that relief is only to be sought in the means of controlling its effects. If a faction consists of less than a majority, relief is supplied by the republican principle which enables the majority to defeat its sinister views by regular vote. It may clog the Administration; it may convulse the society; but it will be unable to execute and mask its violence under the forms of the Constitution. When a majority is included in a faction, the form of popular Government on the other hand enables it to sacrifice to its ruling passion or interest, both the public good and the rights of other citizens. To secure the public good and private rights against the dangers of such a faction, and at the same time to preserve the spirit and the form of popular Government, is then the great object to which our inquiries are directed. Let me add, that it is the great desideratum by which alone this form of Government can be rescued from the opprobrium under which it has so long labored, and be recommended to the esteem and adoption of mankind."

If this doctrine were then to be collected from the history of the world, can it now be doubted, since the experience of the last twenty-five years? Go to France—once Revolutionary, now Imperial France—and ask her whether factious power or intemperate opposition be the more fatal to freedom and happiness? Perhaps, at some moment when the eagle eye of her master is turned away, she may whisper to you to behold the demolition of Lyons, or the devastation of La Vendée. Perhaps she will give you a written answer. Draw near to the once fatal lamp post, and by its flickering light read it, as traced in characters of blood that flowed from the guillotine—Faction is a demon! Faction out of power is a demon enchained! Faction, vested with the attributes of rule, is a Moloch of destruction!

Sir, if the denunciations which gentlemen have pronounced against factious violence are not merely the image of rhetorical pomp; if they are, indeed, solicitous to mitigate the rancor of party feuds; in the sincerity of my soul I wish them success. It is melancholy to behold the miserable jealousies and malignant suspicions which so extensively prevail, to the destruction of social comfort, and the imminent peril of the Republic. On this subject I have reflected much—not merely in the intervals stolen from the bustle of business or the gaiety of amusement, but, in the moments of "depression and solitude," the most favorable to the correction of error. For one, I am willing to bring a portion of party feeling and party prejudice, as an oblation at the shrine of my country. But no offering can avail anything, if not made on the part of those who are the political favorites of the day. On them, it is incumbent to come forward and set the magnanimous example. Approaches or concessions on the side of the minority would be misconstrued into indications of timidity, or of a hankering for favor. But, a spirit of conciliation, arising from those ranks, would be hailed as the harbinger of sunny days, as a challenge to liberality, and to a generous contention for the public weal. This spirit requires not any departure from deliberate opinion, unless it is shown to be erroneous. Such a concession would be a dereliction of duty. Its injunctions would be but few, and, it is to be hoped, not difficult of observance. Seek to uphold your measures by the force of argument, not of denunciation. Stigmatize not opposition to your notions with offensive epithets. These prove nothing but your anger or your weakness, and are sure to generate a spirit of "moral resistance," not easily to be checked or tamed. Give to Presidential views Constitutional respect, but suffer them not to supersede the exercise of independent inquiry. Encourage instead of suppressing fair discussion, so that those who approve not may at least have a respectful hearing. Thus, without derogating a particle from the energy of your measures, you would impart a tone to political dissensions which would deprive them of their acrimony, and render them harmless to the nation.

The nominal party distinctions, sir, have become mere cabalistic terms. It is no longer a question, whether, according to the theory of our Constitution, there is more danger of the Federal encroaching on the State Governments, or the democracy of the State governments paralyzing the arm of Federal power. Federalism and Democracy have lost their meaning. It is now a question of commerce, peace, and union of the States. On this question, unless the honesty and intelligence of the nation shall confederate into one great American party, disdaining petty office-keeping and office-hunting views, defying alike the insolence of the popular prints, the prejudices of faction, and the dominion of Executive influence—I fear a decision will be pronounced fatal to the hopes, to the existence, of the nation. In this question, I assuredly have a very deep interest, but it is the interest of the citizen only. My public career, I hope, will not continue long. Should it please the Disposer of Events to permit me to see the great interest of this nation confided to men who will secure its rights by firmness, moderation, and impartiality abroad, and at home cultivate the arts of peace, encourage honest industry in all its branches, dispense equal justice to all classes of the community, and thus administer the Government in the true spirit of the Constitution, as a trust for the people, not as the property of a party, it will be to me utterly unimportant by what political epithet they may be characterized. As a private citizen, grateful for the blessings I may enjoy, and yielding a prompt obedience to every legitimate demand that can be made upon me, I shall rejoice, as far as my little sphere may extend, to foster the same dispositions among those who surround me.

SATURDAY, February 19.

Mr. LEWIS presented the petition of the Justices of the Peace in the District of Columbia, praying that the laws providing for the collection of small debts may be revised and amended, so as to prevent the numerous frauds committed on creditors.—Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. WEBSTER presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of Concord, in the State of Massachusetts, praying that heavy duties may be laid on all spirits distilled from domestic materials, in order to prevent the consumption of articles of produce used in their manufacture.—Referred.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of Tennessee, therein mentioned; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EPPES reported a bill for the relief of Jas. Patton; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. EPPES,
Ordered, That the Committee of Ways and Means be discharged from the consideration of the resolutions of the Legislature of Tennessee, presented on the 4th instant, and that they be referred to the Committee of the Whole to whom is committed the bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to subscribe, on behalf of the United States, for seven hundred and fifty shares of the capital stock of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company.

Mr. McKEE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill giving the right of preemption in the purchase of lands to certain settlers in the Indiana Territory; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TROUP, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to provide for the widows and orphans of officers who shall die in the military service of the United States; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, reported a bill to authorize the President to cause to be built or purchased the vessels therein described.

[The bill contemplates the employment or building of any number of vessels, not exceeding twenty, carrying not less than 16, or more than 22 guns, if in his opinion the public service shall require it.]

The bill was twice read and committed.

CLAIMS OF MORAVIANS.

Mr. ROBERTS, of Pennsylvania, presented a petition of John G. Cunow, acting in behalf of the missionary concerns of the Society of United Brethren, commonly called Moravians, praying compensation for depredations committed on the property of the Indians, who had incorporated themselves into their society, by the army commanded by General Harrison, at the Moravian towns in Upper Canada.

Mr. ROBERTS moved to refer the petition to a select committee.

Mr. DESHA, of Kentucky, said that to his knowledge several Indians of the very tribe alluded to in the petition had been killed in arms against us, and therefore were not entitled to particular consideration. Their town had been destroyed it was true, and in his opinion very properly. This tribe, Mr. D. said, had always been hostile; they had lived on the Muskingum and on the Sandusky, and had since removed to Canada; but had in all situations evinced hostility to us. He therefore moved that this petition lie on the table.

Mr. ROBERTS said he knew nothing of the circumstances of the case which this petition was intended to bring before the House. It was sufficient for him, to insure his attention to the petition, that the petitioner was a citizen of the United States, and acting in behalf of a respectable community; and he hoped, however much the gentleman might know of the facts connected with this case, he would allow it to take the ordinary course and be referred to a committee, in order to examine whether it was in the power of Congress, compatibly with justice, to afford any relief to the petitioners.

Mr. DESHA said the fact he had stated could not be questioned; but, as the gentleman wished to inquire into the circumstances, he had no objection to withdraw the motion to lay the memorial on the table.

Mr. McKIM, of Maryland, rose to renew the motion. He said it was much to be regretted that in the prosecution of the war any religious society should sustain a loss in its property, and particularly the United Brethren, who were generally a most inoffensive and well-disposed people. In the prosecution of the war, their town and property was represented to have been destroyed. But this property was within the settlements of the enemy, and exposed, according to the usages of war, to injury from an invading force. We also, said he, have had some villages destroyed; but none of our citizens, that I have heard of, have thought proper to petition the Parliament of Great Britain for remuneration for the destruction of their property; and if they had, it would be thought a curious procedure. At the conclusion of the war, some mutual indemnity might be provided for sufferers of this character; but until that time, and in any other manner, he did not believe the petitioners could obtain relief.

Mr. ROBERTS said he was still convinced of the propriety of referring this petition. The persons living in the towns destroyed were Indians, within the British jurisdiction, indeed located on lands ceded to them by the British Government, but not under its authority. They were attached to the Society of the United Brethren by its missionaries, and were entirely free and independent of the Canadian Government. In the late expeditions against the hostile Indians, their settlements had been destroyed; and he thought there could be no impropriety in inquiring, whether, consistently with justice, any indemnity could be allowed them.

The motion to lay the petition on the table having been withdrawn, it was referred to a select committee.

NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to incorporate the stockholders of the National Bank; which was twice read, and committed. The bill is as follows:

A Bill to incorporate the stockholders of the National Bank.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a National Bank shall be established, and that it shall be held, and shall transact its business at the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia, the capital stock whereof shall not exceed thirty millions of dollars, divided into three hundred thousand shares, each share being one hundred dollars.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That all such persons as shall, in the manner hereinafter provided, become stockholders of the bank hereby incorporated, shall be, and hereby are, ordained, constituted, and declared to be a corporation and body politic, by the name and style of "The President, Directors, and Company of the National Bank," and shall so continue, from and immediately after the passing of this act, until the first Monday in March, which will be in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-four; and by that name they and their successors shall and may, until that day, have continued succession, and shall be, and hereby are, made able and capable in law to sue and to be sued, plead and be impleaded, answer and be answered unto, defend and be defended, in all courts and places whatsoever; and, that they and their successors may make, have, and use, a common seal, and may break, change, alter, and renew the same at their pleasure; and shall be in law capable of purchasing, holding, and conveying any estate, real or personal, for the use of the said corporation: Provided, That the real estate which it may be lawful for the said corporation to hold, shall be only such as shall be requisite or necessary for its business, or the accommodation of any of its officers, or such as shall have been bona fide mortgaged to it by way of security, or conveyed to it in satisfaction of debts previously contracted in the course of its dealing, or purchased at sales upon judgments which shall have been obtained for such debts, And provided further, That it shall not be lawful for the said corporation, directly or indirectly, to deal or trade in buying or selling any goods, wares, or merchandise, or commodities whatsoever, except bills of exchange, or gold and silver bullion, nor in buying or selling any stock created by any act of the United States, unless in selling the same when truly pledged by way of security for debts due to the said corporation: Provided, nevertheless, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the said bank from subscribing, at any time, to any stock or loan of the United States, and selling such stock again at pleasure, in any part of the world. And if the said corporation, or any person or persons for, or to the use of the same, shall deal or trade in buying or selling any goods, wares, merchandise, or commodities whatsoever, contrary to the provisions of this act, all and every person and persons who shall have been concerned as parties or agents therein, shall forfeit and lose treble the value of the goods, wares, and merchandises, and commodities in which such dealing and trade shall have been, one-half thereof to the use of the informer, and the other half thereof to the use of the United States, to be recovered with costs of suit.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That subscriptions for the said stock shall be opened and kept open by the appointment and under the direction of the board of directors of the said bank, hereinafter named, at such times and places as they shall appoint, first giving public notice thereof for the space of thirty days, in at least eighteen newspapers, printed in different parts of the United States, and subject to such rules, regulations, limitations, and conditions, as shall be by them prescribed, until the whole amount of shares for which the subscriptions were opened shall be filled. And it shall and may be lawful for the President of the United States, at any time after such subscriptions shall be opened, to cause a subscription to be made to the stock of the said corporation, as part of the capital stock thereof, on behalf of the United States, to an amount not exceeding six millions of dollars; and that, for the purpose of paying for said stock, subscribed for as aforesaid by the United States, the bank shall loan the amount of subscription, at, and after the rate of six per centum per annum, payable quarterly, for so long a time as the United States shall hold the stock, unless they shall elect to reimburse the amount of said loan at an earlier period. That four millions of dollars of the said capital stock shall be reserved for the respective States, to be apportioned among them in the ratio of their representation in the House of Representatives of the United States, and that it shall and may be lawful for the Governor of each State, at any time within one year after the passage of this act, to cause a subscription to be made to the stock of said corporation, as part of the capital thereof, in behalf of the State of which he is Governor, to an amount not exceeding the amount to which such State is entitled to subscribe, such stock to be paid for in like manner with other subscriptions to the said bank, except that which shall be subscribed for by the United States, as aforesaid. That, if the whole sum of four millions of dollars shall not be subscribed by the States, in the manner and proportions above mentioned, the directors shall cause a new subscription to be opened for the residue of the said four millions of dollars, in the form heretofore directed for the original subscription.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That the capital stock shall be paid up by instalments, at such times, and in such portions, as the board of directors may direct, they giving at least thirty days' notice thereof, immediately prior to requiring the payment of an instalment, in all the daily newspapers printed in Washington, aforesaid, in at least one newspaper printed in each State where subscription shall be made to said stock; and in case any subscriber or stockholder shall omit, neglect, or refuse to pay the several instalments, or any one of them, on his, her, or their stock, at the time appointed, as aforesaid, then, in all such cases, the board of directors, or a majority of them, shall have power, and are hereby authorized to forfeit all such stock for the use, benefit, and account of the corporation aforesaid.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That, for the well-ordering, managing, and conducting of the stock, property, concerns, and affairs of the said corporation, the same shall be ordered, managed, and conducted by twenty-five directors, five of whom shall be appointed by the President of the United States, and by him changed at pleasure, and the residue shall be stockholders, and citizens of the United States, resident therein, to be chosen by the stockholders of the said corporation, in manner hereinafter provided for, which directors shall hold their offices for one year, from the first Monday of March in every year, and until others shall be duly elected in their places; and the said directors shall be elected on the first Monday of January, in every year, at the banking-house of the said bank, in the City of Washington, and at such time of day as a majority of the directors for the time being shall appoint, of which public notice shall be given by the said directors, not more than thirty nor less than ten days previous to the time of holding the said election, by an advertisement, to be inserted in all the daily newspapers printed at Washington, and in at least five of the other public newspapers printed in different parts of the United States. And the said election shall be held and made by such of the stockholders of the said corporation as shall attend for that purpose, either in person or by proxy, subject to the restriction hereinafter provided; and all elections shall be by ballot; and, if it shall happen at any election that any two or more persons have an equal number of votes, then the directors in office at the time of such election, or a majority of them, shall, at their banking-house, in the City of Washington aforesaid, proceed to ballot, and, by a plurality of votes, determine which of the said persons so having an equal number of votes shall be director or directors, so as to complete the whole number of directors. And the directors, so elected and appointed, shall be at liberty to take their seats at the board on the first Monday in March in each year, and shall, as soon as may be thereafter, form a board of directors at their banking-house in Washington, aforesaid, and proceed to elect by ballot one of their number, so elected by the stockholders, as aforesaid, to be their President; and, whenever any vacancy happens among the directors, so elected as aforesaid, from any cause whatever, the same shall be filled, for the remainder of the year in which it shall happen, by such person or persons as the remainder of the directors for the time being, or a majority of them, shall appoint: Provided, however, That there shall be no election for, or appointment of, directors, other than to fill vacancies, as aforesaid, until the first Monday of January, one thousand eight hundred and sixteen, and that in the meantime, David M. Clarkson, Jacob Barker, John Wells, Charles Wright, George Davis, Isaac Lawrence, William R. Gray, Thomas Hazard, junior, Guy Bryan, Chandler Price, John Sergeant, Manuel Eyre, James C. Fisher, Joseph Peace, James A. Buchanan, Isaac McKim, Robert Oliver, John Cox, John McKinney, John P. Van Ness, Richard Cutts, Robert Brent, John Tayloe, Walter Jones, junior, and Thomas T. Gantt, be, and they are hereby declared to be, directors of the said corporation; and they shall hold their offices until the first Monday of March, in the year last aforesaid, and until others shall be duly elected in their places; and the directors hereinbefore named, or a majority of them, shall, at their banking-house, at Washington, choose one of their number for their President. In all elections for President, Cashier, and other agents, and for such directors as may be necessary to fill vacancies, a majority of the directors shall vote; and absent directors may constitute any director, who shall personally attend, his proxy, to vote at such elections.

SEC. 6. Be it further enacted, That in case it shall at any time happen that an election of directors shall not take place on the day when, pursuant to this act, it ought to have been made, the said corporation shall not for that cause be deemed to be dissolved, but it shall and may be lawful to hold such election on such other day and in such manner as shall be prescribed by a by-law or ordinance of the said corporation for that purpose to be made.

SEC. 7. Be it further enacted, That each stockholder or stockholders, at elections, shall be entitled to vote according to the number of shares he, she, or they shall hold, in the proportions following, that is to say: for one share, and not more than two shares, one vote; for every two shares above two, and not exceeding ten, one vote; for every four shares above ten, and not exceeding thirty, one vote; for every six shares above thirty, and not exceeding sixty, one vote; for every eight shares above sixty, and not exceeding one hundred, one vote; for every ten shares above one hundred one vote; but no State, person, copartnership, or body politic, shall be entitled to a greater number than thirty votes: Provided, That no stockholder, not a citizen of the United States and an actual resident therein, shall be entitled to vote at elections or otherwise, either in person or by proxy: And provided also, That no stockholder shall be entitled to vote at elections or otherwise on any stock, unless he, she, or they shall have held the said stock on which he, she, or they offer to vote, at least ninety days previous to such election or time of voting, and that such shares shall actually belong to a citizen or citizens of the United States of America.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That not less than fifteen of the directors, for the time being, shall form a board or quorum, who shall have power to make and prescribe by-laws, rules, and regulations, not repugnant to the laws and Constitution of the United States, as to them shall appear needful and proper, touching the management and disposition of the stock, property, estate, and effects of the said corporation; the duties and conduct of the affairs of said corporation; the duties and conduct of the officers, clerks, and servants for carrying on the said business, and with such salaries and allowance as to them shall seem meet: and to procure such alterations in this act of incorporation as may be hereafter authorized by law; and that not less than five of the directors, for the time being, shall form a committee or quorum for transacting the business of the said corporation, pursuant to the by-laws that may be made by the board of directors, who shall have power to transact such business, pursuant to such by-laws, as may be prescribed as aforesaid, in such manner as to them shall appear needful and proper: Provided, That no director, other than the president, shall be entitled to any emolument for his services as director, but that the president shall receive such salary or compensation for his services as shall be agreed upon by a majority of the board of directors. And every cashier or treasurer, before he enters upon the duties of his office, shall be required to give bond, with two or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the directors, in a sum not less than fifty thousand dollars, with condition for his good behaviour.

SEC. 9. Be it further enacted, That no transfer of stock shall be valid and effectual until such transfer shall be entered or registered in a book or books to be kept for that purpose by the directors.

SEC. 10. Be it further enacted, That the total amount of debts which said corporation shall at any time owe, whether by bond, bill, note, or other contract, shall not exceed double the amount of the capital stock of said bank, over and above the moneys then deposited in the said bank; and in case of such excess the directors, under whose administration it shall happen, shall be liable for the same in their separate and private capacities; but this shall not be construed to exempt the said corporation, or any estate, real or personal, which they may hold as a body corporate, from also being liable and chargeable for such excess; but such of the said directors as shall have been absent when the said excess was contracted, or who may have dissented from the resolution or act whereby the same was so created, shall not be liable.

SEC. 11. Be it further enacted, That the officer at the head of the Treasury Department of the United States shall be furnished, from time to time, as often as he may require, not exceeding once a week, with statements of the amount of the capital stock of the said corporation, and of the debts due to the same, of the moneys deposited therein, of the notes in circulation, and of the cash in hand; and shall have a right to inspect such general accounts in the books of the bank as shall relate to the said statements: Provided, That this shall not be construed to imply a right of inspecting the account of any private individual or individuals with the bank.

SEC. 12. Be it further enacted, That the corporation hereby created shall loan to the United States, over and above the amount loaned them for the payment of their subscription to the capital stock of said company, such sum or sums of money as may be required, so that the whole amount owing therefor by the United States to the said bank shall not exceed, at any one time, the sum of fifteen millions of dollars, exclusive of the money loaned for making the said payment; and for the amount of the said loan or loans the United States shall issue a transferrable stock, on the same terms and conditions as the loan for seven and a half millions was obtained, in pursuance of the act, entitled "An act authorizing a loan, for a sum not exceeding seven millions five hundred thousand dollars:" Provided, however, That all loans made to the United States by the said bank shall be fully paid and discharged, with the interest due thereon, at least one year before the time hereinbefore limited for the duration of this corporation: And provided further, That such incorporation shall continue until one year after such loans are paid, anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 13. Be it further enacted, That the said corporation shall not demand any greater interest for any loan or discount than at the rate of seven per cent. per annum; such interest payable in advance. And half-yearly dividends shall be made of so much of the profits of the bank as shall appear to the directors advisable; and once in every three years the directors shall lay before the stockholders, at a general meeting, for their information, an exact and particular statement of the debts which shall have remained unpaid after the expiration of the original credit, and of the surplus of profit, if any, after deducting losses and dividends. If there shall be a failure in the payment of any part of any sum subscribed by any person, copartnership, or body politic, the party failing shall lose the benefit of any dividend which may have accrued prior to the time for making such payment, and during the delay of the same.

SEC. 14. Be it further enacted, That the bills, obligatory and of credit, under the seal of the said corporation, which shall be made to any person or persons, shall be assignable by endorsement thereon, under the hand or hands of such person, and of his, her, or their assignee or assignees, and so as absolutely to transfer and vest the property thereof in each and every assignee or assignees respectively, and to enable such assignee or assignees to bring and maintain an action thereupon, in his, her, or their own name or names. And bills or notes which may be issued by order of the said corporation, shall be binding and obligatory upon the same in like manner, and with like force and effect, as upon any private person or persons, if issued by him or them in his, her, or their private or natural capacity or capacities, and shall be assignable and negotiable in like manner as if they were so issued by such private person or persons; that is to say, those which shall be payable to any person or persons, his, her, or their order, shall be assignable by endorsement thereupon, in like manner, and with like effect, as foreign bills of exchange now are; and those which are payable to bearer shall be negotiable and assignable by delivery only.

SEC. 15. Be it further enacted, That if any person shall falsely make, forge, or counterfeit, or cause or procure to be falsely made, forged, or counterfeited, or willingly aid or assist in falsely making, forging, or counterfeiting, any bill or note in imitation of, or purporting to be, a bill or note issued by order of the president, directors, and company of the National Bank, or any order or check of the said bank or corporation, or any cashier thereof; or shall falsely alter, or procure to be falsely altered, or willingly aid or assist in falsely altering, any bill or note issued by order of the president, directors, and company of the National Bank, or any order or check on the said corporation, or any cashier thereof; or shall pass, utter, or publish, as true, any false, forged, or counterfeited bill or note, purporting to be a bill or note issued by order of the president, directors, and company of the National Bank; or any false, forged, or counterfeited order or check upon the said bank or corporation, or any cashier thereof, knowing the same to be falsely forged or counterfeited, or shall pass, utter, or publish, as true, or attempt to pass, utter, or publish, as true, any falsely altered bill or note, issued by order of the president, directors, and company of the National Bank; or any falsely altered order or check on the said bank or corporation, or any cashier thereof, knowing the same to be falsely altered, with intention to defraud the said corporation, or any other body politic or person, every such person shall be deemed and adjudged guilty of felony, and being thereof convicted, by due course of law, shall be sentenced to be imprisoned and kept to hard labor for a period not less than three years nor more than twenty years, or shall be imprisoned not exceeding twenty years, and fined not exceeding five thousand dollars; Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to deprive the courts of the individual States of a jurisdiction, under the laws of the several States, over the offence declared punishable by this act.

SEC. 16. Be it further enacted, That the bills or notes of the said corporation, payable on demand, shall be receivable in all payments to the United States; and that after the present session of Congress no other bank shall be established by any future law of the United States, during the continuance of the corporation hereby created; for which the faith of the United States is hereby pledged: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the renewal of the charters of any banks now incorporated in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 17. Be it further enacted, That if the corporation hereby created shall be dissolved by limitation of time or otherwise, it shall be lawful for the president and directors thereof, for the time being, to sue and be sued in any court or place by their corporate name, for and upon any cause, matter, or thing, arising previous to such dissolution, in like manner as they might have done if the same had not taken place; and also to sell their property, real and personal, and to divide the proceeds and all their capital among the several stockholders, rateably, according to their several interests in the same.

THE LOAN BILL.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole, on the Loan bill.

Mr. GASTON, of North Carolina, concluded, in about two hours, his speech against the bill, and against the course of measures generally pursued under the Republican Administration, as given entire in preceding pages.

Mr. McLEAN, of Ohio, followed in an argumentative speech, principally against the doctrine of perpetual allegiance, as set up by the Opposition speakers. Mr. McL. spoke about an hour.

When the question was taken on filling the blank for the amount of the loan with twenty-five millions, and decided in the affirmative. Other blanks having been filled, the Committee rose and reported the bill to the House with said amendments; and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, February 21.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1814; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EPPES also reported a bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment, for the year 1814; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EPPES also reported a bill making appropriations for the support of the Navy, for the year 1814; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. BOND, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of requiring the judges in the Illinois Territory, appointed by the authority of the United States, to perform certain judicial duties required of them by the Legislature of said Territory, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following letter:

WITHE, (VA.,) February 8, 1814.

SIR: For the information of the House of Representatives, or any committee of that House who may have under consideration either the manner in which the war has been conducted, or my conduct as an officer of the Army of the United States, I enclose to you documents, mostly originals, numbered from one to sixty-one, inclusive.

Should these papers be necessary to me for any purpose, at any time, no doubt they will be safe among the archives of the House of Representatives, and delivered, on application, to me or my order.

I have the honor to be, with all possible respect and esteem, sir, your obedient servant,

ALEX. SMITH.

Hon. LANGDON CHEVES, Speaker, &c.

After some conversation between Messrs. MILLER, FORSYTH, DESHA, and EPPES, as to the proper manner of disposing of this letter, it was ordered to lie on the table for the present.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution offered a few days ago by Mr. McKIM, contemplating an inquiry into the expediency of authorizing an annual report on the resources of the United States. The resolution having been amended, on motion of Mr. NEWTON, so as to refer the subject to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures instead of the Committee of Ways and Means, was adopted.

On motion of Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, the Loan bill having been laid on the table for the purpose, the Treasury Note bill for 1814 passed through a Committee of the Whole, was verbally amended, and reported to the House.

Mr. HALL, of Georgia, was desirous to have these Treasury bills of such a description as to facilitate their reception among the farmers, to whom he said they would be more acceptable than any other money, because bearing an interest, &c. For this purpose, he offered as an amendment a new section to the bill, to the following effect:

And be it further enacted, That no one note or bill shall be issued for a larger amount than one hundred dollars, nor for less than five dollars; and, in all cases where said notes are held for a longer time than contemplated by this act, the holder or bearer of said note or bills shall be entitled to receive the same rate of interest per annum as allowed by this act.

This motion was negative—ayes 25.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, without debate or opposition.

THE LOAN BILL.

The House then resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill authorizing the loan for 1814.

Mr. YANCEY, of North Carolina, with a view to allow the discussion to progress with the same latitude as it had commenced, since it appeared to be agreed that it was not yet to terminate, moved to recommit the bill to a Committee of the whole House.

This motion was opposed by Mr. DESHA, of Kentucky, on the ground that it could be as well discussed in the House as in Committee. Besides, it had already been discussed nearly two weeks, and every subject but the loan had been drawn into debate; and, if the bill was retained in the House, it would be in its power to terminate debate by the previous question—a power not belonging to the Committee of the Whole.

The motion was advocated by Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, who said he did not believe the recommitment would delay the bill for a single hour, because the House would at any time have power to refuse leave to the Committee to sit on it again whenever it chose.

The question on recommitment having been taken by yeas and nays, was decided in the affirmative—For recommitment 77, against it 70, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bayly of Virginia, Bigelow, Bradbury, Brigham, Burwell, Caperton, Calhoun, Champion, Clark, Cox, Creighton, Culpeper, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Dewey, Duvall, Ely, Eppes, Findley, Forsyth, Geddes, Glasgow, Gourdin, Grosvenor, Hasbrouck, Hopkins of New York, Howell, Hungerford, Irving, Jackson of Rhode Island, Johnson of Virginia, Kent of New York, Kent of Maryland, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Lowndes, Macon, Markell, McKee, McLean, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Moseley, Nelson, Newton, Pearson, Pickering, Pickens, Pitkin, Pleasants, Post, John Reed, Ringgold, Robertson, Ruggles, Sevier, Sheffey, Smith of New York, Stanford, Stockton, Taggart, Tallmadge, Tannehill, Telfair, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Webster, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, Winter and Yancey.

YAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Archer, Avery, Bard, Barnett, Brown, Butler, Caldwell, Chappell, Clopton, Comstock, Conard, Crawford, Cuthbert, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Earle, Evans, Farrow, Fisk of New York, Forney, Franklin, Gaston, Goldsborough, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hale, Hall, Hanson, Hawes, Hubbard, Hufty, Ingham, Kennedy, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of Massachusetts, King of North Carolina, Lefferts, Lyle, McCoy, McKim, Oakley, Ormsby, Parker, Piper, Potter, Wm. Reed, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Richardson, Roane, Roberts, Schureman, Seybert, Skinner, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Stuart, Sturges, Troup, Udree, Ward of New Jersey, Whitehill, Williams, Wilson of Pennsylvania, and Wright.

So the bill was recommitted; and the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. PLEASANTS, of Virginia, in the chair, on said bill.

The question being then stated, on the rising of the Committee to report the bill—

Mr. YANCEY, of North Carolina, made a speech of more than an hour in length, in reply to the arguments and assertions advanced in opposition to the bill.

He was followed by Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, on the other side, who had spoken but a short time, when the Committee rose, reported progress, and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 22.

Mr. HEMPSTEAD presented sundry resolutions of the Legislature of the Missouri Territory, respecting land titles and settlers on public lands in said Territory.

Ordered, That so much of said resolutions as relates to land titles, be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the bill for the final adjustment of land titles in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri; and, that so much as relates to a donation and pre-emption right to settlers, be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting his report in relation to the banks and insurance companies within the District of Columbia, in obedience to a resolution of the 10th instant; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "for the relief of John Cahoon and others," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the committee for revising the militia system, made a report on the report of the Secretary of War, on the claims of the several States and Territories, for moneys advanced in calling into the service detachments of militia; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next. The report is as follows:

That the said claims amount to $20,612 67; of this sum, $3,035 58 appears to be claimed for pay and forage for officers and privates of the militia who have been regularly paid and supplied by the United States; $6,558 93 for advances made on account to certain officers, without specifying for what purpose made, and without any evidence that the same has been accounted for; $1,969 20 for provisions, rum, whiskey, &c., for officers and privates who were either furnished by the contractor with rations, or who received an allowance in lieu thereof, on the rolls, through the paymaster; $997 12 for surgical instruments, medicines, and groceries for militia, without any evidence that there was necessity for any of the articles, or that such of them as must have remained on hand at the close of the expedition, were stored or kept for the United States; $1,507 59 for blankets, mattresses, &c., for militia who received the regular allowance for clothing through the paymaster; $2,574 27 for axes, pots, kettles, pans, canteens, and tents, without any evidence that at the close of the expedition the same were delivered over to the proper officer of the United States for their use; and the residue of the said sum is claimed for the services of officers not recognised by the laws of the United States at the time when the services were performed, and for forage furnished to them, for the services of expresses in carrying orders, for calling out the militia, and for mustering and inspecting the militia, which hitherto have been considered State expenses, and incurred accordingly, without expecting remuneration from the Treasury of the United States. The Committee, therefore, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the said claims ought not to be allowed.

TREASURY NOTES.

The engrossed bill to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes for the year 1814, was read a third time.

Mr. HALL, of Georgia, moved to recommit the bill, with a view to introduce an amendment similar to that he had yesterday offered, changing the smallest amount of the bills to be issued to ten dollars instead of five.

This motion was supported by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, of Maryland, with different views, arising out of the latitude of expression of some provisions of the bill, and was opposed by Mr. EPPES, of Virginia.

The motion was negatived by a considerable majority.

The question on the passage of the bill was then decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Archer, Avery, Barnett, Beall, Bradley, Brown, Burwell, Butler, Caldwell, Calhoun, Chappell, Comstock, Conard, Crawford, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Duvall, Earle, Eppes, Evans, Farrow, Fisk of

THE LOAN BILL.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole on the Loan bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, in a speech of about two hours in length, concluded the speech which he had but commenced at the time of adjournment yesterday.

Mr. CUTHBERT, of Georgia, in a speech of near an hour in length, being the first he has made since he took his seat, replied to many of the arguments of Opposition.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, just before the usual hour of adjournment, commenced a speech in reply to some of the speakers in the minority.

When he had spoken about a quarter of an hour, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again; and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 23.

A bill from the Senate, "for the relief of John Cahoone and others," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH submitted, for consideration, the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Standing Rules and Orders of this House be amended, so as to admit within the Hall of the House of Representatives, such gentlemen as have heretofore been members of the Cabinet."

The resolution was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "to provide for the return, to their own districts, of vessels detained by the embargo, in districts other than those where they are respectively owned or belong," with amendments; in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The report of the select committee, relative to the state of the Clerk's office of this House, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was concurred in, and the Clerk authorized to employ an additional assistant clerk.

On motion of Mr. McKEE, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the final adjustment of land titles in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri, which was reported to the House with amendments, and was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. HEMPSTEAD, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire whether any, and if any what, alterations or amendments are necessary to be made to the act, entitled "an act providing for the government of the Territory of Missouri," with leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

THE LOAN BILL.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole, on the Loan bill.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, concluded the speech which he commenced yesterday; which is given entire, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, every day's experience must have satisfied the gentlemen of the minority, that no opposition to this bill or to any other measure intended to give vital energy to the contest in which the country is engaged, can be successful here. Whence, then, arises this extraordinary display of industry and of ingenuity? Is it that they intend on this question to enter upon their defence for their irregular and unprecedented course pursued since the commencement of the war? In this view, the subject is indeed interesting—worthy of all the labor and all the talents bestowed upon it. To conduct it to a successful issue, will require a portion of industry never yet equalled—a degree of ingenuity never yet surpassed. In the brief examination of some of the topics of discussion, I wish it to be understood that my object is not to prove that the conduct of the Government has been correct; but to show that the opposition is not justifiable upon any of the principles assumed for its defence. The honor of the Government is not yet sunk so low as to require a labored defence of their measures at the bar of the public. The evidence has long since been exhibited to the proper tribunal; sentence of acquittal upon that evidence has been pronounced by the present generation, and more impartial posterity will but confirm the judgment.

Before I enter upon the examination of any of those arguments urged upon the great subject of the present contest, I will detain the Committee by a short reply to some observations very remotely, if at all, connected with it.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. SHERWOOD) expressed a hope that the report made by the committee appointed at the last session, to inquire into the spirit and manner in which the war had been conducted by the enemy, should sleep in oblivion on the shelf. It is sufficiently evident the substance or form of that report is unpleasant to the honorable gentleman—but why it has excited his displeasure he has not condescended to inform us. Can it be because it exhibits strong and irrefragable proof of the injustice of those fond eulogiums certain persons are in the habit of pronouncing upon the enemies of their country? But, sir, the fact is mistaken by the honorable gentleman; that report is not yet in the grave of oblivion which has the honor to live in his recollection. If from any cause he desires it to pass away, he has misunderstood the means by which his wishes are to be accomplished. With the improvidence of the Ephesian magistracy, he has rendered immortal the memory of that object he intended to destroy. Another remark less equivalent in its character and more reprehensible, I will recall to the attention of the Committee. He said no valuable lives had been or could be lost in the present war, as no valuable lives would be exposed to its perils. Has the honorable gentleman so soon forgotten the manes of Lawrence, of Allen, of Burrows, of Claxton, and of Clarke, who nobly died on one element, asserting the rights and the honor of their country; and those of Pike, of Covington, and Backus, who expired on the other in the same righteous and holy cause? But this profanation of the ashes of the dead, is not greater than the injustice done to living merit. There are at this moment on the Northern frontier, in the armies of their country, gallant and virtuous men. Some of these are personally known to me, who in purity of heart, strength of understanding, extent of intellectual acquirements, and high chivalric honor, may proudly erect their crests by the side of the chosen Representative of the great State of New York.

The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. GASTON) has recommended to the majority moderation, liberality, and forbearance. The advice was certainly excellent, but why was it confined in its application? Why not extended to the minority to which the honorable gentleman is attached? It is as necessary for them as for us, and probably would have been more acceptable, since it was given by their friend. But although we have the benefit of the gentleman's recommendation, we have not the benefit of his example. He has not shown either that moderation or that liberality in his strictures upon the majority, which he asks at their hands. It is true that his language is correct, gentlemanly, and polished. No harsh terms deform the smoothness of his periods. But what difference is there between a direct charge, and an allusion not to be misunderstood? The one is as offensive as the other. In the eye of reason it matters not whether the victim is struck down by the butcher's cleaver, or his blood drawn by a glittering Spanish blade. The first makes a more unseemly wound, but the latter is equally painful and not less deadly. If there is any difference, the latter weapon is more dangerous, because more difficult to elude. What means the dark insinuation, that now the majority could speak freely of the Emperor of France? Has there ever been a time when this majority could not speak freely of the French Emperor? If there ever was such a period in the history of this Hall, my memory does not reach to it. Since the kindness of the people of Georgia has permitted me to be its inmate, such a charge cannot be made with the shadow of propriety. The gentleman, in the same spirit, remarks that he no longer fears the alliance formerly so dreaded—persons are not in the habit of forming connexions with their falling friends. I have too much respect for the correctness of his understanding and the generosity of his affections, to believe he expresses his own ideas of friendship. This cold, calculating, and odious opinion is imputed to the majority of this House. It is for them this worldly sentiment is expressed. It is the majority who are represented as shrinking from the contact of misfortune, as from the touch of pollution. Sir, the charge is unjust. The friendship of the majority, if they have any, and all bodies of men feel the divine emotion, is as pure as that of the honorable gentleman or of the party with whom it is his pride to act. It has the true quality of all pure affection—like the ivy to the ruined tower, it clings more closely to its object as it totters in the blast of adversity. I am not to be understood as admitting that any such attachment exists or ever did exist to the cause of France; nor do I consider it necessary to deny the influence she is said to have in our councils. That charge the enemies of France do not believe—the charge which is condemned by all the respectable statesmen in Great Britain, which is confined to the groundlings of the British Parliament, and to a portion of the minority in this country, is not sufficiently respectable to require serious refutation. It is singular that the enemies of the United States think more favorable of the impartiality of the Administration than its political opponents.

The passage of this bill is resisted on the same beaten grounds which have been occupied on all other questions relative to the war. The injustice of the contest in its commencement—the injustice of continuing it after the repeal of the Orders in Council—the impracticability of effecting the objects for which it is carried on. That there was sufficient cause of war against Great Britain, I have not heard denied. In this assembly, at least, I presume there cannot be found an individual whose understanding is so thoroughly perverted, whose heart is so perfectly corrupt as to believe that Great Britain has done us no essential injury. But while sufficient cause of war is said to have existed, while great injuries are admitted to have been committed, and were daily accumulating, the war is still affirmed to have been relatively unjust. Ask for the evidence of this relative injustice, and the answer you receive is a torrent of declamation against the Corsican usurper, the violator of the honor and integrity of nations. Describe the injuries and enormities of England, and your attention is invited to the insults and aggressions of France. There are in this community singular politicians who conceive the injuries and insults of France and England, like the equal quantities in the calculation of algebraic fractions, as of no other use than to extinguish each other. For my part I do not understand this political algebra. I rejoice that I do not. On this subject ignorance is virtue and knowledge crime. I will not detain you by any attempt to show the variance in magnitude of the injuries received from the two nations. I will not inquire which of the two commenced the systematic violation of the rights of neutral commerce. It is perfectly indifferent how the account stands on this question. Admitting them to be equal in time and in degree of enormity, the aggressions of one Power are no justification of the encroachments of the other. Indeed, every attempt on the part of our Government in their correspondence with the Ministers of the two belligerents to discuss these questions was degrading—only to be excused from the purity of its motives, the love of peace. A more refined and specious argument is used to prove this relative injustice, drawn from the nature of the contest in which England was engaged; she is represented as fighting for their existence; and any injuries incidental to the measures adopted by her in the prosecution of this cause ought to have been borne without repining by neutrals whom she did not intend to injure. I have yet to learn the difference between British and French ambition. I have not yet seen, and the history of latter times does not show, the evidence of the justice of the cause of Great Britain. The simple statement of the dispute between the rival Powers is, that France, not satisfied with stretching her giant arms over the continent of Europe, desired to partake of the dominion of ocean. Great Britain, riding triumphantly on the mountain wave, wished her power and influence to extend to the centre of the Continent. In the desire of lawless power; in the perfect disregard of the morality of the means by which these ends were to be accomplished, a feather will turn the balance between them. The means of effecting their objects were easily found. France, having no power on the ocean, was contending for the liberty of the seas. England, destitute of Continental influence, was contending for the liberty of the Continent. In the prosecution of their darling project, armies covered the Continent until their march was stopped by the barrier of Russian steel. England by her naval superiority has reduced all the valuable colonial possessions of the Continental Powers, and is now in the quiet enjoyment of the bloodless conquests. In the increase of the means of sustaining the contest, England had far exceeded France at the commencement of the first campaign against Russia. The true interest of the United States was that the two rivals should remain in the same state, or that the overgrown power of each should be lessened. There is nothing in the cause of either that demanded our sympathy or claimed our forbearance. But we are told that the naval supremacy of Great Britain is necessary, not to her preservation alone, but to the preservation of the liberties of the world. It was the only barrier to the universal dominion of the Corsican. Europe would first be desolated by his legions, and then we should have been swallowed up in the vortex of his ambition. I will not deny the necessity of naval superiority to the safety of Great Britain, although such denial is made by some of her own politicians; but modern experience has shown that the march of the destroyer may be stayed on the land without the assistance of her naval force. What services were rendered at Moscow by her naval armament? How did it promote success at the battles of Leipsic and of Dresden? Neither troops nor any of the means of annoyance were prevented from reaching the scene of action from France; nor could this naval Power afford facility to the transportation of any of the muniments of war to the allied Powers. Sir, it must require something more than the folly of dotage to assert it was necessary; to prove it is impossible. The talisman of French invincibility was broken by other and by nobler means. The generous spirit of patriotism, excited into enthusiasm by the invasion of his native land in the rugged Russian, first crippled the giant. The perfect union of the allies, pressed together by the might of their fears, will, if governed by true policy, confine him to his ancient cell. That British naval supremacy is necessary for the security of the United States is a libel upon the virtue and valor of this people. The people of these States hold the precious inheritance of their forefathers by a nobler tenure and a better title. They hold it as a grant from Heaven, purchased by the generous blood of the purest men the world ever saw, never to be relinquished while a drop of that is found in the veins of the existing race. The invaluable blessings secured by the valor of our ancestors would cease to be dear, if they depended upon any Power for their preservation but that of the Divinity.

FEBRUARY, 1814.

The Loan Bill.

H. OF R.

[The House then adjourned. On the following day, February 23, Mr. SHERWOOD, of New York, explained the remarks to which Mr. FORSYTH alluded yesterday. He did not say no valuable lives had or would be lost in this contest; but that the numbers would not be great, as there were few exposed to its perils.]

Mr. FORSYTH said, I certainly understood the gentleman to express the sentiment imputed to him; I rejoice, however, that he has corrected this erroneous impression; although I cannot admit the propriety of the remark he has made, it is certainly much less reprehensible than the one I believed had escaped his lips. I ought perhaps, Mr. Chairman, to apologise to the Committee for occupying a moment of their time in the serious discussion of the claims set up by Britain and some of her apologists in this country to the protectorship of the religion and the liberty of the world. A claim contradicted by all past history and by the events daily passing before our eyes. The delusions of self-love may palliate or excuse the weakness of such a belief in the subjects of Great Britain, but we look in vain for the means of palliation or excuse to the American believers of this egregious folly. I am not so totally ignorant of the human heart as to believe that any observations will have any effect upon wilful credulity. You appeal in vain to the reason and feeling of men who are not convinced of the existence of facts by plain and palpable evidence. You may as well "whisper soft nonsense in dead beauty's ear." All the avenues to conviction are blocked up by malignant prejudice. Ambition sits brooding like an incubus upon their bosoms, stifling the feeble wailings of reason and the stropger cries of public virtue. It will require the miraculous intervention of Divine goodness to correct their errors and reform their hearts—a miracle whose example is not to be found in the history of religion. It is indeed recorded that the interference of Divinity once poured the light of Heaven on the dark eye of the blind; but it is not recorded that omnipotent power ever shed the light of truth upon that orb which was willfully closed to prevent the admission of its rays. But the days of miracles are past; reason is our only guide, and those who abandon her direction must be left to the punishment of their disobedience. To convince them is impossible; they will die in their sins, “unanointed and unannealed,” condemned by the present race, and execrated in future times. It may be asked why should arguments be answered or a reply attempted on a subject on which the evidence is full and the mind already satisfied. These things have been gravely urged, and have proceeded from high authority. The honorable members of the minority who have expressed these sentiments have not the honor of originating them. They first issued from the lips of the Executive Magistrate of the ancient and extensive Commonwealth of Massachusetts. To him belongs the high honor of discovering that Britain was the preserver of human liberty, the bulwark of our religion. Observations proceeding from such sources deserve examination, and if there was no other reason for this examination, I would make it to prevent a repetition of the boast of a gentleman from New York, (Mr. GROSVENOR,) applied to other arguments of equal weight, that they had been urged and had not been met. These have been urged and I shall treat them as they deserve. To what period of the history of her Government are we to look for the evidence of her anxiety to preserve or perpetuate the blessings of civil liberty, or to extend that religion which teaches peace on earth and good will to man? I speak of the Government and not of the people. Like all other great and wealthy nations the dark page of her history is but a record of human turpitude, occasionally illuminated by brilliant actions and adorned by the services of virtuous men. Eternally struggling for a remnant of liberty themselves, the people had neither leisure or inclination to assist other nations in a similar conflict. Mingling in the turmoil of Continental warfare, the object has been to preserve the possessions of the Crown, or to assist some of their ambitious allies to plunder the surrounding nations. Her religion has been a source of dreadful persecution. The stake and the fire were the portion of the Catholic and the Protestant, as the religion of their monarch changed. It must not be forgotten that the reformation of religious abuses in England owed its success to the adulterous love of the tyrant Henry, the defender of the faith—he preferred the roses on the cheek of beauty to the consecrated rose of the Pope. Refining upon the cruelty of Procrustes, he burned with the same faggots him who believed too much and him who believed too little. But we may be told that it is in modern times that these new crusaders have commenced their holy warfare. In what portion of her extensive Empire are we to look for the proof? Ask the unhappy inhabitant of the peninsula of India whether his condition has been rendered happier, his religious opinions purified, by the humanity and magnanimity of Britain. If his virtuous indignation at the insulting inquiry will permit him to answer, he will point to the desolated fields of his once terrestrial paradise; he will recall to your remembrance the period not long passed when the air was filled with the cries of his unhappy countrymen dying of famine from the accursed avarice of these lovers of the human race; when the tide of the Ganges and the Burampooter, swollen with putrid carcases, rushed more wildly to the ocean to hide their polluted streams in the interminable wave. But these crimes are no doubt amply atoned for by subsequent benefits and the substitution of the pure system of our religion for theirs. The oppression has only become systematic, but it is oppression still. The pagoda of the Brahmin may have been levelled to the earth, but the temple of Jesus has not risen in its stead.

The distant region of India may not be considered as the proper sphere for the exertion of the energies of Government in favor of religion and liberty. Nearer home, within the immediate influence of its authority, no doubt religious purity and civil liberty are to be found in full perfection. Ireland furnishes the commentary upon this text. The Catholic Irishman who dares to offer up his sacrifices to Heaven on an altar of a form different from the one prescribed; who approaches the throne of grace in a manner most consonant to his own ideas of the divine nature; is marked as an outcast from society, not indeed to be the victim of sanguinary cruelty, but as one to whom no political power is to be intrusted—is deprived by statute even of the privilege of shedding his generous blood in defence of his beloved Erin. Modern times exhibit no instance of such inconsistency as that afforded by England, who, professing to defend the Catholic faith in Spain and Portugal, makes it the cause of the most degrading distinctions among her own people. The Spaniards and Portuguese who die in battle are heroes and martyrs—the Catholic Irishman lives a bigot and a slave. But, sir, I would ask, what is meant by our religion? The Constitution of the United States knows no such terms. The object of our Government is to regulate the relations of man as a member of the society of men. It presumes not to interfere between the Creator and the created. It gives unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's—it leaves unto God the things that are God's. Perhaps we may be told that it is the Christian faith that is to be preserved from destruction. Is it the faith prescribed by the sycophantic Parliament of Henry, or is it the pure faith of the Christian, by whatever sect or name it may be known? The same doctrines taught by their divine author are independent of and above all temporal power. True piety, like the humble taper of the peasant's cottage, throws light and cheerfulness around its tenement of clay. He who possesses it asks and needs no earthly support. His hopes, his consolations, and his dependence, are on "another and a better world." If by our religion is meant that Phariasaical spirit which prompts its votary to set up exclusive claims to morality and virtue, which sends them even to the throne of mercy with proud thanks that they are not as other men are, the sooner its destruction is accomplished the greater will be the benefit to the human race. If this spirit of religion deserves to be supported by human power, Jesus of Nazareth was an impostor and a knave, and Mahomet the true prophet of the living God.

The atrocities of the present war are of themselves sufficient to produce conviction on minds, ordinarily constituted, of the perfect disregard of the British Government to religion and humanity. I will not detain you by any detail of these enormities. I do not desire to excite resentment or inspire detestation by a recital of the barbarities which have been committed in different parts of the Continent by the armies and allies of England. But we may inquire how far religious Governments can be justified in employing the means of defence and offence, which involve in their destructive progress the man, the woman, and the infant; which spares neither age, sex, or condition; which riots with equal joy on the spoils of the armed enemy or wounded prisoner. We are told by the gentleman from New York (Mr. GROSVENOR) that the employment of the Indians was justifiable—that he would have adopted the same means. The state of war is certainly a destruction of the ordinary rules which govern nations in their conduct to each other. Even this state, however, has rules which generous nations implicitly obey; rules violated by the employment of a force whose destructive effect cannot be controlled. The effect of the employment of this species of annoyance had been proved by past experience. During the Revolutionary war it was denounced in the Parliament of Great Britain as destructive and odious. Modern improvements are visible on this subject. In England at this day it is matter of boast and joy that the red man mingles in battle by the side of his white friend. The imagination is delighted by the picturesque effect of the tomahawk darkening by the side of the glitter of the bayonet—by the rude dress of the savage viewed in conjunction with the splendid costume of the disciplined soldier. The groans of the scalped victim are no longer permitted to strike upon the ear—it is delighted by the dramatic effect of the yell of the savage filling the air, in combination with the shout of the civilized barbarian. I envy no man's feelings who can believe the employment of an Indian force justifiable. The conclusion, however, may be drawn without the fear of refutation, that it is not an evidence of the regard of Christianity in those who adopt it.

We are informed by an honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, that our sympathies for Spain ought to have prevented the declaration of war: Spain, fighting in a cause holy and sacred as the cause of our own Revolution, was injured by our attempt to resist encroachments upon our rights. There is no man who does not wish success to the Spaniards. But, sir, when we are called upon to make sacrifices and submit to injustice on their account, it becomes necessary to examine the nature of the contest and the probable consequence of the success of the parties engaged in it. What is that cause, which has been compared to our Revolutionary struggle? It is the cause of pride, not of principle. Pride, which having its foundation among the generous feelings of the human heart, may inspire admiration and excite sympathy, but which is rejected by reason. The memorable siege of Saragossa was sustained, the immortal Palafox died, not to extend or preserve the liberties of the people, but for the paltry privilege of choosing the puppet who was to sit upon the throne. At the commencement of the memorable struggle Spain was as completely governed by French councils as if she had been an integral part of the Empire. All her resources were at the command of the Emperor. Napoleon might give greater stability to his power, but immediately he was to gain nothing by the change of Kings, but the gratification of his family pride. Wonderful and important controversy, whether the descendant of a Frenchman or a Corsican should sit upon the throne, whether the political automaton should be of the ancient or the new dynasty, a Bourbon, or a Bonaparte; of a family whose ancestors had usurped power in times long past, or of one who had grasped it with their own hands in the present days! And what was the consequence of the struggle which ensued? The resources of Spain became the property of Britain; no other effect was produced than a change of masters. What difference between the dominion of one or the other Power? The people obtain no privileges and the United States derive no benefits. To us it cannot be important, whether the wires are moved by an English or a French juggler; whether the despatches of Spain are issued by Castlereagh or Bassano. The comparison of this with our Revolution, is odious and unjust profanation to the ashes of Washington and his contemporary patriots. The American people fought for their own privileges—the Spaniards for the privileges of their rulers. Our fathers fought for the right of self-government; for freedom, political and religious; they for the choice of the foot which is to trample on their necks. The principles of our contest seem to be as little understood as the limits of Constitutional opposition. In the cause of Great Britain, in the situation of the world, in the affairs of the Peninsula, there was nothing to demand or require our forbearance to seek redress even for incidental injuries. But were the Orders in Council really intended to injure France, and France only? Far from it. The decrees, of which they pretended to be retaliatory, were inoperative and useless. It was the boast of the British Government that they were futile and impotent. No, sir, the object of this system of retaliation upon France, was to foster British at the expense of neutral commerce. The pretence to cover this object was the decrees of France. Flimsy, indeed, but still sufficient for a Government which desires to cover, if it does not conceal, its real intentions from the public view.

I will not turn to the dog-eared volumes of the public documents to show the correctness of this position; I will rely upon the declaration of two persons of great authority on this subject—Perceval and Castlereagh. I might repeat the idea expressed on a former occasion by a gentleman of New York, that the admission of your adversary is the best evidence of the existence of any fact which is sought to be proved. In 1807, Mr. Perceval recommended this system to the then Ministers, and was seconded by Lord Castlereagh. Mr. Perceval said:

“You might say that no goods should be carried to France except they first touched at a British port. They might be forced to be entered at the custom-house, and a certain entry imposed which would contribute to enhance the price and give a better sale in the foreign market to your commodities.”

The object is here distinctly avowed: it is not to injure France, but to give a better sale to English commodities in foreign markets by diminishing the fair gains of neutral commerce, by levying a tax upon neutral vessels in British ports. What was the pretext? Gentlemen may say, our submission to French encroachment. Such encroachments had not been made on our commerce, or, if made, were not known in this country at the time the first order was issued. Lord Castlereagh, in the debate already alluded to, shows that a pretext could be found whether we were included in the operation of the French decrees, or were specially excepted from their effects. I will use his own words. Speaking of the decree of Berlin, he says:

“Since the publication of this decree, which had at first been general as to all nations, some communications had taken place between the American Minister in this country and the French Government, in consequence of which some practical relaxation of the decree had taken place. This was one ground why we should look upon America with jealousy; it was an aggravation that she had by a secret understanding with the French Government contrived to take her shipping out of the operation of the decree that was at first general.”

Our submission to a decree which did not affect us—a decree admitted to be useless—was sufficient to justify retaliation; being exempted from its practical effect, was an aggravation which justified the same system! Is it unfair under these circumstances to conclude that these orders would have been issued had the decrees of France never existed? Some other pretext equally plausible could have been imagined, and would have been defended here. We are not at this day to learn that the real motives of the acts of that Government are as opposite to those avowed as Heaven is to Hell. True to their principles, Perceval and Castlereagh were no sooner admitted into the Ministry than the plan previously recommended by them was acted upon. What was their theory out of Administration was their practice in it. The order of November was substantially what had been pressed upon the former Ministry when America was exempted from the operation of the French decrees. It may be imagined that this plan was bottomed upon some alleged submission to the decrees, or the aggravation of an exemption from their effect. In the debate on the subject of the orders of November, instances of the execution of the French decrees are indeed mentioned, but they are confined to the countries subject to French arms. The occurrences at Hamburg are chiefly relied upon. But what is conclusive upon this point is, that they were persisted in after the excuse was taken away. Canning, in 1812, said the Orders in Council had lost their retaliatory character, were no longer to be justified upon the principles upon which they were issued. What said the Minister? His answer is to be found in the letter of Mr. Russell in March, 1812. The language of the British Minister here, corresponding with that answer, extinguished all hope of avoiding a contest; we were told in language not to be mistaken, that these violations of the rights of the nation would continue until neutral commerce was placed by France on its ancient footing; until the continental system was abandoned. Under these circumstances what was the duty of the Administration of a free people? Continue to endure and to complain? To restrict commerce and to threaten vengeance; to pursue the “tinkering” system, or to resort to arms? On this subject, hesitation would have been criminal. Honor, justice, and generous policy, pointed out the course to be pursued, and their commands were obeyed. Why was England selected? The answer is at hand. With her all hope of redress by negotiation was at an end. With her adversary expectation was still alive. Faint indeed was that expectation. The progress of our negotiation had been artfully, infamously, if you please, retarded; but the Administration, as in its conduct to Great Britain, clung to the hope of finally effecting their just objects without a resort to arms. If in our intercourse with these two Powers a stronger language and a bolder tone had been used, I confess my satisfaction would not have been diminished. But in Governments as with individuals; the form is nothing when the substance is preserved. There was, however, another cause of war. The impression of our seamen, native and naturalized. We are repeatedly told, emphatically told, that Great Britain does not claim the right of impressing native Americans. It is true she does not claim the right, she only persists in the practice. No great injury is said to be done by a few errors on a subject on which to avoid error is next to impossible. The American impressed is discharged when he proves his nativity. The opinion of a foolish midshipman or a surly officer is evidence sufficient to make an American a sailor of His Majesty. Evidence authenticated and formal can alone, after a process of years, restore him to his country. I say nothing of the hardships he endures during this purgatorial probation. It is enough for him to know and feel that while his countrymen are free he is a slave. It has been urged on this subject that the habeas corpus act afforded the means of relief. Of all arguments this is the most supremely ridiculous. The habeas corpus act to relieve a sailor shifted from vessel to vessel, and clime to clime! To-day at Cape Horn, to-morrow at the Cape of Good Hope; at one time scorching under a tropical sun, at another freezing in the polar regions. Even if within the reach of such relief, how is he to procure the necessary evidence? This is worse than mockery. But where is the difference between native and naturalized seamen? They are equally bound to obey the laws of the United States; they are entitled to the same protection. The Constitution authorized our naturalization laws, and the Government is bound by every obligation of honor and justice to protect those who have been incorporated into our political society, even though they may have had the good fortune first to see the light in the dominions of a King. It is not now a question whether the laws on this subject are dictated by sound policy; the only inquiry is, what is the duty of the Government to persons thus circumstanced. The first great duty is that of protecting their persons. There is no escaping from the force of this obligation without disgrace. The impressment of seamen was specially stated as cause of war, not to swell the list of imaginary grievances, not to blacken the character of our adversary, as has been suggested here, but as a ground of serious complaint, a practice affecting the vital principle of independence. The doctrines contended for by the Government have been called novel doctrines, and to deeply damn them they have been called French doctrines. It is said that the idea of France that a vessel is a floating colony is adopted here. I will not detain the Committee by an attempt to show that this doctrine is not of the present day, or to express my contempt for this or any other instance of our exertion to excite prejudice, when reason only ought to be addressed. But I will show that this doctrine is as old as the Government of our country. The first President, whose name I cannot pronounce without reverence, General WASHINGTON, contended for the doctrine that the flag of the United States should cover and protect all those who sailed under it, with the exception of enemy soldiers or deserters. Mr. Jefferson, in 1792, under the direction of the purest and most virtuous Chief Magistrate ever given by a kind Providence to a grateful nation, writes to Mr. Thomas Pinckney—"The simplest rule will be, that the vessel being American shall be evidence that the seamen on board her are such." The same rule, almost in the same words, is suggested to Mr. King in 1796, with this addition, that "humanity as well as interest powerfully plead for its establishment, at least on the high seas." This rule covers seamen of every class, not as an unforeseen consequence, but an effect intended to be produced. Government then insisted that their flag should protect native Americans and naturalized Americans, originally British subjects. It demanded still more, that it should protect British subjects not naturalized. In the letter already quoted is to be found the following passage. After enumerating the persons about whom there could be no dispute, Mr. Pickering writes—

"The fourth class consists of British born subjects; but who or many of whom may have become citizens subsequent to the Treaty of Peace, or who hereafter may be admitted to the rights of citizens. It is this class alone about whom any pretence of right to impress can be made. With regard to these, it may be attempted to protect them, as well in time of war as of peace, in the following cases: First, when they shall have served in American vessels public or private for the same term in which foreigners serving in British vessels would acquire the right of British subjects, which is understood to be three years; or, secondly, if so much cannot be obtained, when these persons originally British subjects shall have resided five years in the United States, and been formally admitted to the rights of citizens according to our laws."

I pass over the intermediate correspondence on this subject to the letter of a man who stands at the head of the party called Federal in the United States, to whose intellectual energy no praise can do justice; whose authority will not be disputed by a party who feel and acknowledge his superior endowments. In his letter to Mr. King of the 20th of September, 1800, the Chief Justice, then Secretary of State, says:

"The impressment of our seamen is an injury of very serious magnitude, which deeply affects the feelings and honor of the nation." "The right to impress those who were British subjects has been asserted, and the right to impress those of every other nation has not been disclaimed; neither the one practice or the other can be justified."

"The United States require positively that their seamen, who are not British subjects, whether born in America or elsewhere, shall be exempt from impressment."

"The case of British subjects, whether naturalized or not, is more questionable; but the right to impress them is denied. The practice of the British Government itself may certainly, in a controversy with that Government, be relied on. The privilege it claims and exercises ought to be ceded to others. To deny this, would be to deny the equality of nations, and to make it a question of power, and not of right."

These are the doctrines of former times, and nothing further has been claimed by the present Administration. Revile your Chief Justice; abuse former Administrations for these attempted innovations of the law of nations; go to the tomb of Washington and upbraid his sacred ashes for these French abominations. Living, he did not escape the charge of French influence; why should he be spared when dead? You cannot upbraid the present Administration for these claims, without including in your reprobation those who gave them birth. It is said that the impressment of our seamen was not of itself sufficient cause of war. I do not pretend to assert that war would have been declared had this been the only cause, but that it would have justified the declaration cannot be questioned. A practice which produces injuries of known magnitude, which deeply afflicts the feelings and the honor of the nation, is certainly justifiable cause of war. This war may have been impolitic and premature in its declaration, from the want of preparation or any other cause, but no one can shelter his opposition to any measure necessary for its prosecution, under the plea of its injustice, without forfeiting his claims to public respect.

The second ground of excuse or justification used is, that it was unjust to continue the war after the repeal of the Orders in Council, alleged to have been the only cause of war. This allegation is denied. These orders were not the only cause of war. Without attempting to show the policy and necessity of settling all the points of dispute, I will examine how far Great Britain exhibited a disposition to do us justice in her act of repeal. An indifferent spectator of such a contest between two nations, when told that the injuring party had given the strongest proof of her good faith and love of peace, would conclude that the injustice complained of had ceased; that ample security was provided against a repetition of the injury, and remuneration for that already inflicted was offered or made. How is the fact? The very act of repeal asserts the justice of the system; insists upon the right of again resorting to it if necessary; affects to confer a favor by its suspension of abandonment. Where was the security against future and similar aggressions? Where was the remuneration for the millions of American property poured into the royal coffers as droits of the Admiralty? Will it be pretended that this remuneration is not to be expected? Will gentlemen who rave about the millions imperially plundered from us by France, quietly surrender to Great Britain the royal portions which have been most iniquitously condemned in her Courts of Admiralty? They ask at the hands of the Administration an account of the property seized under the decree of Berlin, Milan, and Rambouillet. The Administration demand restoration from France, and this demand would have been made, although her banners had floated over prostrate Russia, although her imperial eagles had been planted on the walls of St. Petersburg. We look for the same justice from both these nations. Perhaps the Minister, Admiral Warren, was vested with full powers to supply these deficiencies;—he who came to heal our divisions, to afford our Government a glorious opportunity of stopping the effusion of human blood. He came to inform us that the Orders in Council were repealed; to propose an armistice. If accepted, was he to arrange the subjects of dispute between the two nations? Nothing like it. To arrange with the Secretary of State “as to the revocation of the laws which interdict the commerce and ships of war of Great Britain from the waters and harbors of the United States.” This, and this only, was his errand. Ample atonement had already been made by the repeal for all our injuries of every description and character. Nothing further was or could be expected, and this is the glorious opportunity lost by the Administration; this is what is called by the Legislature of Massachusetts, in their celebrated remonstrance, the signal proof of the good faith and disposition to peace of the British nation. But this repeal was not even a compliance with the promise of her Ministry. They promised an absolute revocation of their Orders in Council whenever the decrees were, by an authentic act of the French Government, publicly promulgated, repealed. When this authentic act on the part of the French Government, which had been shamefully withheld or fraudulently antedated, was promulgated, they comply with their promise by a repeal in June, which was to take effect in the August succeeding. What was the reason of this procrastination to do justice; of this violation of their engagement? The events which have since occurred in the North of Europe point with unerring certainty to the cause. France and Russia were disputing about the continuance of the continental system. The Deliverer had not yet determined to deliver himself from the iron grasp of the Imperial Corsican; he had not yet resolved “to set his crown upon a cast and stand the hazard of the die;” before August these facts were to be ascertained. Is it a strained or unfair conclusion to draw from these premises that these circumstances were hoped for? If they occurred, the system could be continued; if they did not happen, it was to be suffered to here expire.

The Administration of this country, which has been represented as plunging the nation unnecessarily into this war; which is represented as seeking for unauthorized excuses for continuing it, overlooked all these evidences of injustice, and considered the overture of Admiral Warren as made in the spirit of peace, and by a Minister having full power to arrange all the matters in controversy. They did not demand, as has been represented here, the abandonment of the right of impressment as a preliminary to negotiation; they demanded the suspension of the practice during the proposed cessation of hostilities. This was, to be sure, a most outrageous and unjustifiable demand. The war which prevented this practice was to cease, and this practice was to be resumed and exercised, because the Orders in Council were to cease in August, if it pleased the Prince Regent. Yet this demand is considered as an unequivocal proof of the bad faith of our rulers, and their disposition to feast on the bloody banquet, by those who see in the conduct of Great Britain signal proofs of her good faith and disposition to peace. An honorable gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. PIRKIN,) addressing you on this subject, has said that the high claims of the Government are now abandoned, now the matter is to be arranged. By an arrangement, the gentleman understands the rights contended for are surrendered. This is certainly a new discovery in the diplomatic science. Heretofore, I had understood, that whenever the rights or the claims of independent nations clashed, the only mode was an arrangement, which was understood to give to each the rights it respectively claimed, or such a relaxation on each side as to prevent future collisions in their exercise. It seems the superior experience of the gentleman has discovered that this is not the effect. But if an arrangement is a surrender of right, and such an arrangement is made, Great Britain, a party to it, must abandon her claims; and this, we are told, will never be done. In the letter of Mr. Monroe to Admiral Warren, which has been frequently quoted as affording evidence of the desire of the Administration to continue the war, this cabalistic word arrangement, which it seems is synonymous with abandonment of our claims, is used, and the basis upon which it can be made is suggested.

The Loan Bill.

Either the Administration was then prepared to abandon a right for the sake of peace, or they are not yet prepared to surrender it. I leave the choice to those who have involved themselves in the contradiction of such unwarranted assertions. The conduct of the Administration has been uniform and consistent. They asked of Admiral Warren what is still asked at the hands of the British Government; what must be granted at the risk encountered of continuing the contest for one hundred years.

I come now, sir, to the last and most extraordinary ground assumed by the minority—the impracticability of attaining the objects of the contest. These objects are the preservation of the property and persons of American citizens from unjust violation on the common highway of nations. And is it seriously asserted that this cannot be effected? If we are, indeed, so weak and worthless as not to be able to protect our citizens in the enjoyment of these fundamental rights, let the fact be proved by experience, and the people will apply the remedy. The Declaration of Independence will be torn to atoms, and its fragments scattered on the winds; the Constitution, the model of perfection to human institutions, will be reduced to ashes; perhaps from its embers a better order of things may arise. I have no apprehension on this subject; our demands, to the extent to which the Administration are bound to go, will be granted whenever it is the interest of our enemy to quit the contest; whenever it is shown that the hopes of division in our country are delusive. On that part of the dispute which relates to impressment, we are informed that Great Britain cannot yield to our demands without endangering her existence. Her existence does not depend, I presume, upon the practice of impressing our seamen; and we have, at all times, been ready to take away the excuse for its continuance, by refusing to employ British subjects. Peace can be concluded without surrendering or jeopardizing their interest or ours. It is indifferent what the arrangement may be with regard to foreigners; but with regard to our own citizens, whether native or naturalized, their security must be stipulated, or we quit the field with a wound incurable, for it affixes a stigma on the national honor.

There are other objections urged, not particularly applicable to this loan, but to all others the Government may require. A gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SHEFFEY) has taken infinite pains to prove the incapacity of the people to lend: his whole argument turned upon the supposed want of circulating medium. I do not pretend to accurate information on the subject of the financial concerns of my own country, much less of those of other nations. But this doctrine is contrary to what I understand to be well-founded opinions upon this subject. The experience of Great Britain is, however, conclusive against the soundness of his assumed position. Her loans have quadrupled the amount of her circulating medium, and yet no difficulty has ever occurred to prevent them from being obtained. Two facts to which the gentleman referred in support of his doctrines, I must beg leave to controvert. In the first, there is a fatal mistake in the statement; in the second, the conclusion drawn from its existence is fallacious. We have been informed that the slaveholders of Georgia have no money to lend, or no doubt it would have been advanced for the support of this righteous and necessary war. I might be excused for some remarks upon this sneer of the Representative of slaveholders upon the people by whose kindness I have the honor to address you on this floor; but, in truth, such feeble attempts at severity, if they ever deserved notice, have long since lost their claims to distinction by hackneyed use. The people of Georgia are firmly convinced of the justice, the necessity, and the policy of the war, and they have proved their devotion to its principles by advancing their treasure and shedding their blood. It is in vain to say that the money loaned in Georgia was loaned by the banks. The stock of the banks is the property of the citizens—the loan subscribed is paid with their money and for their use. They have more to be applied to the same purpose; and the extent of their exertions will be limited only by the extent of their power. It is with pride I call the attention of the honorable member from Virginia, and all others, to the contrast exhibited by the conduct of the people of Georgia and that of their Northern brethren, who are not slaveholders. When called upon to perform military services, they were not stopped by an imaginary line in the performance of their duty. No Chinese wall was interposed by prejudice and policy to the accomplishment of their object. They did not stop with an enemy in view, to settle, under the influence of dishonorable fears, the limits of their Constitutional obedience. The other fact to which I have alluded, is taken from Virginia. It is that the State Legislature have been obliged to increase the capital stock of the Bank of Virginia, as an inducement to the postponement of the payment of the debt due by the State to the Bank. From the peremptory call of the Bank upon the Legislature for the payment of the debt and the subsequent arrangement, the conclusion is drawn, that the Bank will not be able to advance money to the General Government. I would ask if the increase of the capital stock will not increase the capacity to make loans either to the State Government or to the United States? But can it be possible that the gentleman should have overlooked the inextricable difficulty in which he is involved? There is capital enough in Virginia—there is capital to be employed in manufactures—there is capital waiting to be employed in commerce when a change of circumstances will permit; but there is no capital to be employed in loans to Government! Even, according to his own opinions, if the loan is not subscribed, it will not be for the want of the necessary capital. A gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. HANSON,) perceiving the dangerous ground upon which this argument would place the Opposition, has denied that there is want of the means of making loans, but that this loan cannot be had from the want of faith in the Government—the public credit is destroyed. [Mr. H. explained his observations—he did not say that the public credit was destroyed, but that the public faith had been violated; that the measures pursued by the Administration would, if continued, destroy the public credit.] I have no desire to misstate the argument; nor do I perceive very clearly the difference in its force or application, as stated by me, or explained by himself. If the public faith has been violated, the public credit must be impaired. If it is the tendency of a system of measures to destroy public credit, the work of destruction commences with the birth of the system. The symptoms of decay are no doubt immediately visible. Time and experience, the best possible criteria of the correctness of financial theory, have already shown the fallacy of similar opinions, and to the same unerring test I am willing to leave the decision of this dispute. The year which is now rolling rapidly over us will not pass without again convincing gentlemen of the folly of their prediction—even though, in the true spirit of modern prophecy, all their power should again be exerted to produce their fulfilment.

But why is this formidable opposition made to this bill? If the object cannot be obtained, it is a dead letter. The supreme wish of the gentlemen will be accomplished. The Administration will be embarrassed. A peace dictated by Great Britain will be the consequence. The victim, bound hand and foot, will be placed on the altar, and Great Britain will no doubt, with her usual magnanimity, use the knife of sacrifice, in the opinions of the minority, to cut the cords by which the victim is confined—in ours, to shed its blood as a propitiatory offering to the god of her idolatry.

In obedience to the fashion of this Hall, I will indulge myself in some concluding observations on the nature of the opposition to the present system pursued by the Government. The right of opposition in our country is holy. Every man who does not violate the Constitution or the laws is the judge of the moral propriety of his own conduct. I am no casuist, capable of ascertaining the depravity or correctness of human conduct by a nicely graduated scale of moral proportions. Attempts of this kind if not improper are at least useless. I shall not therefore trouble you with any remarks upon moral treason, or the warmth which an attempt at its definition has produced. All opposition in free Governments has for its end a change of public opinion, and by this means a transfer of the power, which is dependent upon it, from the hands of the incumbents to the principal agents opposed to their system. The object is honorable—the end to be accomplished noble. What can be more honorable than to guide and direct public opinion—what more noble than the enjoyment of the confidence, the guidance of the destinies of a free and virtuous people! But the importance and greatness of the object does not justify every means of obtaining it. Like all other human pursuits, its character is fixed by the manner in which it is conducted. Have the means used by the minority since the commencement of the war been worthy of their object—have they been virtuous or vicious? I appeal to the facts upon record, and leave the decision to the people whose judgment is to be final.

An honorable gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. WEBSTER) has said, that the minority know the limits of Constitutional opposition—beyond these they will not travel—up to them they will march fearlessly. "They are not of a school in which insurrection is taught as a virtue. They will not seek promotion through the paths of sedition, nor qualify themselves to serve their country in any of the high departments of its Government, by making rebellion the first element of their political science." I admire the manliness of the sentiment, and the beauty of the language in which it is expressed. The one is a proof of the strength of his understanding—the other of the purity of his taste. But how is this declaration to be reconciled to other remarks which have been expressed here? We have been amused with critical dissertations upon the strength of the Eastern States—upon their abhorrence of oppression. Custom-houses and custom-house officers have been threatened with destruction. Is physical strength to settle the great Constitutional questions which have been raised in the present day? The offices and officers created and appointed by the constituted authorities, can only be put down by the point of the bayonet! Gentlemen say they do not advise the people to pursue this course. They only tell them such a course would be justifiable. They do not recommend the recurrence to force, but they say, if the Constitution is violated, such force is proper and necessary. And we have been told more than once, that we have violated the Constitution and oppressed the people of the East. Such doctrines are not reconcilable with the opinions of the gentlemen from New Hampshire; whatever may be his case, some of the party of which he is a member are willing to make rebellion, if not the first, at least one of the elements of their political science. What has become of that Judiciary heretofore considered the safeguard of the Constitutional rights of the people—the check upon Legislative usurpations? Are its members changed—have they become time servers and sycophants to the dominant party—do they fear the responsibility of deciding on such important questions? The members of the court are not changed. The idol of the Opposition is still head of the judicial tribunals. The judges are not tremblers or time servers. That court which on a question of mere jurisdiction travelled out of the record to express an opinion against the Administration of their country, will court the responsibility of pronouncing judgment against them, if they are not forbidden by principles too strong to be reasoned down.

It is impossible to leave this subject without adverting to the conduct of a portion of the Legislature of Massachusetts, the direct tendency of which has been to lead to a separation of the Union. Inflammatory resolutions, violent complaints of the injustice and oppression of the General Government have been heaped upon each other, to stimulate public prejudice, to prepare the public mind for stronger and more decided steps. Think not, sir, I advert to these things from any apprehension that these schemes will be effectual. I mention them to express my profound contempt for their impotent madness.

The leaders of these factious spirits are prevented from carrying their wishes fully into operation by two powerful divinities—interest and fear. The love of the Union is yet sufficiently strong, in defiance of artifice and falsehood, to strike down the ruffian who dares to lift his sacrilegious hand against the Constitution by which that Union is to be perpetuated—the love of the Union among the people of the East themselves. These infatuated leaders have not the nerve to carry into execution their mad designs. He who cowers under the falcon eye of an indignant adversary, will not court the fiery glance of angry steel.

But if there is to be found a leader who to the necessary corruption, and to deadly ambition, adds the nerve requisite to perform “the firstlings of his heart;” if by his influence madmen enough should enlist under his banners, the eye of reason can look fearlessly beyond the immediate consequences to the final result. That result is not dubious. The elements of society may be set in motion, may mingle in dreadful strife; the earth may rock to its deep foundations, but not one stone of the fabric of our Government will be shaken from its place. Dreadful will be the consequences—horrible the scenes which will probably ensue. The fairest region of our country may become a “desert wild.” The poor man’s cottage and the rich man’s palace may together be crumbled to dust. The blood of the innocent and the guilty, of the recreant and the brave, may mingle in one common stream—but one consolation is still left to virtue; those who raised the tempest will be the first victims of its fury.

When Mr. FORSYTH had concluded—

Mr. ROBERTSON spoke as follows: Mr. Chairman, I am not surprised at the reluctance of gentlemen to take the floor. I feel sensibly the effects of my own temerity. But if, after the eloquent address of my friend from Georgia (Mr. FORSYTH) I should be so fortunate as to obtain the attention of the Committee, I promise for no great length of time to trespass on their patience. Indeed, I am not desirous of making a long speech; I am not ambitious of that fame which is to be acquired “by holding out to tire each other down.” And if the opinion of Swift be correct, that we speak with facility in the direct ratio of the paucity of our ideas, then is there little credit to be gained by haranguing—

“From morn to noon, from noon to dewy eve—

Various and diffuse have been the subjects presented to our view: many of them foreign to the question under consideration, but all, diversified as they have been by ingenuity, and animated by declamation, of great interest and importance. I do not object to this excursive examination—it has high and ancient authority. Homer proposed to sing Achilles’s wrath, and he gave us the ten years siege of Troy. I will not, however, avail myself of the full extent of my privilege; I will not pass over in silence the subject which has given rise to this debate. It yields in importance to none. It concerns the honor, the existence of the nation. It is not my intention to follow gentlemen through the mad and melancholy mazes of their argument, to prove that funds ought not to be furnished; or that the plan which has been recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means, if adopted, would be ruinous to the resources and credit of the nation. Is the loan necessary, and can it be procured? It is sufficient, in the first place, to answer, that we are at war; that war cannot be carried on without money; that money is its sinew. But gentlemen say that war is unnecessary. Such has not been always the language of Federalists. Previously to the commencement of hostilities, Congress was inundated with memorials from different parts of the United States, particularly from the East—particularly from Massachusetts and Connecticut—expatiating in indignant terms, and painting in vivid colors British injuries and insults inflicted on our commerce and offences to our flag; and pledging their support to whatever measures, listening to their furious counsels, the Government might be induced to adopt. Then, according to the “sainted pilgrims,” the United States were niggards of blood and treasure. Then we were told by a celebrated Jacobin of the East, who held a seat in this House, and who employed himself at that time, as he does now, in bullying the Government, that we “could not be kicked into a war.” But let us admit for a moment that war was not unavoidably commenced; is it true, as is often asserted, that no wish is felt, no effort made to obtain an honorable peace? A slight attention to facts will confute this charge. So soon as information was received of the repeal of the Orders in Council, Mr. Russell was instructed to propose an armistice on terms of perfect justice and reciprocity. This the British Government rejected, and rejected in a manner in the highest degree insulting to America. When the Emperor of Russia, the ally of England, offered his mediation to effect a pacification, it was, although readily accepted by us, unhesitatingly rejected by that Government. Now, at a later period, when the enemy has held out the olive-branch, he is met promptly with corresponding views on our part. But all this is nothing: you lost, say gentlemen, the golden opportunity when you refused to close with the proposition of Admiral Warren. Yes, Admiral Warren proposed an armistice, leaving the seamen of our country, whose rights we took up arms to secure, at the mercy of subaltern officers and drunken press-gangs.

But all our efforts to obtain peace are treated as our efforts were to avoid war. They are misrepresented and derided. The Russian mediation was declared to have been unauthorized by the Russian monarch. Mr. Daschkoff and the Executive fabricated it to amuse and deceive the public! The correspondence on that subject, in all respects so honorable to our Government, lately laid before the world, has covered the authors of these calumnies with dismay and confusion. Yes, the acceptance of the Russian mediation met with the most illiberal opposition, and acceding to the late proposition of the enemy to negotiate, is begging for peace, is striking our flag. Gentlemen will be mistaken in their fears or their hopes. To treat on the proposed basis of "the laws of nations and British maritime rights," is one and the same. Britain has maritime rights, and so has every other independent sovereignty.

The hackneyed charge of French influence has been in a great measure abandoned. Mr. Foster, within the walls of Parliament, where their "friends in Congress" were spoken of, acquits us of this. The Emperor Alexander, now the theme of Federal eulogy, but doomed soon to become the subject of their bitterest hate, says, that "taking pleasure in doing justice to the wisdom of 'the Government of the United States, he is convinced that it has done all that it could do to prevent this rupture."

The uniform conduct of the Administration in the days of the proudest splendor of France, and in those of her comparative depression, alike removed from obsequious yielding or contemptuous exultation, the want of co-operation, the absence of alliance between the two nations, all give the lie to this accusation, so often repeated, so constantly refuted by facts and events.

But admit for a moment, in the face of the clearest evidence, that the war is unnecessary; that it is unjust; that it originated in French influence; that no efforts have been made to bring it to an honorable termination—shall we not defend ourselves? Shall we abandon the country? Is not England at war with us? And ought not the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SHEFFEY) who proposed that we should proclaim that it was not our intention to attack the enemy, also to have provided that the enemy should not attack us? His proposition would at least have been consistent in absurdity.

If, Mr. Chairman, the state of the nation requires funds, can the loan contemplated be obtained? It is on all hands admitted that it can. Certain predictions of eventual national bankruptcy are hazarded; but at present there is no difficulty or danger. On the subject of finance we have witnessed much labor and experienced much fatigue. It has tended to make "confusion worse confounded." In my researches I too have met with a principle, I dare say as true as any we have heard, and infinitely more convenient and apposite. The celebrated Herrenschwand lays it down as a most valuable discovery, "that a regular and constant increase in the expenditure of the Government, is the only true means of insuring a constant progression in the intelligence and enjoyment of the people." The grand secret, then, for increasing the happiness of the people, is for its rulers to spend as much as possible. I cannot say that I entirely agree in opinion with this profound economist, although he is announced to the world by Arthur Young as one of the greatest political geniuses of the age. All I intend is, to show that the subject of finance is intricate; that the greatest men are puzzled, and that the gloomy predictions and dull calculations of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SHEFFEY) ought to be listened to with much doubt and circumspection. For my own part, when I reflect on the never failing series of wars which have convulsed the world, I have been led to suspect that if greater difficulties existed to the procurement of money than is generally experienced, mankind would have no cause to lament the circumstance. But when I perceive that the worst governments, for the worst purposes, have been enabled to prosecute never ending and expensive contentions, I feel encouraged to believe that a virtuous government, for honorable purposes, will not furnish the only example of falling a sacrifice to its enemies, for want of means to defend and support its rights.

But gentlemen oppose the loan because they are anxious to preserve the faith and credit of the nation. But the loan is necessary for that purpose. How else will our contracts be fulfilled; how pay the debts already due; how satisfy the claims of the Army, the Navy? Aware of the inconsistency in which they are involved, they contend that the majority will sacrifice the faith of the public, rather than hazard their popularity by finding ways and means to pay the debt they contract. This doctrine was not for the first time broached in the House. A gentleman now before me, (Mr. PICKERING,) in essays under the signature of his name, contended for the truth of the same principle; this was done to prevent individuals from advancing their money to the Government; not satisfied with this he said, that if the party to which he belonged got into power, the creditors of the nation could with no propriety expect payment of their demands, as the debt had been contracted in consequence of their advancing money to prosecute a war denounced by the Federalists as cruel, unjust, unnecessary. The gentleman is at perfect liberty to speak for himself and his party; he well understands their views, and does them justice. I object to a further extension of his jurisdiction. It is, then, already avowed, that if he and his friends are intrusted with the Government, the debts of the nation will not be paid. This principle strikes at the foundations of society, and it is the open avowal and unqualified support of doctrines so monstrous that keeps, and will, it is devoutly to be hoped, forever keep them in the same feeble and suspected state in which they at present are found. How different was the course of Republican successors of a Federal Administration! Mr. Jefferson in coming into office found an enormous debt of upwards of $80,000,000; much of it had been contracted in the prosecution of measures highly disagreeable to himself and his political friends; most of the evidences of the debt had fallen into the hands of his opponents. No disposition was felt, no hint thrown out calculated to excite alarm; the fame of the country was held too dear to be sacrificed on the altar of revenge. Ample means were provided to satisfy the public creditors; under the auspices of his measures, stock rapidly rose, and the complaint was, that there was too much promptitude in discharging and cancelling the public obligations. The suspicions which gentlemen have thought fit to express are not supported by adverting to the past; they will not be verified by the future conduct of the Government.

Among the various objections which are urged, we are told that we are not interested in the injuries which have given rise to the war; that commerce and seamen, belong not to those who affect to protect them; that the Navy and all its glories appertain to Federalists. They forget that most of the Representatives from the cities and Atlantic coast, voted for the war; and they arrogate claims, in regard to the Navy, to which they are not entitled.

Let us for a moment examine the subject.—General Washington, whose Administration was comparatively free from party, and whose views and principles were very different from those of many by whom his name is often profaned, was for years silent as to a navy. In his addresses at the opening of each Congress that topic was unnoticed. From 1789 to '94 the United States owned no armed vessels. The conduct of the Algerines induced the passage of an act to authorize the President to build four 44-gun frigates. Peace was restored in the Spring of 1795; the perishable materials which had been provided sold, and directions given to finish but two of the 44's and one frigate of 36; this was done. Mr. Wolcott, a Federalist from Connecticut, and then one of the heads of department, proposed that two millions of dollars should be appropriated annually to military purposes and pensions. Give to the Navy a fourth of this sum and the encouragement which was bestowed on this subject will be seen. It is confidently believed that during the eight years of General Washington's administration there was not expended on the Navy of the United States one million of dollars. In his Farewell Address, which contains so many principles of inestimable value to all who admire our form of Government, he says nothing, notwithstanding the wide scope of his remarks, in regard to a navy. His wise and prudent administration terminated; tired with public employment he retired, carrying with him the highest gratitude of his fellow citizens. A new era arrived; high notions of Executive power and consequence succeeded; extravagant and tyrannical opinions, which his virtuous example had long repressed, were now avowed; and Mr. Adams, under the influence of bad men and bad passions, was elected to the high office of the Presidency. It will not be denied that his expenditures were great; they were enormous. In his short career of four years of extravagance and folly, upwards of ten millions of dollars were appropriated to the American marine. But we are not to conclude from this, that the Federal party were actuated by feelings of attachment to a navy; they were governed by some such motive as induced them to wish for an army of fifty thousand men, as gave rise to the alien and sedition laws; for when about to lose their much abused authority, on the last day of their political existence, they passed a law reducing the Navy to thirteen vessels, directing that but six of these should be kept in commission, and that the remainder should be sold or placed in ordinary. Mr. Stoddart, too, who presided over that Department, when called on for his opinion, advised that about $1,200,000 should be actually appropriated for naval purposes. This then seems to have been the cool and dispassionate view of that party; when they were about to resign unwillingly the reins of Government into the hands of their political adversaries, all inducement to profusion had ceased; the real interests of the public were then understood, and that view was taken, by which, if the succeeding Administration be tested, it will be discovered that they have overgone the limit affixed by their predecessors. With what show or color of propriety, then, can the Republicans be reproached with a denial of the utility of a navy; with what show of right can the Federalists affect to monopolize all the glory which it has shed over the country? But it is insisted that the officers are Federal. I have the happiness to be acquainted with some of them, some who have distinguished themselves; others who want opportunity so to do. If they are Federalists they are Americans; they sustain the rights of the nation; they invigorate the arm of the Government. Let the Federalists in civil life or in civil office do the same; let them imitate their patriotic example; let them uphold with their voice what the seaman defends with his arm; it will not be objected to them that they are Federalists, they will share in that glory which the patriot, whatever party name he assume, never fails to enjoy.

An honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. BIGELOW,) not content with the same common topics of censure, has, in terms the most acrimonious, denounced the Government for taking advantage, as he says, of the distressed situation of Spain to possess herself of her territories; forgetful of the gratitude due for her assistance in our time of utmost need—lost to all sympathy for a people engaged in a struggle as honorable as our own Revolution, we have wrested from her our adjoining provinces and added them to our already too extensive dominions. Mr. Chairman, I will not sit silent and hear observations made and doctrines advanced calculated to insult the independence, and endanger the liberty of the State which I have the honor to represent. I cannot listen unmoved to sentiments which go to replace under Spanish vassalage those by whose suffrages I hold my seat in this House. I have another, not a stronger, but a more general motive for setting the gentleman right. It is a wish to rescue the Government—to shield my country from such an unmerited aspersion. Let me not be misunderstood; in speaking of the Government, I do not mean the Executive. The common error of the minority renders this explanation necessary; they forget that they are not in England; they forget that this is not the British Parliament; that our Government does not happily resemble that “most stupendous fabric of human invention.” There, the Executive is the Government—here, the Congress is principally the Government; the high and elevated attributes of Government belong to this body; our Constitution, the pride of America, the reproach of the world, makes the Legislature the “mighty paramount;” its pre-eminence is established, and vain will be the open or secret attempts of the advocates for Executive supremacy to supplant it. So far from the Executive being the Government, I consider it, as well as the Judiciary, as infinitely inferior. Have they power over the Legislature? Are we answerable to the President or judges? Do they not rather act under a dread responsibility to the Representatives of the people? And so it ought to be, and so it must be in all Republics. The law-making principle is essential, indispensable. The other departments are inferior, subject to its control; in short, ministerial.

But to return. The United States acquired Louisiana by treaty. Spain had previously transferred that country by the Treaty of San Ildefonso; she retroceded it to France, “with the same extent it then had in the hands of Spain, and that it had when France possessed it, and such as it should be after the treaties subsequently entered into between Spain and other States.” This is the only manner in which the boundaries of the country are designated. Let us for a moment inquire what they are. The Government of Louisiana is declared, by the grant of Louis XIV. to Crozat in the year 1712, to comprise “all the lands bounded by New Mexico, and by the lands of the English of Carolina; all the establishments, ports, havens, rivers, and principally the port and haven of the Isle Dauphin, &c., with all the rivers which fall directly or indirectly into the Mississippi.” At this period the French had made no settlement on the island of Orleans; the city of New Orleans was founded in 1717; they had established themselves, since the year 1698, at Isle Dauphin, at the mouth of the bay of Mobile, and at different places on the main, from the Perdido to the bay of the St. Louis; the Rio Perdido divided Louisiana from Florida. In 1763 this part of Louisiana, east of the Mississippi, was ceded by France to Great Britain, who by the same treaty acquired Florida from Spain. By the treaty of 1783, England ceded all that part of the former colony of Louisiana, east of the Mississippi, and the old Spanish colony of Florida, under the name of East and West Florida, to Spain; and, as has already been stated, by the Treaty of San Ildefonso in 1800, Spain retroceded to France her ancient colony of Louisiana, who, in 1803, transferred it to the United States.

Louisiana was retroceded to France “with the same extent that it then had in the hands of Spain,” and Spain then possessed the whole of the country which formerly constituted Louisiana, east of the Mississippi to the Perdido, and south of the 31st degree of north latitude, the boundary of the United States, as established by the treaty of 1783.

Louisiana was retroceded, “with the same extent it had when France possessed it,” and France possessed it bounded to the east by the Perdido, and never for a day held it with any other boundary. The other expressions are, “such as should be after the treaties subsequently entered into between Spain and other States.” Now let it be remembered that Spain never made any treaty concerning Louisiana west of the Mississippi, that she made no treaty affecting its eastern limits; the only treaties which she subsequently entered into, are those of 1783 with Great Britain, and of 1795 with the United States. By the first she acquired the Floridas, and by the last recognised the southern boundary of the United States, as established by the treaty of peace between them and Great Britain.

The title, then, of the United States to Louisiana, bounded east by the Perdido, is clear. But Spain thought fit to hold possession till the people of Florida, Americans by birth and sentiment, imitating the example of their forefathers of Massachusetts, rose on their oppressors, and drove them from the land. If excuse were ever necessary for breaking asunder the chains of slavery, they were more excusable than their progenitors; for England had a right of sovereignty, whilst the possession of Spain was an impudent usurpation.

The gentleman says, that he adverted to a law authorizing the President, under certain circumstances, to take possession of East Florida. It is sufficient to reply, that the circumstances, if they occurred, would have fully justified the act, and that the United States have not possessed themselves of any part of East Florida; and what has been the consequence of our forbearance? What effect has been produced on Spain by our magnanimity? I will tell the gentleman. She held possession of a part of the United States, from the year 1783 to '99, subjecting American citizens to her tyranny, and producing inextricable confusion in the disposition of lands to which she had no title. From the year 1803 to 1810 she retained possession of West Florida, which belonged to the United States, subjecting the people to greater evils and more intolerable mischiefs than those which distinguished her government of our country, from the 31st degree of north latitude to the mouth of the Yazoo. Need I speak of her efforts to destroy the Union, by her attempt to bribe and corrupt the people of the West; of the insolence of her Ministers; of her depredations on our commerce; of her robberies of millions of American property in her ports and on the high seas? Shall I call your attention to her more recent and more flagitious conduct in setting the Indians on our frontier inhabitants? Look to the massacre of Fort Mims. I knew the officer well: he was a brave and honest man; he died at his post, as did his gallant little band, in vain efforts to protect hundreds of women and children from the flames of the incendiary savage, or the worse horrors of his scalping knife! And are we to be reproached with injustice to this nation? Where is the catalogue of our offences? But how does it happen that Spain was never an object of Federal admiration till she became the ally of Britain? What was the language of gentlemen a few years ago, when the right of deposit was refused, and the port of New Orleans closed against us by an unauthorized act of the Intendant? Propositions were made in the Senate, and supported by Federalists throughout the nation, for levying an army and seizing on Louisiana. At a later period, disappointment and dismay prevailed in their ranks, when hostilities apparently so probable were prevented on the Sabine. Spain was then the ally of France, and at war with Britain; the United States were then, according to the "sainted pilgrims," niggards of blood and treasure. Louisiana, too, was invaluable; it would be a cheap acquisition at any price; it was worth a war even with Spain, and all its consequences of 20,000 lives and 100,000,000 of dollars. Why, then, this whining about blood and treasure? When Louisiana was in possession of its rightful owner it was to be taken by force, it was of inestimable value, but no sooner had the Administration, adhering to the pacific maxims of virtue and republicanism, obtained the country by treaty, than, with a temerity unprecedented, the minority contradicted all that they had before affirmed. This paradise, this "blissful Eden, blooming with ambrosial fruit of vegetable gold," became at once "a dark Serbonian bog," and the majestic Mississippi, the mother of waters, "abhorred like Styx, the flood of deadly hate." Fifteen millions of dollars was more than it was worth, and no approbation was felt for that arrangement which had saved the effusion of blood, and, among other advantages, secured to our merchants 3,700,000 dollars, for spoiliations committed on our commerce by the French. I would ask the honorable gentleman before me, (Mr. PICKERING,) if these were the spoiliations which he instructed our commissioners at Paris not to insist on reparation for, as an indispensable condition of a treaty then attempted to be formed? As to other objections, and, among them, the destruction of the political importance of the Eastern States by the admission of Louisiana into the Union, it may be sufficient to observe, that the Eastern States had before that event lost their relative importance. In the year 1800 they were entitled to thirty-five Representatives, while the Middle States were entitled to fifty, the Southern to forty-six, and the Western to ten. It is idle, then, to say that this section of the Union had cause to apprehend a state of things which had already occurred. The charge, that the Government has taken advantage of the situation of Spain to possess itself of her territories, is entirely unfounded; and all its measures connected with the acquisition of Louisiana, exhibit an attention to the interests of the United States, and an observance of the principles of fair dealing, which reflect equal credit on its sagacity and honor. But if the honorable gentleman was desirous of arousing feelings of indignation against national rapacity, how could he overlook the flagrant conduct of all the Powers of Europe, and direct his efforts against his own country alone; his own country, the only one on earth against which such charges could not with propriety be made? I do thank my God, that the United States have never violated that justice, that moral sense, which are the strength and power of a people; have never listened to the siren seductions of pride, have never followed the odious examples of civilized Europe. Shall I call your attention to Poland—to the sacrilegious partition of that country? Russia, Austria, and Prussia, with one fell swoop, blotted her forever from the map, annihilated her sovereignty, and deprived her of the "stimulus of a name!" Whilst Catharine was extending the blessings of her Government to the highly-favored Poles, half a million of her subject Calmucks, insensible of the advantages of her mild control, hazzarding, according to the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. SHERFEE,) the appellation of Godwinians, were, with their wives and their children, and their household gods, flying from the banks of the Volga to the foot of the mountains of Thibet, escaping from enlightened and Christian Europe, and throwing themselves for protection on the Pagan mercies of an Asiatic monarch. The great Frederick was not behind his royal associates in proud superiority to the feelings and rights of humanity. Twelve thousand families were forcibly converted to Godwinism, torn from their native country, driven forth from the fertile and delightful plains of Great Poland, and established on sterile rocks and barren lands, for the purpose of peopling his hereditary dominions. To cap the climax of their atrocity, this triumvirate of anointed despots compelled the unhappy victims of their wrath to take oaths of allegiance, to repair to the temple of the Most High to offer up prayers for the prosperity and happiness of their oppressors, and thanksgivings for the blessings which had been bestowed on their country!

FEBRUARY, 1814.

The Loan Bill.

H. OF R.

Since that eventful period Europe has been plunged in wars and anarchy. Why should we be surprised at anything that afterwards occurred? That moral sense so necessary to the tranquillity and peace of the world, was now trodden under foot. What could be expected, but further schemes of aggrandizement! Accordingly, the French Revolution gave rise to the partition treaties of Mantua and Pilnitz. France was to experience the tender mercies which had been shown to Poland. Rousing to a sense of her danger, she drove back the tide of invasion, and, in her turn, overrun Spain, Italy, and Holland, carrying defeat and dismay to the extremest regions of the North, became the arbitress of nations, and the terror of the world. But "there is a point of exaltation from which things recede in a contrary progression:" her conquests have been wrested from her with a rapidity more wonderful than that with which they were made. Her false glory has vanished, as if by the effects of sorcery; and happily for herself and the world, she is once again confined within more reasonable limits.

During this period, how stands the account with the "fast-anchored isle"—"the bulwark of our religion"—"the world's last hope?" What are her claims to these high attributes? Let the cold-blooded robbery of the whole fleet of Denmark—the acquisition of seventy-two millions of subjects in Asia—of possessions in America, Europe, and Africa—tell. While the Continental Powers have been engaged in wars—was fomented by her—she has possessed herself of the Spice Islands, the Cape of Good Hope, the Dutch colonies on the Essequibo, and Demarara in America, the West India islands, Malta, the Grecian Archipelago. She holds Spain, Portugal, Gibraltar, in Europe; the Canadas, in North America; all the ships and colonies of all her enemies and all her friends. Her dominion has extended over the whole world, while she protests, and her admirers in America repeat, that she is actuated by no views of ambition—that she has been waging war merely in her own defence. With this impudent plea, which idiots have believed, she has become powerful, indeed. And, if the proportion of gulls in Europe be as great as in the United States; if it there be deemed necessary for her existence, that she should humble this country; if she be permitted to subsidize Hessians and Brunswickers and Hanoverians—those interesting beings who for years past have so strongly excited our sympathy—effect what she attempted during our rebellion, a negotiation for the services of fifty or one hundred thousand Cossacks, to aid in chastening our insolence for declaring this unjust and unnatural war—we may have occasion for more men and more money, and more exertion, than at present we seem to anticipate.

A singular fact is connected with the effort of the British to hire cut-throats in Russia. Her success was prevented by the French Minister. It would appear, from this, that Spain is not the only nation entitled to our gratitude. But, to the fact, which it was my intention to mention: The Czarina had determined on giving His Britannic Majesty effectual assistance against his rebellious subjects in America. Prince Potemkin, who wished an alliance with England, had the sole management of the affair. Count Panin, the partisan of France, then our friend and ally, formed means to retard the signing of the instrument already drawn up, and produced another project in its place—that of the armed neutrality. Revolving time has brought around a similar state of things; the principles of the armed neutrality again interpose for our safety. The Continental Powers, relieved from their fears of France, will look to the establishment of principles so necessary to their prosperity, and thus coming into collision with England, find her employment nearer home; or, leaving her in the quiet and uninterrupted enjoyment of her commercial monopoly, she will have an opportunity of prowling over the Continent, picking up the well-fleshed bloodhounds of a fifteen or twenty years' war, and disgorging them with her own British and Negro and Indian savages on our country! In speaking thus of her power, I wish not to be misunderstood. I wish to put the nation on its guard against those who would insinuate that the magnanimity, the humanity, the religion, of our enemy, is a guarantee against unusual mischief. We have nothing to fear, but being lulled into a false security. Let us consider Britain as she is—blood-thirsty and perfidious—then there is no "terror in her threats." For one, I will never worship at the altar of this modern Dagon; I will never propitiate by prayer or submission this

I come now, Mr. Chairman, to a subject which, at length, is admitted to be of sufficient importance to be considered. I cannot help thinking that I have some cause of complaint. You may remember, scarce three weeks are past, since I submitted a resolution to appoint a committee to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the exercise of the right of expatriation. Very much to my surprise, it was then, both by my political friends and foes, deemed too insignificant or too mischievous to be entertained with common attention. Gentlemen from either side of the House rushed forward with eagerness to lay the phantom which their own imaginations had created. According to some, it interfered with contemplated negotiations; others thought it in its nature too abstract; others saw in it a violation of the municipal laws of foreign countries; and there were not a few who deduced from it encouragement to desertion, and all kinds of abomination. That proposition must indeed have been an anomaly in politics, which united in opposition to it the Federalism of Massachusetts and the Democracy of Tennessee—the commonly correct understanding of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. OAKLEY,) and the metaphysical mind of my friend from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN.) Yet, so it was. It was convenient to arrest its progress; and this was done by gentlemen who amuse the House with harangues about moral treason, and with abstract disquisitions on what constitutes the difference between legitimate and factious opposition. It was laid upon the table, and there it has been suffered to lie. But, as the scene is changed; as it is now magnified into a consequence as far transcending its real dimensions as it was formerly diminished below them; as the gentleman from New York, before me, (Mr. GROSVENOR,) connecting in one mass expatriation, emigration, allegiance, and retaliation, has been pleased to say it is more momentous than any question which gave rise to the war, or to discussion in this House, infinitely more interesting than impressment itself—I shall, with the good leave of gentlemen, on another occasion, present it again to their consideration. But, dragged as it is now before the Committee, although nothing can result from the examination, I will not pass without notice some of the doctrines which have been advocated by gentlemen in Opposition.

Before proceeding further, I can but express my astonishment that emigration should be the theme of reprobation in any country on earth, and, above all, in the United States of America. Are we not a community of emigrants? Are we not remotely or immediately, all of us, emigrants? One would really suppose that, like the Welch, we had our genealogical trees, and that we could, without difficulty, point to our antediluvian American ancestors. What can be more ludicrous than to find individuals denouncing the principle of emigration, from whose tongues a foreign dialect has not yet worn away—men who, if Holland should rehoist her flag, and practise on the principles of the British, would run a risk, if they dare trust themselves at sea, of being impressed as Dutchmen, just as Americans are mistaken for Englishmen!

An honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. SHEFFEY,) one of the minority, expressing his very high respect for the majority, invites them to go over to that side of the House to which he at present belongs. If I were disposed, on a subject of this kind, to pay attention to any person whatever, certainly the advice of that gentleman would be entitled to much consideration. He has tried both sides, and ought, of course, to be the best judge of their respective merits. But, answering for myself, and, I believe, for my political friends, if we were disposed to go, we should not know how; but, as the gentleman has travelled the road, and knows the way, as he is fond of our company, let him come back.

The gentleman from New York, before me, (Mr. GROSVENOR,) arraigns the honorable gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. McLEAN) for pursuing the course and borrowing the principles of a late pamphlet on the subject of expatriation. Suppose this to be true, although on that, or any other subject, the gentleman is well enabled to think for himself, the essay alluded to reflects much credit on its author. It evinces deep research and great ingenuity, and is written with peculiar elegance and correctness. It is now on the table of the gentleman, and, whilst he has affected to speak of it lightly, it cannot but be observed that he has drawn from it as copiously as he represents the gentleman from Ohio to have done.

The right of expatriation, or emigration, belongs to man. It is derived from the God of nature. He holds it not of Government. That it is a natural right is asserted by almost every writer of eminence. Need I mention Fattel, Burlamaqui, Wicquefort, and Bynkershoek? Such was the opinion of Greece and Rome. The gentleman from New York does not deny it, and, after a laborious research, no doubt, discovers what he might have learned from the little volume before him that Rutherford stood alone as the advocate of a contrary doctrine.

But it is attempted to be established that, although the right of emigration is clear, yet, that we owe a sort of allegiance to the country of our birth, from our birth, which is inalienable, of which we are not enabled to divest ourselves. A principle more absurd, more incompatible with acknowledged rights, both of individuals and of independent sovereignties, was never attempted to be proved. It is incompatible with the rights of individuals, because it renders their right of emigration incomplete or nugatory; but the right of emigration has been admitted. It is incompatible with the rights of independent sovereignties, because the right to naturalize foreigners is not denied, and this right, with the duties of allegiance to another sovereign, is thus, also, rendered incomplete and nugatory. To owe allegiance to a Government under which we neither do, nor intend to reside, is as absurd as not to owe allegiance to a Government under which we do, and intend to reside forever. The absurdity of the one proposition will not be denied, and there is no discoverable difference, in the eye of reason, between them.

But it is contended that expatriation is a question of municipal regulation. From the very nature and meaning of the principle this is impossible; this follows what has been said already. It may be prohibited by force; physical force may prevent it. You may be laden with chains; all egress may be prevented; but your country is then a prison. A law to prohibit emigration would be a folly, if it were not a crime. Like a law against suicide, when you incur its penalties you are out of its reach.

Blackstone differs in opinion with the gentleman from New York. He was very well aware that to rest the perpetuity of allegiance on mere municipal regulation, was to do nothing—the opposing municipal regulation of naturalization would be entitled to equal weight; and that, as in the event of collision, the law of nations could alone decide, it was necessary to prop the principle with some other authority than British common or statute law. Accordingly, with a hardihood unequalled, in the teeth of every authority, in defiance of the recorded opinions of jurists, in the face of reason and of truth the asserts that it is a principle of universal law that “the subject of one sovereign cannot, by any act of his own; no, not by swearing allegiance to another, put off or discharge his natural allegiance to the other." Yet in England, their statute of a naturalization declares that "if any foreign seaman shall serve on board of any British vessel for the space of two years, he shall, to all intents and purposes, be deemed and taken to be natural born subject of His Majesty's Kingdom of Great Britain, and have and enjoy all the privileges, &c., which such foreign seaman should or ought to have had and enjoyed in case he had been a natural born subject of His Majesty, and actually a native within the Kingdom of Great Britain." Now, if the natural born subjects of Britain owe allegiance to any other country, then do the naturalized subjects owe the same; but, if this cannot be affirmed of the one, then no more it can be said of the other, for they are, to all intents and purposes, in regard to privileges, powers, rights, and capacities, to be considered alike.

Again, according to the common law, an alien cannot hold lands in England, because, says Blackstone, this might interfere with his natural allegiance; but, if the alien be naturalized, he may hold lands, and then his native allegiance is necessarily destroyed. According to the laws of England, naturalization, by enabling the party to hold lands, destroys natural allegiance, and this is all that is now contended for.

A great many arguments have been used, and cases quoted, to show that in England the duty of perpetual and inalienable allegiance is asserted. We have been referred to her blood-stained case to show that emigrants had been taken in arms, tried, executed, and mangled while yet alive, as traitors to their king and country. That her history furnishes abundant evidence of injustice, cruelty, and atrocity, required no great effort to show; but, until it is established that we, as well as other nations, are bound to obey her municipal laws, nothing is done in regard to the present question.

Having established that expatriation, or emigration, with an intent to permanently reside elsewhere, is a natural right, and that naturalizing foreigners is practised in England, it is proper to add, that emigration is prohibited by no civilized Government, that naturalization is practised by all, and that perpetual allegiance is a foolish notion, growing out of feudal times, supported by insolence and power, at war with the plainest rights of man, and in violation of the undeniable prerogative of every Government on earth.

Upon this subject, what say American authorities? The State of Virginia, which, in regard to a correct understanding of moral and political truth, yields to no country in Europe, has recognised by law the right of expatriation. The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. GASTON) contends that, as Virginia had authorized expatriation, this was a clear proof that, in the opinion of that State, the right might be given or withheld at pleasure. The gentleman either never read, or entirely misunderstood the statute. It does not give, it recognises the right. It provides that, "whosoever any citizen should, by deed, or open verbal declaration, made in court, declare that he relinquished the character of a citizen, and shall depart out of the commonwealth, such person shall, from the time of his departure, be considered as having exercised his right of expatriation, and shall thence be deemed no citizen." In perfect coincidence with the right of expatriation are the opinions of Judges Tucker and Roane, of that State, and Judge Iredell, formerly of the United States bench. One of our complaints, whilst colonies, was, that Britain discouraged emigration. In conformity to these ideas, the Constitution has given to Congress authority "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization." During the Administration of General Washington, a law on this subject was enacted. It called on the alien who wished to become a citizen of the United States to "renounce and abjure all allegiance to any foreign prince, potentate, State, or sovereignty, whatever, and particularly, by name, the prince, potentate, State, or sovereignty of which he was before a citizen or subject."

If the effect of naturalization was before doubtful, it ceased to be so now; whether it annihilated natural allegiance, was no longer left to implication. If a naturalized foreigner in England, notwithstanding he was, to all intents and purposes, to be held and taken as a native-born citizen, notwithstanding he was enabled to hold land which an alien could not do, because it destroyed his natural allegiance, still owed allegiance to the country of his birth; if all this nonsense were true, to put an end forever to such doctrine, we have required that a positive abjuration of all previous allegiance should be made. And whilst a citizen thus constituted, thus fashioned by ourselves, stamped with the holy attributes of equality, in all things, in regard to the other members of our free community, calls upon us for that protection which we have authorized him to expect, have we a right, have we a discretion; shall we be so vile, so infamous, as to hesitate? We should become the scorn of nations; we should loathe ourselves; remorse would poison our days. Is this the asylum of oppressed humanity? Is it thus we fulfil our promises to suffering man? What, lure from his native country, his home, a fellow-being who could have dragged out a miserable, though tolerable existence, to abandon him to punishment for an act which we have encouraged, for trusting to our faith, for confiding in our truth?

Thus, then, the question of retaliation arises. Shall we retaliate on the enemy cruelties which he may inflict on individuals who, though born in Britain, have left that country, incorporated themselves into our societies, and have been taken prisoners fighting our battles? But I cannot subscribe to the opinion, that we owe protection to those only who have been naturalized. I differ with the honorable gentleman from Virginia, who supposed that the Government felt itself bound no further. That is not the view of the President, he covers much wider ground; but it is the true ground. He does not speak of naturalized citizens, but of "persons who have incorporated themselves into our society." It is worse than useless that we should take any distinction. The British principle of perpetual allegiance applies as well to the one as the other. If our enemy adhere to the dicta of Blackstone, instead of the voice of reason and the practice of nations, then will all those individuals who were born in England fall under the denomination of traitors. No matter how formally we have made them citizens; no matter how many years they may have resided among us; no matter what their inducements to defend the country where all their happiness is centered; no matter if driven from their native fields by the hard hand of poverty; complying with laws which they have sworn to support; fulfilling duties which God has enjoined, they have committed the foul crime of treason; the horrible punishment denounced by British law awaits them. What if he has been compelled by us to take up arms? What if he has been enticed to do so by allurements held out to his cupidity or to his patriotism, are we not bound to protect him? Let us inquire, then, into the practice of the world.

It will be found that the claim now set up by England is unsupported by precedent, and is at war with her own example. Prince Eugene was, by birth, a Frenchman; disappointed in his just or ambitious views, he left France and joined the Austrian army, then employed against the Turks. He received an order to return; but, so far from complying, war breaking out between the two countries, he ranged himself on the side of the enemies of France—his career is well known—he defeated and humbled the proudest Power that Europe had then seen. His natural Sovereign, Lewis XIV, did not consider him as a traitor; the surrounding nations did not consider him as a traitor. England hailed him as the greatest captain, the brightest ornament of his age. It is to British historians and British poets that we are indebted for the opinion which we have of him—opinions as honorable to his moral as to his military character. At the siege of Turin, Eugene, a Frenchman, commanded the Austrian army; the French army was commanded by Count Marsin, an Austrian. In the war of the Succession, as it was called, the French armies were commanded by the Duke of Berwick, a Briton, a King's son; the British armies were led on by a Frenchman, of the title of Galway. Instances of the same kind are innumerable. But will express authority, drawn from England, be considered as of weight in a controversy with that Government? I admit, under other circumstances, it would deserve but little respect, for history furnishes examples of every absurdity and every atrocity, which wanton power has perpetrated. But it is fair to set up her former practice against her present pretensions. In the year 1794, certain corps of Frenchmen were enlisted in His Majesty's armies, for the purpose of invading France; Mr. Sheridan asked, in debate, whether, if they were taken prisoners and treated as traitors, the English Government would retaliate. Mr. Burke replied, "yes." This gave rise to much opposition and animadversion on the part of the minority. In answer, Mr. Burke said:

"From the severity of comment to which the poor monosyllable, 'yes,' has been subject, the world must have been led to think that I have taken up my morals at random, merely on sentiment, and that I was wholly unprepared to defend them on principle. As a general principle, founded on policy and law of nations, I am ready to repeat and maintain, that retaliation of any severity which an enemy may practise, is right and proper. The lex talionis is a part of the law of nations, as founded on that of nature. These corps must be considered purely as a part of that army under whose banners they serve. God forbid that the authors of murder should not find it recoil on their own heads. Such is my opinion relative to the justice and policy of retaliation. I would suffer no one act of severity to pass unretaliated. But the right honorable gentleman is fearful that we may inflame the Jacobins by this severity on our part. Inflame a Jacobin! You might as well talk of 'setting fire to hell.'" Mr. Burke goes on to remark, that "the practice is more lenient than the mildest doctrines of theorists. To the honor of practical humanity, only four instances of wanton and unnecessary murder occurred throughout the whole course of the American war—a forbearance which reflects equal credit on both parties. In 1688, the Irish brigades were taken into the service of France, and retained their own uniform. Yet, England, though often courageously opposed by these troops, has not, in any instance, treated them as rebels, when the fortune of war cast them into their power. In the rebellion of 1746, a whole regiment of them was taken, but no severity was practised.

"France, under Louis XIV, conducted herself in the same way. Many of her regiments, after the cruel and impolitic revocation of the edict of Nantes, were taken into the pay of Prussia, Holland, and Britain; yet, she never sacrificed these troops when they became prisoners. The battle of Fontenoy was gained principally from the exertions of the Irish brigades, and though they fought in open rebellion, these extremities were not thought of. Lord Ligonier, an officer of great note in the English service, was a Frenchman by birth; when taken prisoner, fighting against France, was exchanged in the usual course, for an officer of the same rank. Similar instances may be collected from the conduct of Germany, Sweden, and every other Power of Europe."

During the same debate Lord Mulgrave, then high in office, enjoying the confidence of Ministers, and it may be presumed speaking with their approbation, also declared that the system of retaliation was to be adopted.

The English, it seems, then, were at liberty to enlist and embody whole corps of Frenchmen, recently arrived, to be employed expressly for the invasion of their native country, whilst we violate every principle of the laws of nations, by taking into our service an inconsiderable number of Englishmen, members of our own society, to be used as occasion might require, in our war with that Government. The difference between the two cases cannot but occur to the most cursory observer. Yet, "the French corps were to be considered purely a part of the army under whose banners they served ;" but British emigrants, serving under the banners of the American army, are to be considered as traitors.

Mr. Chairman, I have trespassed longer on your patience, and that of the Committee, than I had intended. I hope, however, the importance of the subjects under consideration will be my apology. I will observe, sir, that I have endeavored, I think, with some success, to establish the following positions: That the loan, in consequence of the war in which we are engaged, is necessary, and can be obtained; that the pretensions of the Federalists, to the exclusive patronage of the Navy, are unfounded; that, with respect to Louisiana and Florida, the conduct of the United States has been scrupulously honorable; that the right of expatriation is supported by principle, and established by practice; that naturalization is its necessary effect, and by a sort of reaction sanctions the principle; that inalienable allegiance is absurd, and incompatible with expatriation and naturalization, so clearly established by universal usage and law; and that the question of retaliation, to which the late proceedings of the British Government have given rise, is incontestably settled in our favor, by the authority of her greatest statesmen, by her own practice, and by that of the civilized world.

When Mr. ROBERTSON had concluded, the Committee rose, and the House adjourned, after an intimation from Mr. CHEVES (the Speaker) that he proposed next to take the floor.

THURSDAY, February 24.

Mr. HEMPSTEAD presented a resolution of the Legislature of the Territory of Missouri, requesting that a law may be passed authorizing the said Legislature to fix the seat of government of said Territory.—Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ARCHER, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of William Henry Savage; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the committee for revising the militia system, made a report on the memorial of the Legislature of the Indiana Territory, referred on the 29th December last; which was read and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill "to provide for the return, to their own districts, of vessels detained by the embargo, in districts other than those where they are respectively owned or belong," were read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. EPPEs submitted, for consideration, the following resolution:

"Resolved, That an additional standing committee be established, to be called 'A Committee for Public Expenditures.'

"It shall be the duty of the said Committee for Public Expenditures to examine into the state of the several public Departments, and particularly into the laws making appropriations of moneys, and to report whether the moneys have been disbursed conformably with such laws; and also to report, from time to time, such provisions and arrangements as may be necessary to add to the economy of the Departments, and the accountability of their officers."

The resolution was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. STUART, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of explaining or amending the act passed at the last session of Congress, entitled "An act laying duties on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise," and in relation to the liability of practising physicians to the tax imposed by the said act, and that they have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

REVENUE CUTTERS.

Mr. WOOD, of Massachusetts, offered a resolution to the following effect:

Resolved, That the Naval Committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of placing on the pension list of the United States all officers, seamen, &c., that may be wounded in the performance of duty on board the revenue cutters of the United States.

Mr. LOWMEDES, of South Carolina, as one of the Committee on Naval Affairs, objected to the reference of this subject to that committee, as well because the committee had, in a bill they had recently reported, expressed the opinion to what extent the principle of pensions should be extended, as because he saw a material distinction between the cases of persons serving on board national vessels of war and revenue cutters, arising from the difference of ordinary compensation, of discipline, danger in the service, &c.

After some observations, not distinctly heard, from Mr. WOOD, by way of reply, Mr. W. so modified his motion as to refer the proposed inquiry to a select committee; and, thus amended, the resolution passed, nem. dissen.

THE LOAN BILL.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole, on the Loan bill.

Mr. CHEVES, of South Carolina, (the Speaker,) took the floor, according to the intention he announced yesterday, and spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I shall follow the example which other gentlemen have established—I shall not confine myself to the question which is immediately presented by the bill, but look briefly into the prominent subjects which the discussion has presented. I shall say very little of the loan, or the general finance of the Government. On the subject of our finances I have for the last two years occupied much of the attention of the House, and am very well disposed to leave the subject to the better abilities of the gentlemen to whom the House has particularly confided the management of that part of its business. It is, indeed, true, that the system of finance on which the Government is acting, is different from that which I deemed proper, and which I made some endeavors to accomplish; which I supposed it would have been expedient to have adopted in a state of war, to put beyond peril the public credit, and to supply with abundance the ways and means to prosecute the war with vigor and effect. But I have no disposition on this or any other occasion to speak my private griefs; and I will only add, that I wish the measure all possible success; that I know the resources of the country are great; that I believe the ultimate security of the creditor to be unquestionable, and that the enormous interest given by Government (for such I consider the terms of the last loans to be) ought to attract every cent of the disengaged capital in the country—because in no other way can the holder invest his money which will give him so little trouble, so great security, and so much profit.

The Loan Bill.

I shall not either examine the causes in which the war originated; because on this subject, when last I had the honor of addressing the House upon it, in the close of the 12th Congress, I spoke at great length, and, as I believe, I could add very little to what I then said, and cannot consent to repeat what I have said before: I shall barely advert to the causes of the war, for the purpose of examining that cause on which principally its continuance is, in my opinion, justifiable and necessary.

On the declaration and continuance of the war, I have the pleasure to concur heartily with my friends—and it gives me no small pleasure to do so; for although I have sometimes had the pain to believe that they were not disposed to allow me equally to rejoice with them in the honors and triumphs of the war, I do not therefore indulge a diminished willingness to bear a full share of the responsibility which attaches to those who declared and who have continued it to the present day. If for this cause they fall, I wish no exemption from a common fate. It is true, as an honorable gentleman from New York (Mr. GROSVENOR) some time ago remarked, on another subject, I have been decidedly opposed to the Government and the majority in their commercial policy. I have been opposed to what is usually called the restrictive system; but I think the gentleman did not correctly characterize my conduct when he said that I trampled on these laws. [Mr. G. said he did not mean to charge the gentleman from South Carolina with treating with any disrespect the laws of his country—but to say, that he had been actively and zealously opposed to their policy.] I know perfectly well, said Mr. C., the honorable gentleman had no wish to misrepresent my conduct; I have had frequent manifestations of his good dispositions towards me, which forbid me to suppose he intended to place my conduct in a point of view the least censurable or equivocal. But it may be necessary, and I take the occasion, to explain my conduct to the world. I shall always venerate the laws of my country, were it merely because they are the laws of my country, however zealously I may have contested their policy or may earnestly deprecate their effects. I have no wish to conceal my opposition to the restrictive system; and if I could at any time have believed that greater activity on my part would have been useful, it should have been cheerfully yielded. I particularly rejoice, sir, at the resistance I made to one measure connected with this system, which was supported by a majority of my friends. I mean that which related to the fair and unfortunate traders who were supposed to have incurred the penalties of this system by the importation of their property from the enemy's country; and, if I could believe, as those who have been disposed to revile me have said, that my conduct had a decided influence on the ultimate issue of that measure, I should think my fate infinitely more fortunate than the general lot of men so humble as I am. I should know that I had lived for a great and important purpose; and rejoicing in the justice and usefulness of it, I should be careless of the odium which might have attached to the act. I thank God I have never found any difficulty in deciding between a just and a popular course. I have always been able to surrender the high blandishments of popularity (though on this subject I affect no peculiar insensibility) without a pang, and to embrace with cheerfulness the homely comforts of conscience and of duty.

The principal causes in which I believe the war originated, were the operation of the British Orders in Council on our commerce, and the impressment of our seamen. These were distinguishable from the other causes of dispute between the two countries by this striking circumstance, that they were always present, active, and progressive. If our causes of complaint had been confined to past injuries and insults; if we had only to suffer the loss of the many millions of money of which Great Britain had robbed our citizens by her depredations on our lawful commerce, we might and probably would have continued to remonstrate and negotiate, and still have avoided war, to which our Government has an aversion so strong as to wear the semblance of pusillanimity. But it was the daily continuance of the injuries, the incessant infliction, and the absence of all hope that these injuries were to end, that drove the nation necessarily and unavoidably to resistance; unable to carry the productions of our own soil on the highway of nations—the great ocean—of which, like the light and air, it was intended by nature none should have dominion, to ports not blockaded, without exposing them to inevitable capture, and this often in the mouths of our own harbors, was a situation which affected vitally not merely the interests but the independence of the nation. To have endured it would have sunk us to a rank so degraded among nations, as could not have failed to draw upon us the everlasting contempt of the world. I have, however, no hesitation in admitting, for I shall speak with the utmost candor on the subject, that, had I known of the revocation of the Orders in Council at the moment of the declaration of war, I would not have voted for it; I speak only for myself, though I believe I am not singular in this view of the subject. I am even willing to admit, though on this point I know I differ from some of my friends, that the revocation of which we were afterwards informed, as it was explained by the Ministry to Parliament, would have been to me satisfactory. But whatever the effect of this revocation might have been in preventing war, had a knowledge of it in this country preceded war, yet the subject presents a very different aspect after war has been declared. It is impossible not to see and to feel that, were we to make peace without any security against that abuse of our rights which formed the other great cause of war, it would be an obvious and unequivocal submission to the claim of right which the enemy sets up, and to the injurious and abusive exercise of this claim which we have so long suffered. This idea is strongly presented by the reflections with which I commenced in speaking of the nature of the principal causes of the war: namely, that it is not an injury, no matter how great in extent, which has ceased to be active, and which has therefore lost in a great degree its offensive character, but one which is daily and hourly repeated, intermitted only by the existence of actual war, under circumstances too intolerable to be borne by a nation not dead to all the feelings of honor and of shame. Exemplify the result of a peace without any arrangement on this subject; if it would not leave the Government the ordinary means of remonstrance, it would leave nothing but a disgraceful submission to the insulting injury. Now I aver that the ordinary means of remonstrance would not be left to the Government. These means enable it to state not only the injustice of the cause of complaint, but that, if persisted in, it will lead to national resistance—to war. But were we to conclude a peace with Great Britain without any arrangement on this subject, should we be able to say to her afterwards, desist or war will be the consequence? No, she will reply; it is not cause for war, for you have yourselves when it continued a subsisting injury, when our pretensions were unabated, and our practice unrestrained, except by the existence of war, actually abandoned a war in which you were engaged with us for this very injury. It would, therefore, be absurd to suppose that you would make war for a cause which did not forbid you to make peace. On this principle I justify the conduct of the Government in rejecting the armistice proposed by Admiral Warren. That proposition denied even a temporary suspension of the abuse, and therefore left us no hope of a permanent security against it, the expectation of which alone could have recommended either an armistice or negotiation. On this subject let me say, that it is not contended by this Government that Great Britain shall renounce the claim of right, as the only condition on which it will put an end to the war. When I say this, I deem it necessary to declare, that although I speak with great confidence, I do not found my opinion on any knowledge of the counsels of the Executive branch of the Government. Of these I have no knowledge, but I speak from its public acts, from the public declarations of those who have its confidence, and from the evidence of circumstances which surround us. From all these I have no difficulty in saying, that all this Government demands is a reasonable and practicable security against the abuse of the practice; and I venture to say, that were the minority in power to-morrow, they would not conclude a peace on terms less favorable; they will not, as the minority of this body, declare that peace ought to be made without this security. They will not venture to meet the people of the United States with such a declaration. If they do, the majority need not fear the consequences.

I pass from the causes to the conduct of the war. The past conduct of the war; this, I think, cannot be defended, and as I have not been an indiscriminate supporter of the measures and policy of the Government, so I will not be an indiscriminate apologist of the conduct of the war. But although it cannot be entirely defended it may admit of some excuse. When it is recollected that this nation was roused by the declaration of war from the slumber of thirty years of tranquillity and peace; that it was without officers of experience; without military science or military establishments; when we recollect the comfortable mediocrity of fortune which our citizens enjoy, which gives them homes and families from which they reluctantly part; when we recollect the high spirit of liberty which is breathed by every man in our free and happy country, where the poorest man sees in the most exalted only his political equal, which, however great the political boast, is yet a circumstance the most incongruous with the spirit of subordination, and the habits of discipline and obedience, which are necessary to form soldiers; when with such means and of such materials our army was to be formed, we ought to have been prepared for many of the disasters and disappointments we have suffered. But just in proportion as we should have expected disastrous results we confidently relied upon success, and the public mind was consequently prepared to magnify our misfortunes, and to look at the future with despondency. From this cause we have been able to see but one side of the picture. Could we penetrate the councils of the enemy, and enter into his sensibilities, we might discover that our misfortunes have been magnified, and our successes diminished, by the optics which have heretofore presented them to our view. Let us compare our own situation with that of the enemy; let us enter into his sensibilities and disappointments and compare them with our own. There are but two signal instances of discomfiture of which we complain. The first in the surrender of Detroit, and the second in the failure of the expedition against Montreal. These are our principal misfortunes. On the other had, we can boast the destruction of Proctor's army, and the successful attack and capture of York. Let us take the enemy's view of these events. Neither of the officers of the enemy who commanded on these occasions has been since employed.

Proctor has suffered the severest censure, in the general orders of the Commander-in-chief, that language can express, and Sheaffe, it is understood, has been sent to England, perhaps for trial for his misconduct. The enemy, then, supposes our successes on these occasions, however we may regard them, as heavy misfortunes to his arms. The victory of Harrison was such as would have secured to a Roman General, in the best days of the Republic, the honors of a triumph. He put an end to the war in Upper Canada. The attack on York was highly spirited, and the success was brilliant and complete; and this, too, under the disadvantage of having lost the commanding officer, the gallant Pike, at the moment when the harvest of victory was to be reaped. The war on the land has not, then, been so disastrous or so dishonorable as we have sometimes supposed.

But on what principle, in estimating the character and effects of this war, are gentlemen authorized to separate the operations on land from those on the ocean and the lakes. I claim not exclusively for my own political friends the honors of our naval triumphs. I was among the first to accuse them of their neglect of this service, and to urge them to cherish and support the Naval Establishment. But I cannot either allow to the gentlemen in the Opposition the claim which they affect of being the exclusive friends of the Navy. They have discarded the man (the late President Adams) who was its greatest patron, and rejected from the times which they love to call their own, the period in which it received its greatest and its happiest impetus. But let its patrons and its friends be whom they may, I have a right to claim its merits for the country; and when we connect our naval deeds with the other events of the war, who will venture to say this has been an inglorious war? An inglorious war! Insult not the gallant men who have fought and bled in your battles, and yet live with high claims to your applause. Tread not so rudely on the ashes of the heroic dead. Could the soul of Lawrence speak from the cerements which confine his mouldering body, in what appalling language would he rebuke the man who should assert that the contest in which he so nobly conquered and so nobly died, was an inglorious war! Will you tell that worthy man,* who fills with so much fidelity and usefulness a station in your service on this floor, that this is an inglorious war? He has beheld one son† triumph over his country's foe, and live to hear and to receive the applause and gratitude of his country. He has seen another‡ fall in the arms of victory, heroically aiding in an achievement, which if it be not unparalleled is certainly not exceeded in the annals of history. Happy father! yet I would call him a miserable and hopeless man were this an inglorious war. But I must call him a most happy father, for God and nature have implanted in our bosoms a principle which elevates us above the love of life and friends, and makes us think their loss a blessing when they are yielded up in the cause of a beloved country, on the altar and in the spirit of patriotism. It is this principle which makes that excellent father reflect not merely with composure but with pleasure on the child of his love giving up his life in battle; his blood mingling with the wave and his body entombed in the bosom of Erie. Yes, he would rather feel the consciousness that his gallant boy fought with Perry and died in the glorious battle of the 10th of September than now embrace him in his arms, again animated with the strong pulse of life—again pouring into the parental bosom his filial duty and lighting up a father's pride and joy!

We are naturally led to speak next of the future conduct of the war. It is said that the negotiations which are pending should make us relax in the prosecution of the war, and confine our operations to the single object of our own defence. It would be sufficient to oppose this advice by the practice of every country and every age, by one of the best known maxims of national policy—that your preparations should be greatest at the moment that you most anxiously desire and most earnestly seek peace; and by one of the most frequent results of national experience, that exactly in proportion to your ability to do your enemy injury do you negotiate to advantage. Let us suppose the negotiation to fail, and in the meantime we neglect the establishment of an efficient army, what disgrace and what calamity might not be the result! We are told that our past misfortunes should admonish us of our inability to wage the war upon the land, and we are particularly advised not to attempt the invasion and conquest of Canada. Our misfortunes, it is admitted, should lead us to the practice of caution, but should not deter us from the exercise of our faculties; they should rather animate us, as we may hope to remove their causes, to more vigorous efforts. I should consider the prevalence of the opinion that the nation was unable to wage this war as one of the heaviest calamities it could suffer—as the very greatest calamity it could be doomed to suffer. But I am sure there is no foundation for the opinion, if the power and resources of the nation be properly called forth and employed. The invasion of Canada is supposed by gentlemen in the Opposition to be the most exceptionable way in which the war can be waged. It is said Great Britain will not surrender Canada, and that it is therefore useless to take it, as the war will be rendered interminable should we attempt to retain it. But as it is seen that the retention of Canada is not a necessary consequence of its conquest, or the only way of making it useful in that attainment of the end of war—a removal of the principal causes of war—it is found necessary to give another basis to the argument, and it is said that Canada is of so little consequence to Great Britain, that she will sacrifice it rather than give up any important com-mercerial right or privilege. I shall not stop to notice what appears to be an inconsistency in these arguments; but say it is denied that this Government claims of the enemy the surrender of any important right or privilege. It claims not even a surrender of the pretended right of searching our ships for her seamen. We only ask an arrangement which shall prevent an abuse of the practice, as the eloquent gentleman from Georgia (Mr. FORSYTH) has demonstrated from the correspondence with Admiral Warren. We demanded only a security against the abuse of her power which shall exempt our own seamen, our own citizens, from the intolerable outrage of impressment, and this I say Great Britain will grant us rather than surrender Canada, or continue the war, unless we suffer it to languish.

I agree with gentlemen who say that Great Britain will not surrender Canada. Its value for its trade and supplies is not the favorite view in which that possession is considered by the British nation. It is connected with the most brilliant era of her history—that of the wars of Chatham. They would part with twenty sugar islands rather than give up the barren rock of Cape Diamond. They consider it as one of the most brilliant ornaments of the British Crown. It is inseparable from events which emblazon the pages of their history—which animate the eloquence of their orators—which give confidence to their statesmen, and inspire with valor their soldiers, and with patriotism their people. The peasant, who has not learnt his alphabet, can read in that possession his country's glory, and in a rapid and intuitive glance see the pride and power of France and Spain humbled by the British arms. In imagination he stands upon the cliffs of Quebec, and, looking down from the fearful height on the flood beneath, admires the daring valor which ventured to assail its lofty battlements. In imagination he treads the plains of Abraham, and talks (as he had heard his fathers talk) of Wolfe and of Montcalm, and how they beat the French, and how the manly, mighty counsels of Chatham elevated the character of his country, and spread her glory through the world. Now, sir, it appears to me that this state of things presents the happiest means of carrying on the war with a reasonable hope of attaining its just object—an honorable peace. We have at our doors, within the reach of our most effectual blows, a possession highly vulnerable, which our enemy greatly prizes, and will most reluctantly suffer to be wrested from him. Consider these circumstances, and connect them with the many other inducements which Great Britain has to make peace with us, and it would seem, if we are true to ourselves, if we exhibit an honorable spirit, and make a manly effort, we will effect an honorable peace at no distant day.

Sir, Great Britain needs, and ought to desire, a peace with this country. What inducements has she to continue the war? All we demand she can grant without affecting her interests, her honor, or her pride. We only want a security against the abuse of her power. By the continuance of the war she cannot add to her power, or her glory, or her gains. How can she add to her power? No one imagines, if she could conquer, that she could retain a foot on our territory. Her glory? On this point she has everything to lose and nothing to gain. Could she capture every vessel of war we have, when the superior force with which she would do it is considered, it could add nothing to her national renown. It is a war which can yield her no laurels. Nor can it yield her any pecuniary advantage. This is to be sought with us in the paths of peace. What on the other hand are her inducements to put an end to the war? The expense of the war is alone sufficient. It is a war on her part whose effects can bear no proportion to its expense. It is in its nature vastly expensive and burdensome to her. Recollect the vast expense she incurred in our Revolutionary struggle, which heaped up so immensely her national debt, and we will be able to form some opinion of the probable magnitude of her expenditures in this war. It will be a moderate estimate to say that it costs her double the sum we expend, and that will make this war, in which she cannot boast a trophy or risk a hope, cost her fifteen millions of pounds sterling per annum. More, probably, than the war she has lately carried on, with so much glory, in Spain and Portugal. More, certainly, than she expends to animate and sustain all the allied Powers of the Continent in the great contest in which they are engaged. But what renders this expense more burdensome and embarrassing is, this is a war in which the expenditure is made abroad. Were three times the sum expended in the Kingdom it would less distress the nation. It would then only change hands—it now passes entirely away. At the same time, too, that she makes this great and useless expenditure, she is obliged to support the war from Spain and Portugal, and to subsidize the Northern allies. These expenditures also are made abroad, and all these together must produce inconceivable embarrassments in their trade and finance. I have no allusion whatever to the old and the wild notion that Great Britain cannot support her credit, and that she must sink under the immense burdens of her debt and her expenditures. I acknowledge the vastness of her ability, and that were it necessary to preserve great and important rights she could make yet greater expenditures. But the exertion would not be natural; it would be distressing; and would not prove that her best and most urgent policy is not to lessen rather than increase her expenditures. Let it not be supposed, that, from the successes of her own arms, and the arms of the allies, she is relieved from the pecuniary demands she has hitherto borne; on the contrary, her allies are exhausted in their finance, and look to her alone for pecuniary support, while the moment of fruition, that of the consummation of hope long indulged, presented in near prospect, urges them to every exertion they can possibly make to secure the object for which they have so long sighed, and for the attainment of which they have expended so much blood and treasure. It is a moment when they must grant everything—it is a moment in which they may be called upon to make yet greater exertions and greater expenditures than any they have hitherto made—it is a moment in which the most obvious policy would direct Great Britain to meet us amicably and treat us justly; and nothing more is necessary to put an end to this war.

There is another very powerful reason why Great Britain should desire peace with us—this is founded in the advantages of our trade. I know we have overrated the influence of our trade as a measure of coercion, but it is notwithstanding unquestionably highly valuable to her. The loss of it would not induce her to make a great sacrifice of interest or feeling, but at any moment when she should suffer no motive but her real interests to govern her, it would be a very powerful pacificator. We were, when a good understanding subsisted between the two nations, her best customer. We took from her two-fifths of all the exports of her woollen manufactures, which she always considered her great staple, and a vast, if not an equal amount of her cotton goods, besides other articles; and when peace shall be again restored, we shall again be her best customer; for, whatever may be thought to the contrary, there will be no changes wrought by the war, unless it be very long continued, which can materially alter the commercial relations of the two countries; and she may justly hope, on the restoration of peace, for a restoration of our valuable custom as a purchaser of her manufactures. Our trade is rendered even more necessary to her by the great demand which is said to exist for her manufactures for the markets of other countries, because we furnish the raw materials of many of them, of better quality and on better terms than any other country can. They cannot, for example, from all the colonies of the world, completely substitute our cottons—their endeavors to establish the affirmative of this proposition, to my mind, very satisfactorily show a material dependence upon us for this article. Does it not then seem that the terms which we demand of the enemy are reasonable and attainable?

I come now to speak of that subject which was my principal inducement to claim your attention in this debate—I allude to the question of retaliation. The conduct of the Government is not only condemned in this particular, but it is also said we ought not to prosecute the war against Canada lest it should provoke the enemy to give occasion for the exercise of the retaliation which we have threatened. Let us see what foundation there is for this humiliating doctrine. This question is one of the gravest and most solemn character; affecting deeply the honor of the country, the duty of the Government, and the lives of our citizens. I wish, for the last reason, it had been the pleasure of the gentlemen of the minority to have passed it over in silence. I think it would have been safest and wisest. I pretend not, however, to dictate the conduct of other gentlemen, but I must be permitted to enter my protest against the doctrines which have been maintained on the other side of the House on this subject. I think, but I wish to be understood as speaking with a proper deference for the opinions of other gentlemen, this subject has been very erroneously considered. It has been made by the combatants on either side to depend altogether on the question of expatriation, when it has very little and very remote relation to that question. But, as the inquiry is one of very great importance, I hope I may be pardoned for discussing it first in the way in which it has been heretofore generally treated, in order that I may draw the subject from thence, without any violence to the common mode of thinking, into that point of light in which I suppose it ought to be viewed.

To speak, then, of expatriation. The right of expatriation, which is broadly and generally affirmed on the one hand, is on the other rebutted in equal extent, by the claim of perpetual allegiance. These may be assumed to be equivalent questions. The affirmation of the one is the negation of the other. This it may be material to remember, because it will be necessary, in the course of the argument, to show that naturalization, which is generally considered as destructive of perpetual allegiance and synonymous with expatriation, is really not so. Perpetual allegiance is alleged to be founded on natural law, the positive law of nations, or the municipal law of each State. We will examine each; and first, the law of nature. To determine what is the law of nature, the simplest way may be, not to embarrass ourselves with equivocal definitions, but to look at things through our best judgments, with a view to discover their just fitness and connexion. We may call in the aid and authority of writers of character and reputation, and with these lights seek our conclusion. In this view we are able to discover but two principles or pretences on which the duty of perpetual allegiance is affirmed, or the right of expatriation denied. These are the necessities of the State and the gratitude of the subject. These are the only grounds stated by Vattel, to whom alone I shall refer as my authority for positions of natural and national law, because I can refer to no better authority, the more especially as on the points for which I shall use him, I believe he agrees with all other writers. (a)

The obligation resulting from the necessity of the State, can apply to none but extreme cases—such, for example, as the instance of invasion, or the case of war, when great numbers should suddenly abandon the State—a necessity that neither does nor can exist in relation to the few scattered instances of expatriation which the practice and experience of nations have hitherto exhibited to our view, and which form the whole of the instances about which we reason; nor can it form any foundation for perpetual allegiance in the extent in which it is claimed; which is not confined to cases of extraordinary character, such as I have mentioned, but embraces every subject born in the country, and is neither limited by time nor circumstances.

The extent of that obligation, which is founded on the gratitude of the subject, must bear some proportion to the benefit that he has received and the favor that the Government has conferred. Now what benefit has the subject received? When in a state of infancy, he has been protected and permitted to live up to adult years in security and peace. But has this benefit imposed an obligation which has no limits, which is commensurate with every faculty, mental and physical, which the subject possesses, and coextensive with the duration of his life? Those who form a State at given time, repay, by the services of the time, the protection of the Government for the same period. The services of the ancestor are a full equivalent to the sovereign for the protection which is enjoyed by his offspring as well as himself; and the son, when he arrives at adult age and is able himself to serve the State, is nothing in arrear to the Government. Put the case of any actual society or population. Is not the protection of the Government fully repaid by the gross population, including the young and the old, at any given period? The adult it may be admitted owes a debt of gratitude to some one for the care and assistance by which he has been reared; to his parent, if you please, but certainly not to the sovereign, who, it is seen, has received a full equivalent for the protection which the subject has enjoyed. There appears, then, to be no foundation for the claim of perpetual allegiance in the necessities of the State, or the gratitude of the subject for the benefits he has received. I will illustrate the argument in relation to the last of these pretences by the case of parent and child. The gratitude due by the citizen to the sovereign cannot be greater in the opinion of those who most revere the obligation, than that of the child to the parent—yet there is no man who would not be shocked at the injustice of the parent who should claim from his child perpetual servitude, as a debt of gratitude for his nurture.

Is there anything in the general nature of government which will authorize the doctrine of perpetual allegiance? I do not mean any particular Government, but government in its essential form. The very argument in which we are engaged seems to furnish the evidence on which we must come to a negative conclusion. It proves, to say the least, that the claim of perpetual allegiance is a question of great doubt. But the natural right of man as he existed when independent of government, in a state of nature, (and though we are not reasoning of men who have ever been in this state, it is fair and necessary, in order to ascertain his actual situation, to advert to this possible state,) to go where he pleased and to serve whom he pleased, was clear and indubitable. The state of the fact, then, is this: His original right is clear, but his subsequent obligation is doubtful, and therefore, unless the less shall more than countervail the stronger proof, the conclusion ought to be that he is not bound to perpetual allegiance.

But let us continue the inquiry. Is there anything in the general nature of Government which will authorize perpetual allegiance? What is the foundation of the power of Government? Is it not clearly and obviously territorial jurisdiction? How else can we suppose it to exist? Government must be located. It must exist within territorial limits, or with reference to territorial limits. Its basis, then, is territorial jurisdiction, and its authority is co-extensive with its territorial limits and the extension of its territorial power. If we seek for examples, we shall find that its authority ceases where these cease, and extends where these extend. In relation to territorial limits, the idea is easily and perfectly conceived; but, of the extension of territorial power, it will be necessary to speak and to state the instances, which will at once illustrate the argument and establish the rule. There is the instance of the territorial jurisdiction of Government beyond its territorial limits to the distance of a certain number of leagues from the shore; there is also the instance of ships, whether vessels of war or merchant ships. The idea that has been expressed by the phrase, "a ship is a floating colony," I know has been lately derided; but it was once an approved and accepted doctrine with those who now so contemptuously reject it. It was no other than this principle on which the celebrated case of Jonathan Robbins was decided. This formed the basis, if my memory does not much deceive me, of the argument on that subject of the distinguished man who now presides, with so much advantage to the country, and honor to himself, over the highest judicial establishment in the United States, (Chief Justice Marshall;) and it is a principle perfectly well established in the law of nations. Nor is there any distinction, in the principle itself, between ships of war and merchantmen; the one has prevailed in practice—a distinction which has grown up lately, and which originated in the prudence of nations. This has established the exemption of ships of war from search; but this exemption is evidently founded on a desire to avoid the frequent hostilities which would result, and not from the mere consideration of the power which distinguishes a vessel of war from a merchant ship. The relative power of a vessel of war carrying a few guns, and a merchantman, to that of a ship-of-the-line, is not materially different. It is not the mere warlike efficiency of a vessel which extends the power of the Government, but the ensign of its sovereignty which represents its territorial strength. This extension of territorial power embraces also the armies of a nation—as far as its ships can sail, or its armies march, the territorial power of a nation is extended. This doctrine is neither new nor controverted. Vattel agrees with all other writers on the subject, and he clearly establishes all the positions I have laid down. (b)

But the authority of Government is circumscribed by its territorial limits and the extension of its territorial power. It seems to result, then, that the law of nature, as it grows out of the moral duties of the subject to the State, or out of the essential nature of Government, does not establish the claim of perpetual allegiance.

FEBRUARY, 1814.

The Loan Bill.

H. OF R.

The positive law of nations, which is the next ground on which this claim is to be sustained, is formed of the treaties and usages of nations. These are almost silent. There are, perhaps, no subsisting treaties or reciprocal usages on the subject; but, as far as the past history of nations affords any examples, they appear to be opposed to the claim of perpetual allegiance.

It remains for us to consider how far the municipal laws of nations, respectively, establish this right. And here I readily admit, that the municipal laws of England do establish the doctrine. I think, too, that the municipal laws of other nations generally accord with those of England on this subject. I then, at once, concede to the gentleman from New York (Mr. GROSVENOR) all that he so zealously endeavored to prove by the learned and able argument which he submitted to you the other day—that the municipal laws of England, and of nations generally, enjoin upon the subject the duty of perpetual allegiance. And I admit, further, that is of no practical consequence to say that it is neither supported by the moral duties of the subject, nor warranted by the essential nature of Government. It is enough to say, that it is enforced by the sanctions which secure obedience to all municipal laws; though it be not just, it does not cease to be obligatory wherever municipal laws can operate. But the gentleman from New York, and those who reason with him, having established the doctrine of perpetual allegiance, at once assume, in substance, though not in express terms, a distinct proposition, equally necessary to their conclusion, which they have not proved or even attempted to prove—namely, universal allegiance. I doubt whether my meaning, in the use of this term, may be clearly understood, and therefore I will define it. It is intended to say, that the allegiance claimed is not only co-extensive with the territorial limits, and the extension of the territorial power of the natural sovereign, but also goes with the subject into the territories, and under the territorial power of every other sovereign under whose jurisdiction he may reside. The argument of the gentleman, it is admitted, establishes perpetual allegiance; but it assumes that this perpetual allegiance is also universal. Now, the latter is denied, and clearly does not exist; he has offered no proof to establish it; and, if we recur to the principles which we have already proved, it will appear satisfactory that it cannot exist. It has been proved that the power of a Government is only co-extensive with its territorial limits, and the extension of its territorial power. Beyond these, it can neither enforce duties nor extend protection. Now, the basis of allegiance is protection; and all legal duties must suppose, at least in theory and in the nature of things, an ability to enforce them; but, beyond the territorial limits and the extension of the territorial power of a Government, neither of these exist, nor can, in the nature of things, exist; and of course, beyond these, allegiance must cease. It will be no reply to this argument to say that, on the return of the subject to the dominions of his native sovereign, his allegiance is restored. It is admitted that allegiance is not limited by time; but it yet remains to be established that it is not limited by space; that, when out of these dominions, the citizen is subject to a power which in its nature only can exist within them. Nor will it be more material to prove that, on the return of a subject to his native country, he may be punished for any offences—denominated such by the internal laws of the State—which have been committed without its limits; for that will only prove that the sovereign authority is uncontrollable within the territorial limits of the State; that it may enforce unjust laws, and inflict unjust punishments. But it is sufficient for the present argument to say, as will be proved hereafter, that, when taken in arms, he is protected from the operation of municipal laws by the laws of arms.

It has even been contended, that we have not the right to naturalize the subjects of another Power, in such a manner as to impose the obligation of bearing arms against that Power, even within our own territory; and that, if our Constitution and laws speak a different language, they are nugatory. All nations, speaking generally, have, indeed, claimed the duty of perpetual allegiance; but the same nations, at the same time, have exercised the power of naturalization; the British nation, particularly, without any formality of process, naturalizes the subjects of other Powers in the most extensive sense of the word. Our Constitution, on this subject, is as explicit as language can make it; and it is hardly fair for gentlemen to take for granted that all the great men who framed and signed that instrument, with WASHINGTON at their head, were so grossly ignorant of the relative rights and duties of nations as this argument necessarily supposes. Let me say to these gentlemen, that I have understood, and believe, this provision of the Constitution was introduced into the instrument by a gentleman (Alexander Hamilton) who, I acknowledge, was a very great man, and to whose memory they are not unwilling to pay the highest honors. Will the gentleman say he was thus ignorant of the relative rights and duties of nations?

After these views of the subject, we are prepared to reconcile, with the laws and practice of nations, the apparent paradoxes, with the absurdity of which the disputants on either side of this question have charged each other. It is said, that perpetual allegiance is incompatible with naturalization; and, therefore, that all Governments which naturalize, to be consistent, must abandon the claim of perpetual allegiance. On the other hand, it is said allegiance is perpetual, and therefore you cannot naturalize. But these are mistakes; for allegiance being only co-extensive with the territorial limits, or the extension of the territorial power of a Government, each operates within a sphere which is exclusive of the sphere of the other. Thus the claim of perpetual allegiance and the right of naturalization are compatible, and the practice of nations ceases to be paradoxical and absurd. Again, it is said that naturalization is practised by all Governments, and that all Governments, to be consistent, should concede the right of expatriation; but this is also a mistake, for expatriation implies a total release of the subject from his allegiance, as well when without as on his return to the territory of his original sovereign; while naturalization is, in its operation, only co-extensive with the territory and the extension of the territorial power of the adopted sovereign. It is, then, not paradoxical to say, that Governments deny the right of expatriation, and exercise the power of naturalization; accordingly, we find that Governments generally have denied the right of expatriation, and have exercised, at the same time, the power of naturalization.

H. of R.

The Loan Bill.

FEBRUARY, 1814.

But I repeat, and I will now endeavor to prove, that the question of retaliation has been very improperly connected with those of perpetual allegiance, naturalization, and expatriation. Perpetual allegiance is indeed so far connected with retaliation as to be the pretence under which, sometimes, that act of an enemy is committed which renders retaliation necessary, and naturalization is so far connected with it, as to increase the obligation of the adopted sovereign to retaliate for the injury done to the naturalized citizen, as the ties that bind them together are more close and numerous, and more solemn, than those which connect a sovereign and the stranger who merely bears arms in his service. The foundation, however, of the right of retaliation is not at all formed by these ties; but by the laws and usages of civilized nations in war. The proper mode of discussing this question was well indicated by the example of the venerable gentleman (Mr. FINDLEY) from Pennsylvania, and has been pursued, with great success, by the gentleman (Mr. ROBERTSON) from Louisiana, the latter part of whose speech, that which was delivered during the last ten minutes he addressed you, was in my opinion, worth all (I deny not the abstract talent displayed by others) that has been said within as well as without these walls on the subject, because he proved by the best example what is the usage of nations on this point; which at once presented the proper mode and the true object of inquiry. Before the mitigated practice of modern times had softened and civilized the character of war, it would have been considered absurd in the victor to talk of his right to punish the vanquished, as a traitor under the municipal laws of his native country, when he had been taken in arms against it. The rights of war gave him the readier means of his sword and his will. Amidst arms, municipal laws are correctly said to be silent; the original right of the victor was to put his prisoners to death—this is still his extreme right and still exists in such degree as to merge and in effect to annihilate all other rights over the captive, but it is a right controlled by the mitigated usages of modern times, and these usages have become the established laws and rights of civilized war. Examples of these mitigated usages are numerous. The property of the subjects of an enemy is on land generally held inviolable. Persons not belligerent, though enemies, are not even treated as prisoners of war. On the ocean they are suffered to pass unmolested, and are often, within the territory of an enemy, permitted to reside in peace, protected by the laws of the State. But above all, the life of a prisoner of war is to be held sacred, and he is to be treated with humanity and kindness. Engrafted on these usages, to secure them from violation, arose the practice of retaliation, which, far from being, even where it extends to the deprivation of human life, an act of cruelty, is, when soberly and correctly, though sternly and inexorably applied, sacred to humanity. Were it not for this sanction, we should probably soon bid adieu to the civilized and mitigated character of modern war, which would assume its ancient ferocity. Acts of retaliation are like judicial sacrifices on the altar of justice, in which, though humanity may weep, the offended laws must be satisfied. If it be replied that the instance is dissimilar, because the subject of retaliation is innocent, it is answered that the victims of war are generally innocent. It must be ever a subject of lamentation when we are obliged to take the life of man. It is still more a subject of lamentation when the blood of the innocent is shed, but the condition of humanity sometimes requires and justice sometimes commands us to do both. It is however said, that though retaliation be admitted to be a general right of war, yet when the natural sovereign finds his subject in arms against him, he has a right to punish him as a traitor, and that the sovereign in whose ranks and under whose colors he fought has no right to retaliate. But has not this argument been already refuted? Has it not been proved that all the rights of the victor over the captive are merged in those of war? There is no collision between the municipal laws and the laws of war. The captive is a prisoner of war and in this character never becomes subject to any other than the laws of war.

But it is attempted to be proved, by legal and historical instances, that Great Britain has punished her subjects who have been taken in arms against her, and thence it is inferred that this is the law of nations generally and of war. Were the premises admitted the conclusion would not follow. But these examples only prove exceptions to the general rule. They are cases in which power and violence have trampled on law and principle, because no national or other arm of sufficient vigor was interposed to protect and save the victims. The instances which have been mentioned are generally those which grow out of civil wars, and occurred at times when all resistance to the Government had been put down, and there remained no ability in the vanquished to execute retaliation. Such were the cases of Æneas McDonald, Colonel Townley, and others. In that of Doctor Story, which was most relied upon by the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. GASTON,) though he had become a Spanish subject and resided in the dominions of Spain for some years, yet he had returned to England and there had committed treason. On such a case there could be no question. [Mr. GASTON said this case was generally misunderstood, and was taken to be such as had been just stated by the gentleman from South Carolina—but in Dyer's Reports, where the case was best reported, it would appear that the treason was committed in Flanders.] I am glad, said Mr. C., that the gentleman has corrected me. I should be very sorry to misrepresent the argument of any gentleman, and especially that of one whose conduct in debate is so fair and honorable as that of the gentleman from North Carolina. I have not examined the case particularly, because the principle of my argument admits these cases. My object was merely to class and characterize them. Let it not however be understood, when I say that most of the instances relied upon occurred in civil wars, that therefore I admit them to have been authorized by the laws of war. On the contrary I will demonstrate, that even in civil wars, the law of nations protects the life of the captive who has resisted his natural sovereign, and secures him the rights of a prisoner of war, according to the usages of modern times. That when these rights have been violated, retaliation is authorized, and that history records the instances in which it has been successfully exercised. I hear it suggested (by Mr. GROSVENOR) that in civil wars this may be the law and usage of nations, but that it is otherwise when the subjects of one sovereign join the arms of another sovereign with whom he is at war. This does indeed seem to be a very extraordinary distinction—it does appear to me that if this inviolability of the captive can be established to be the law and usage of war in civil contests, it is a fortiori proved to be the law and usage of national contests. A single authority will put the first of these positions beyond doubt. Vattel says:

"A civil war breaks the bands of society and government, or at least, it suspends their force and effect; produces in the nation two independent parties, considering each other as enemies and acknowledging no common judge; therefore of necessity these two parties must, at least for a time, be considered as forming two separate bodies, two distinct people; though one of them may be in the wrong in breaking the continuity of the State, to raise up against lawful authority, they are not the less divided in fact; besides, who shall pronounce on which side the right or the wrong lies? On earth they have no common superior. Thus they are in the case of two nations, who, having a dispute which they cannot adjust, are compelled to decide it by force of arms.

"Things being thus situated, it is very evident that the common laws of war, those maxims of humanity, moderation, and probity, which we have before enumerated and recommended, are in civil wars to be observed on both sides. The same reasons on which the obligation between State and State is founded, render them even more necessary in the unhappy circumstances when two incensed parties are destroying their common country. Should the sovereign conceive he has a right to hang up his prisoners as rebels, the opposite party will make reprisals. If he does not religiously observe the capitulations, and all the conventions made with his enemies, they will no longer rely on his word. Should he burn and destroy, they will follow his example; the war will become cruel and horrid; its calamities will increase on the nation. The Duke de Montpensier's infamous and barbarous excesses against the reformed in France are too well known. The men were delivered up to the executioner, and the women to the brutality of the soldiers. What was the consequence? The reformed became exasperated; they took vengeance of such inhuman practices; and the war, before sufficiently cruel, as a civil and religious war, became more bloody and destructive. Who could, without horror, read the savage cruelties committed by the Baron des Adrets? By turns a Catholic and a Protestant, he distinguished himself by his barbarity to both sides. At length there was a necessity for departing from such affectations of juridical superiority against persons who could support their cause sword in hand, and of treating them not as criminals, but as enemies. Even troops have often refused to serve in a war wherein the Prince exposed them to cruel reprisals. Officers who had the highest sense of honor, though ready to shed their blood in the field of battle, for his service, have not thought it any part of their duty to run the hazard of an ignominious death. Therefore, whenever a numerous party thinks it has a right to resist the sovereign, and finds itself able to declare that opinion, sword in hand, the war is to be carried on between them in the same manner as between two different nations; and they are to leave open the same means of preventing enormous violences and restoring peace."

Here, then, we see the reason on which the rights and usages of nations are applied to civil wars, is, that those who resist have swords in their hands, and become assimilated to independent nations.

In short, the basis of retaliation is humanity. As no nation or body of men will suffer their enemies to put those to death who fight under their banners, under any pretence whatever, interest, and fear restrain an enemy from putting his prisoners to death, when he knows the act will be retaliated. But, retaliation is always a question of expediency. If we were at war with a nation dead to all the sensibilities of our nature—a nation that would suffer, without remorse or feeling, its innocent subjects to become victims to a sanguinary violation, on its own part, of the usages of civilized war, we might be obliged to forbear, as we would know the object of retaliation would not be gained. But, for myself, I deem more highly of the British nation and Government. I do not believe the Government of that nation to be so wicked as to provoke the consequences which must inevitably follow the execution of the barbarous threat they have uttered—that they would treat as criminals the natives of Great Britain, who have been taken prisoners in our ranks. Deserters alone have been permitted to form an exception to the general rule, that the life of a prisoner shall be sacred; and the humanity of modern times has even contrived the means of saving the lives of deserters. Hence, the practice of permitting the garrisons of captured places to march out with a certain number of covered wagons, which are not to be searched. (Vattel, b. 3, ch. 8, sec. 144.) The reason given, is, that they have become numerous, and that humanity forbids their destruction—undoubtedly a very sufficient reason, but exactly the reverse of that which is sometimes urged in justification of the threat of the British Government. It is said, that in consequence of the sameness of language, similarity of personal appearance, connexions in trade, and ease and frequency of intercourse, those who join us are numerous, and therefore it is necessary to punish them when found in arms.

I must again bring to your notice the authority which was yesterday presented to you by the gentleman from Louisiana, (Mr. ROBERTSON,) because it bears so directly on the question before you, and affords the views and opinions of the legislators and statesmen of Great Britain herself, confirming entirely the doctrine on which the Government of the United States acts at this time.

[Here Mr. C. read several extracts from a debate in the House of Commons, on a bill to raise a corps of French emigrants, in which Mr. Burke was the principal speaker.] (c.)

Mr. C. continued. No human authority can be of more value than that of this great man, (Mr. Burke,) who at once teaches the doctrine, and gives the examples which establish that doctrine, in all the extent in which this Government claims the right to exercise it. It is true, that in this debate Mr. Sheridan attempts to destroy the value and impeach the accuracy of some of the instances which Mr. Burke had mentioned, but, as was to have been expected, he has not succeeded. Mr. Sheridan says, in each of the examples Mr. Burke had mentioned—

“Except with regard to America, he had entirely failed. The first is the conduct of the English with regard to the Irish regiments in the French service in the year 1745. A space of near sixty years had elapsed when they took some of them prisoners, but it was not very probable that many of those who left Ireland in 1689 returned to invade England in 1745.” “The next, he says, was the conduct of the French to Lord Ligonier, who was one of the French refugees, banished from France by the revocation of the edict of Nantes—which was in itself one of the most cruel and barbarous actions that ever disgraced history—in the year 1682, and he was taken prisoner in the year 1747—a period of sixty-five years. So that the probability is, that it was the father of his Lordship who was a refugee, or at least that his Lordship must have been a child in arms at the time.”

It seems to be a work of supererogation to attempt to support the authority of Edmund Burke; yet, it may be proper to say a few words in reply to these objections of Mr. Sheridan. Though it be true, as he states, that few of the Irish brigades who entered the French service in 1688, remained to invade England in 1745; yet, it is a fact, well attested by history, that these corps were afterwards kept up by the enlistment of the natives of Ireland—a fact which leaves the example at least equally strong. Admit, too, Lord Ligonier to have been a child in arms, but a native of France, is not the example one which is diametrically opposed to the doctrine of those who in this argument deny the right of retaliation? They allow neither age nor circumstances to form an exception to the general rule.

I intended to have particularized many more examples, but the time I have already consumed admonishes me to forbear. The recent case of Napper Tandy is a strong one; but I mention it rather that it may be understood, and that its facts may be correctly stated, than to multiply examples. I think the gentleman from New York (Mr. GROSVENOR) stated that the ground on which he was pardoned was the circumstances of his arrest in a neutral territory—that of Hamburg—and that his pardon was granted in consequence of the interposition of the authorities of that city. But this cannot be. That Napper Tandy was in the service of France when he was arrested, and that his release was demanded by France, are facts that I take to be unquestionable. Retaliation was threatened, and I believe—I will not speak with confidence—the subjects of that retaliation were designated. To this interposition of France, Great Britain no doubt yielded. We know the great pains the latter took to obtain the person of this man. She not only violated the independence of a neutral State, but she interested Russia in the endeavor to get his person into her power. And it is not easy to believe, that, after all this had been done, she would have been moved to release him, from clemency to the individual, or respect to a weak State, whose feebleness had provoked so gross a violation of its independence.

But, there is another instance, in every respect more distinguished than any which have been yet mentioned, which may be adduced to support the doctrine that prisoners of war are not to be treated as criminals, though taken in arms against their native country. It is afforded by the conduct of the King of Prussia in the seven-years' war. He recruited his army from the neighboring States of Germany, with whom he was at war, and at one time enlisted seventeen thousand Saxons, who were not only the subjects of his enemy, but his prisoners; and yet we hear of no executions for treason, and consequently no instances of retaliation. It is from the general submission of the States of Europe to the rule of civilized war, for which we contend, that we find the subject of retaliation occur rather in treaties on the laws of nations, than in the examples of history. The instances are numberless in which subjects have borne arms against the sovereign of their native country, have been taken in arms, and have been treated as prisoners, while we have not had one single instance stated where the adopted sovereign has interposed his protection, in which it has not been effectual.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. GROSVENOR) has said this is a foreign cause. If I did not consider it to be an American cause, I would abjure and abandon it. I am not unaware, that, by the protection given to naturalized citizens, some men of the worthless and flagitious character, which was so strongly depicted by the gentleman from New York, will be embraced; but, the bounties of a Government acting necessarily by general rules, like some of those which Providence dispenses in this life, must fall without discrimination on the good and on the bad. The cause, however, is not therefore a bad or a foreign cause. It is the cause of the justice, the honor, the sworn faith, of the Government and the people—of the native people of the soil—who are bound to redeem the pledge they have given to their naturalized brethren to protect them. And, if some unworthy men take refuge under the sanctuary of its protecting shade, they will seek it, and enjoy it, as the felon was used to do who fled to the foot of the altar of that religion which he had trampled on and abused, but which did not therefore reject him from its holy asylum.

And now, sir, from all that I have said, I think I am authorized to conclude, that, while I admit perpetual allegiance to be a principle of the municipal law of England and of civilized States generally, the power of naturalization is exercised, at the same time, by all those States; and that they are compatible with each other. That the right of retaliation does not depend on questions of allegiance, naturalization, or expatriation, but on the laws and usages of civilized war. That these concede to belligerent sovereigns the right of protecting by retaliation, if necessary, not only their naturalized subjects, but all those who fight under their banners. That all persons taken in arms, without regard to their allegiance, are to be treated as prisoners of war, deserters only excepted—and that the fate of these also is generally mitigated.

I would add one word on the duty of the Executive. It is the general duty of the Executive to protect by retaliation, if necessary, all those who fight the battles of the country. But this is a duty which is to be governed by circumstances, and to be executed with great caution and sobriety, but with equal decision and firmness. If Government has been pledged to protect those who have borne arms, whether naturalized or not, it ought to extend that protection at every hazard and by every sacrifice which may result from a judicious exercise of the right of retaliation. It ought certainly to embrace all naturalized citizens. In relation to British subjects, who have not been naturalized, who may be in the army, they ought to be permitted immediately to retire from the service, if Government has the least hesitation in extending to them an equal protection with its naturalized or native citizens. Indeed it appears to me it would be its best policy at once to permit every British subject in the service to retire—I believe it would not diminish our forces a battalion—and then steadily and firmly defend the lives of those who have been naturalized. Thus to circumscribe our duties and strengthen our resolution to perform them.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. GROSVENOR) has said, I believe, that if the Chief Magistrate execute this threat of retaliation, and one drop of American blood be shed in consequence, his soul will be crimsoned with it. I will, on the other hand, say, if he shall fail to retaliate, if circumstances shall unfortunately require and authorize such a conduct, whatever may be the sentence of our day, posterity, judging more justly, will lament the degradation of the country, and will pity, if it do not more severely censure the weakness of the magistrate who failed to do his duty and support the character of the nation.

Notes by Mr. Cheves.

(a) "Many distinctions will be necessary in order to give a complete solution to the celebrated question, whether a man may quit his country or the society of which he is a member? 1. The children have a natural attachment to the society in which they are born: being obliged to acknowledge the protection it has granted to their fathers, they are obliged to it in a great measure for their birth and education. They ought, then, to love it, as we have already shown, express a just gratitude to it, and as much as possible return benefit for benefit. We have just observed that they have a right to enter into the society of which their fathers were members. But every man born free, the son of a citizen, arrived at years of discretion, may examine whether it be convenient for him to join in the society for which he was destined by his birth. If he finds that it will be of no advantage to him to remain in it, he is at liberty to leave it, making a return for what has been done in his favor, and preserving, as much as his new engagements will allow him, the sentiments of love and gratitude he owes it. Moreover, a man's obligations to his natural country may change, lessen, or entirely vanish, accordingly as he shall have quitted it lawfully and with good reason, in order to choose another, or has been driven from it meritoriously, or contrary to justice, in due form of law or by violence. 2. As soon as the child of a citizen arrives at manhood and acts as a citizen, he tacitly assumes that character; his obligations, like those of others who enter expressly and in due form into engagements with society, become stronger and more extensive; but the case is very different with respect to him of whom we have been speaking. When a society has not been contracted for a determinate time, it is allowable to quit it when that separation can be of no detriment to the society. A citizen may then quit the State of which he is a member, provided it be not such a conjuncture, when he cannot abandon it without doing it a remarkable prejudice."—Vattel, b. 1, ch. 19, sec. 220.

(b) "It is natural to consider the vessels of a nation as part of its territory, especially when they sail upon a free sea, since the State preserves its jurisdiction in these vessels. And as, according to the commonly received customs, this jurisdiction is preserved over the vessels even in parts of the sea subject to a foreign dominion, all the children born in the vessels of a nation, are considered as born in its territory. By the same reason those born in a foreign vessel are reputed to be born in a foreign country."—Vattel, b. 1, ch. 19, sec. 216.

"It is from the same reasons that the children born out of the country, in the armies of a State, or the house of its Ministers at a foreign Court, are reputed to be born in the country; for a citizen absent from his family on the service of the State, and who lives under its dependence and jurisdiction, cannot be considered as being gone out of its territory."—Vattel, b. 1, ch. 19, sec. 217.

(c) Lord Mulgrave said, "he rose chiefly to answer one part of the speech of the honorable gentleman who spoke last, which related to retaliation." "A contrary doctrine, he said, would lead to the most dreadful situation, for if the enemy should pursue this method of assassination, and should find that we do not do everything in our power to deter them, they would bully us from day to day with the threat of it, for the purpose of inspiring terror. He knew it was not the custom of civilized nations or of modern times to put prisoners of war to death; but if our enemies deserted that civilized practice, we must in justice to ourselves retaliate. He was, perhaps, going to involve himself in what he was going to say, but candor demanded it and he should speak plainly. The ground on which he intended to proceed at Toulon was this—he should have sent out a flag of truce, stating to the enemy, that, if any such violence to the law of nations and the feelings of humanity were offered by them, he should man for man retaliate; and, however cruel that might seem in us, and however repugnant to the feelings of human nature, he was ready to declare he believed it to be necessary in such a situation, for if we did not proceed on equal terms we could not carry on the war at all."

In another part of the debate he said, "While he had the command of the British troops there, (Toulon,) and the French who voluntarily flocked to their standard, under the authority and invitation of His Majesty's proclamation, he had always considered the latter entitled to the same protection, in every respect, from him as the British troops."

Mr. Dundas said: "From this topic he would refrain, not because he was less adverse to every calamitous consequence of retaliation, but because he considered everything that might or could be said upon the subject, under the present circumstances, to be injudicious and imprudent. Generals who for humanity and wisdom have been inferior to none who have yet lived, have found it necessary, in the field of battle, to stop cruelty by retaliation." "Everything on this subject, he said, depends upon circumstances, such as the conduct and character of an enemy, whether he be polished or savage, honorable or unprincipled."

Mr. Burke said, "As a general principle, founded on policy and the laws of nations, I am ready to repeat and maintain, that retaliation of any severity which an enemy may practise, is right and proper. The lex talionis is a part of the law of nations, as founded on that of nature. These corps must be considered purely as a part of the army under whose banners they serve. God forbid that the authors of murder should not find it recoil on their own heads. Such is my opinion relative to the justice and policy of retaliation. I would suffer no one act of severity to pass unretaliated."—"To the honor of practical humanity only four instances of wanton and unnecessary murder occurred through the whole course of the American war: a forbearance which reflects equal credit on both parties. In the history of princes some instances of unnecessary severity may be found, but their general practice is just and merciful. I, for instance, think the Cameron and Radcliffe, in the latter parts of our own history, should not have been executed. In 1688, the Irish brigades were taken into the service of France and retained their own uniform, yet England, though often courageously opposed by these troops, has not in any instance treated them as rebels, when the fortune of war cast them in their power. In the rebellion of 1746, a whole regiment of them were taken, but no severity was practised. France, under Louis XIV, conducted herself in the same way. Many of her regiments, after the cruel and impolitic revocation of the edict of Nantz, were taken into the pay of Prussia, Holland, and Britain; yet she never sacrificed these troops when they became prisoners. The battle of Fontenoy was gained principally from the exertions of the Irish brigades; and though they fought in open rebellion, these extremities were not thought of. Lord Ligonier, an officer of great note in the English service, a Frenchman by birth, when taken prisoner fighting against France, was exchanged in the usual course for an officer of the same rank. Fact is the mortal enemy of declamation, as analysis is of rhetoric; and, perhaps, from some decay of imagination likewise, I feel much inclined to avail myself of these advantages on this occasion. The same instances of mercy and forbearance may be collected from the conduct of Germany, Sweden, and every other Power in Europe."

When Mr. CHEVES concluded—

Mr. BAYLIES, of Massachusetts, rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of soliciting the attention of the Committee for a short time. I do it with great and unaffected reluctance, as I am conscious that my remarks must be of a desultory nature; and that so able, elaborate, and eloquent, has been the manner in which the bill on your table, and the topics connected with it, have already been discussed, as almost to preclude the hope that it will be in my power to add anything, either to instruct the understanding or interest the feelings. In truth, when this bill was introduced, it was not my intention to make it the subject of a single remark; but, on reflection, I was convinced that there would be a propriety in my stating the reasons by which I should be governed in my vote, and the ground on which I was prepared to justify it. This was the extent of my wish and intention; and even this wish and intention, I believe, I should have foregone, (after one ineffectual attempt to obtain the floor) had it not been that some remarks were made yesterday, in the course of debate, which, in my opinion, demand attention. The bill under consideration, should the blank be filled, in the manner proposed by the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, will authorize the loan of twenty-five millions of dollars. To pay the interest of the debt, thus to be created, it will be necessary to continue a system of taxation, odious and oppressive to the people. The principal of the debt will, I presume, descend as a burden to posterity.

It is not my purpose, however, to controvert the facts stated by the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, or his reasoning upon those facts—though that reasoning, I think, was more specious than solid. I admit that the resources of this country, under the fostering hand of a wise, prudent, and efficient Administration, would be equal to meet a debt of this, and even of a larger amount. But I am opposed to this bill, because its object is to place money in the hands of the present Administration, to enable them to pursue a system of measures and a course of policy hostile, as I think, to the best interests of this country; to enable them to continue the war in which we are now engaged ; a war which, I believe in my conscience, was in its origin unnecessary and inexpedient ; which is prosecuted without any adequate cause ; which, in its progress, has brought heavy and severe calamities upon our country ; and which, if protracted to any distant period, will, I fear, be productive of consequences the most disastrous.

While I claim the privilege of animadverting upon the measures of the Administration, I impeach not the motives of gentlemen who maintain opinions different from my own. It is my duty, however, to act according to the deliberate decisions of my own understanding, and the clear convictions of my own conscience.

An honorable gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. McKIM,) who spoke very briefly on this question, in an early stage of this debate, protested against going back to the causes of this war. I intend to abstain, in a great measure, from that consideration ; not that I think it impertinent to the question before us ; but it is not my wish to trespass on the patience of the Committee by dilating on a subject very familiar to them, and which has, on this, and other occasions, been discussed with an ability to which I can have no pretensions.

The minority, or the Opposition, as they are emphatically denominated, are accused of inconsistency, in admitting that Great Britain has done us wrong, and, at the same time, persisting in calling this war unjust. It is not every wrong that will justify a nation in resorting to arms to obtain redress. War, it has been well said, is the extremity of human evil. The most successful war, in a Government like ours, must bring with it, of necessity, a numerous train of calamities. It increases the public burdens ; it impoverishes the people, relaxes the moral habits, promotes a spirit of licentiousness, unnerves the hand of industry, and, by elevating the military above the civil authority, endangers our liberties. It was said, I think, by a gentleman of Virginia, formerly a distinguished member of this House, that this Government was not calculated for offensive war ; that it was putting the Constitution to a test which it could not endure. There is, in my opinion, much wisdom in the remark. The situation to which we are reduced is sufficient evidence of the evils of war ; our frontier is desolated ; our commerce ruined ; our Treasury exhausted ; the people discontented and divided, yet we were precipitated into war, "as if it was a matter of experiment," "an idle frolic," "as if the dire goddess, who presides over it, with her murderous spear in her hand, and her gorgon at her breast, was a coquette to be flirted with."

For what are we prosecuting this war ? For a cause, as has been shown by an honorable gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. GASTON,) for which war was not declared—for sailors' rights. The violation of sailors' rights is now the professed cause of this war, and the protection of them its avowed object. The subject of impressment under the Administration of Washington, ever the vigilant guardian of the rights and honor of his country ; under that of Mr. Adams and that of Mr. Jefferson, was not considered a sufficient cause of war ; nor was it so considered by Mr. Madison himself at the time of the arrangement with Mr. Erskine. The honorable SPEAKER has just acknowledged, that, in his opinion, war would not have been declared at the time it was declared, but for the Orders in Council.

It does appear to me, that the subject of impressment is indebted for the very great importance now attached to it, to the revocation of the Orders in Council. But allow that impressment furnishes a just cause of war against Great Britain, can we hope to obtain from her more upon this point by arms than by amicable negotiation ? It is well known that this right, which Great Britain claims to exercise, of taking from the merchant vessels of other nations her own native seamen, is considered by her as essential to her maritime strength ; in other words, as essential to her national existence ; and, so strongly is this claim supported by national sentiment, that no Ministry would dare to surrender it. She may consent to an arrangement upon this subject, which, without derogating from the right, may render the exercise of it less liable to abuse, and less injurious to this country ; but this can be obtained only by negotiation.

It ought to be considered, that this is not a novel claim set up by Great Britain. It has been exercised by her for a great length of time, even long before we existed as an independent nation ; founded upon principles which she holds sacred—that every nation, in time of war, has a right to the services of its citizens ; and that allegiance is perpetual. But an honorable gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. MONTGOMERY) denies to Great Britain the right to impress her own seamen in her own territorial jurisdiction ; it being, as he says, in violation of the principles of Magna Charta.

This I consider a question between the British subject and his Government, with which we have nothing to do. The practice of impressment has been justified by some of her ablest and most popular writers ; even by Junius himself, the great champion of Opposition, in his time, and has been recognised as a part of the common law by the judicial decisions of some of her most eminent judges. Though the claim of Great Britain is limited to her own seamen, yet it is true that American seamen are sometimes taken by mistake, and sometimes by the wanton act of the British naval officers. The number of our seamen thus taken I think, however, has been greatly exaggerated. Many British seamen pass as American under American protections, in obtaining which great frauds are practised. But whatever may be the extent of the injury which we suffer by impressment, I should be as much gratified as any person could an adequate remedy be provided for it. But how are we to obtain satisfaction by prosecuting this war ? I shall be answered—by the conquest of Canada. The conquest of Canada, for the purpose of incorporating it into the Union, though it may come "within the scope of the policy" of some gentlemen, is, in my apprehension, a project so wild, and I hope I may be pardoned the expression, so preposterous, that I cannot believe it will receive the deliberate sanction of a majority of this Committee, much less of the nation. Sad experience must have convinced us that Canada cannot be conquered without a great expense of blood and treasure; and, when acquired, it cannot be worth to us the price at which we must purchase it. We have territories enough. Instead of strengthening, it would weaken the Union.

As to the conquest of Canada as the means of obtaining a satisfactory peace, as an instrument of negotiation, I presume the most sanguine do not indulge the expectation of effecting that conquest under six or nine months; certainly not in time to assist us in the present negotiation; and, should we obtain possession of Canada, we never shall be able to extort from Great Britain, or purchase from her, by the surrender of it, any concession upon the point in controversy, of sufficient importance to justify the sacrifices we must make in the acquisition of it.

I stand not here to eulogize the character of Great Britain, or to exalt her power; but to pursue the true interest of my country, as far as my feeble understanding can enable me to ascertain it. I do not, however, consider it as any proof of the want of patriotism not to subscribe to the philippics pronounced by gentlemen against Britain. In assailing her in the manner they have, it seems to me that passion triumphs over judgment, and that, while advocating the cause of our holy religion, they forget that charity is its vital principle.

But it is said, Mr. Chairman, that the passage of this bill is necessary for defensive purposes; and gentlemen have on this, and on former occasions, in strains of impassioned eloquence, directed our attention to the sufferings of the people on our frontier. I charge not gentlemen with extravagance or exaggeration on this subject. The picture which they drew, glowing as it was, does not, I believe, exceed the reality. Your frontier has been desolated and drenched in blood. Your towns have been sacked and burnt. Defenceless women and children have been compelled, at an inclement season, to abandon their homes in terror and despair. Convince me that your measures are to be defensive; that your Army is destined to repel the incursions of the enemy, and to restore tranquillity and safety to our borders; as much as I reprobate this war I will, notwithstanding, go as far as any gentleman on this floor in granting means to the Government to effect these objects. But, for offensive operations, for the conquest of Canada, I will not, by my vote, grant one dollar. In acting thus, I am in the exercise of a Constitutional right, in the performance of a Constitutional duty; with my opinion, I should be a traitor to my trust if I acted otherwise. I know it has been said out of this House (and the doctrine, in my opinion, has been too much countenanced on this floor) that it is the duty of the citizen, and our duty as Representatives, to contribute—voluntarily to contribute, to the vigorous prosecution of this war, without recurring to its origin, or calling in question its justice or necessity. Against this doctrine I protest. It savors too much of the old tory doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance to be grateful to republican feelings. It is repugnant to the genius of our free institutions. It is at war with the first principles of civil liberty. If this doctrine is to be acted upon as correct, the blood of your Revolutionary heroes has been shed in vain; your boasted liberty is but an empty boast; your Constitution a dead letter; and worse, it insults you with a show of liberty, when suffering under the vilest bondage.

Where do gentlemen find this doctrine? Do they find it in the land of our ancestors? Do they find it in the writings or speeches of the statesmen or orators of that country? When the Colonies raised the standard of revolt, were the lips of Opposition sealed? Did not that great and enlightened statesman, the Earl of Chatham, whose eloquence carried terror to the Throne, pronounce Great Britain the aggressor? Did he not call the war, on her part, unnatural and unjust? Did he not rejoice that America had resisted? Did he not express his love and admiration of the Americans for contending for their rights? Did he not, in fact, exhaust the language of every term of reproach and invective, and apply it to the Ministry? Did he not charge them with temerity, with obstinacy, with incapacity, with the most notorious servility and corruption? He did, and drew upon himself the denunciation of that Ministry. They accused him, and those who acted with him, with aiding and abetting the enemy, and weakening the arm of Government. But a minority, it is said, may be unprincipled; that is true, and it is equally true, that a majority may be corrupt. Any party, whether minority or majority, who pursue an interest distinct from the interest of their country, who advocate or oppose measures for other reasons than those of public good, are a faction.

It is wrong, however, to argue from the occasional abuse of a privilege against the privilege itself. A minority, in this country, are bound by no limits but the laws, the Constitution, and their own consciences. Within those limits they have a right to range, with the privilege of discussion free as air, restrained by no rules but those which decorum and civility prescribe.

But it is said we are acting in opposition to the sentiments of the people; that the war is popular, and the vigorous prosecution of it demanded by the feelings of the nation. As to that part of the country from which I have the honor to come, this war ever has been, and I trust, ever will be, an unpopular and an odious war, especially as to the proposed conquest of Canada.

Upon this subject there is hardly a division of sentiment. Men who rally under the banners of the Administration upon every other question, put their faces against them on this.

I speak not merely of the merchants, that respectable class of the community. I speak of the real strength of every free country, the substantial yeomanry; the hardy cultivators of their own soil, who will defend that soil with their heart's blood. The subtlety of lawyers has not cheated them into the opinions they entertain. They have formed them by consulting their own good feelings, their own plain, unsophisticated understandings. I regret that I am under the necessity of making any remarks that may be considered in any degree as local. I disclaim all invidious comparisons between the different parts of the United States; but there have been so many allusions to the State from which I have the honor to come, and to the spirit which is supposed to manifest itself there, that I feel it to be my duty to call the attention of the Committee to the subject. There is nothing in the character of my native State that I shall blush to defend. There is nothing in the character of my immediate constituents which should humble me on this floor as their representative, unless it be the consciousness that they have conferred on me an honor beyond my merits.

The honorable gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. CUTHBERT,) whose animated speech I heard with the most friendly interest and attention, said that the inhabitants of New England were jealous of their rights. The people of this country were characterized by Edmund Burke as men jealous of their rights, alike to every invasion or supposed invasion of them;—"Who augured misgovernment at a distance, and snuffed the approach of tyranny in every tainted breeze."

The people of whom I speak, still possess some portion of that spirit. Such being their temper, they may be betrayed into excesses from an excitement of feeling; they may fall into errors of opinion from want of information; but it is not wise in Government to attempt to reclaim them by insulting their prejudices, if prejudices they entertain, or by treating with indifference or contempt their complaints, founded on their honest convictions. The Legislature of Massachusetts have passed no act which they had not a Constitutional right to adopt. They know their duty, and will perform it. They know their rights, too, and will, I trust, maintain them. There are, and I am proud to say it, some of the few survivors of the good old Revolution high in the councils of my native State—men who staked their lives on the issue of that contest which terminated in the acknowledgment of our independence—men who, in the path of duty, will be as little dismayed by the glitter of hostile steel as by the glitter of the tinselled invective of the honorable gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. FORSYTH.)

Great severity of remark has been indulged in relation to a distinguished individual in the Legislature of Massachusetts. That individual I know. He is a man of bright honor, and incorruptible integrity, who knows his whole duty, and is fearless in the performance of it; the worthy son of an illustrious patriot, who, in the Cradle of our Independence, by his zeal and eloquence, animated his fellow-citizens to a manly resistance of the tyrannical encroachments of Britain.

Can it be matter of surprise that disaffection to your cause should prevail among the people of Massachusetts, when it is deemed necessary, in support of that cause, to resort to measures, which, in their opinion, violate their rights—which cut them off from those pursuits which are essential to their prosperity, and which habit has rendered almost necessary to their existence?

The measures of Government have borne with such severity upon the people of that State, as to excite in them the suspicion that their rulers are indifferent, if not hostile, to their interests. The embargo is not calculated to remove that suspicion. By this act, the wretched remnant of that commerce which has survived your war measures has been annihilated at a blow. At the time they are called upon to contribute to the exigencies of Government, they are deprived of the means of complying with the demand. They are attached to the Constitution; they are attached to the union of the States; they have considered it the rock of their salvation; they will support it, until they shall be convinced beyond all question—until there shall not be left "a loop to hang a doubt on"—that the great purposes for which that Union was formed are to be deliberately, systematically, and permanently abandoned.

Gentlemen of the majority have been very liberal in their advice and instruction to the minority. As one of that minority, I feel a grateful sense of the obligation I am under, and am solicitous, as far as in my power, to discharge the debt of gratitude. It is not for me to instruct gentlemen of their experience and wisdom. I would ask them, however, and ask them in the spirit of friendship, if there is not reason to distrust the correctness of that system of measures which they are pursuing, when they find its effects have been so disastrous? Let them restore peace to their bleeding and suffering country; let them remove the shackles from commerce; let them abandon the restrictive system; let them increase the Navy, the cheap and natural defence of the country; let them extend an equal regard to the interests of every part of the Union; let them, in fact, return to the policy of Washington, "the first in our dangers, the wisest in our days of peace." In this way they will put down opposition. The people will forget their errors in the returning prosperity of the country. For myself, I solemnly declare I care not of what political party are our rulers, if they be men of understanding to discern the true interest of the country, and integrity to pursue it. That Administration is the best which renders the people most happy.

When Mr. BAYLIES had ended his speech, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, February 25.

Mr. BEALL presented a resolution of the State of Ohio, requesting that measures may be taken to secure prompt and reasonable compensation to the citizens of that State for supplies and other property furnished detachments of militia in the public service.—Referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. LATTIMORE presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the Mississippi Territory, praying that measures may be taken to ascertain and adjust their claims to certain tracts of land in said Territory.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. McKEE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill permitting certain locations of land to be made, and granting donations of land to certain inhabitants of the county of New Madrid, in the Territory of Missouri; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RHEA, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill to alter and establish certain post routes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ARCHER, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act for the relief of Thomas Wilson;" which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The resolution of Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, of Maryland, so to amend the rules of the House as to extend the honor of admission within the bar of the House to such gentlemen as have at any time previous been at the head of any Department of the Government, was taken up, and adopted.

On motion of Mr. INGERSOLL, of Pennsylvania, the bill reported by him for the better organization of the Courts of the United States for the district of New York, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for the third reading, without amendment.

[This bill apportions the official duties between the two district judges for the district, &c.]

THE LOAN BILL.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole, on the Loan bill.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen on the other side oppose this bill, because it will provide the means to effect an unrighteous end. They say that the war was unjust in its commencement. That, if originally just, it is now unnecessary, as the Orders in Council are revoked.

That impressment, of itself, was never considered a cause of war.

That the war might have been honorably avoided, by the arrangement made by Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney, and

That the system of retaliation, resorted to by the President, has given to the war a character of ferocity unknown to civilized nations.

Sir, before I proceed to detect and expose the fallacy of these assertions, permit me to call back your attention to our glorious Revolution—not like the revolutions of Europe, the exchange of one tyrant for another, but a revolution of principles, whereby the sovereignty of Kings was overturned, and the sovereignty of the people established on its ruins.

By the great charter of our independence, it is expressly declared, "that all men are by nature equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." That all legitimate power flows from the people, and is to be exercised, only, to promote their happiness.

This, sir, is the fair fabric of our rights, constructed by the proscribed patriots of the Revolution, and cemented by the blood of our martyred heroes. From this fountain flows our Constitution, constructed, expressly, "to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity;" and I conjure you, by the sacred obligations under which you act, to protect those sacred rights so solemnly secured.

I will now proceed to show that the war was just in its commencement; that the Orders in Council are not revoked; that the impressment of seamen, is, of itself, a just cause of war; that the arrangement made by Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney could not have been honorably adopted, and that the retaliatory system resorted to by the President was not an act of ferocity but of humanity.

Sir, that the war was just in its commencement will appear by a short review of the causes that produced it. In the year 1792, the venerable Washington declared that the practice of impressment was intolerable, and that it must be discontinued or war would be inevitable; Mr. Jefferson, then Secretary of State, was no doubt of the same opinion; Mr. Adams when President declared the same opinion, and the sentiments of his Cabinet, Mr. Pickering, and Mr. Marshall, now Chief Justice, Mr. Stoddard and Mr. Wolcott, which have been read, prove that they then were of the same opinion.

The law of nations expressly declares, that, for every injury, if redress is demanded or required, and unreasonably delayed, it is just cause of war; and Mr. Pinckney of South Carolina, when Minister, informs us, that on his application for impressed seamen, then in London, they were sent off, without suffering an investigation of their rights. Great Britain has no doubt, disclaimed the right of impressing American seamen, but has added insult to injury, by exercising it, and impressing thousands of our seamen in direct violation of her own admission. Our Ministers have told us, that while she impresses her native born subjects, who have been naturalized, married, and settled in the United States, voluntarily entering our service, she refuses to release native born American citizens, impressed into her service, because they are married and settled in England. Can such monstrous inconsistencies be submitted to? Was Mr. King, a Minister under two Administrations, by the exercise of his distinguished talents and devotion to this subject, enabled to effect an honorable arrangement? No! sir, and Lord Castlereagh declared to Mr. Russell,

FEBRUARY, 1814.

The Loan Bill.

H. OF R.

"that the friends of Great Britain in Congress were mistaken on that point." We see by the official documents in 1807, that out of 2,059 cases of impressment, 102 only were British subjects; that 1,142 were discharged, and 805 kept for further proof, with the strongest presumption that they were aliens, or Americans whose protections had been lost.

These 1,142 unfortunate citizens, I presume will be admitted to have been impressed, as they were discharged as such; and also the 1,600 declared by Lord Castlereagh in Parliament to have been impressed; even by the "friends of Great Britain in Congress" as his Lordship has dubbed them. And I hope honorable gentlemen, after Lord Castlereagh has declared that they were mistaken in their declarations, "that the Government, through Mr. King, might have honorably arranged the subject of impressment," will not further expose their devotion to that nation, nor deny that the 1,600 impressed in time of peace, and since made prisoners of war, is a just cause of war. I will next examine the spoliation on our commerce, their commencement and progress, with the pretexts under which they have been committed. Great Britain in June, 1803, passed an Order in Council, unlawfully restricting the trade of the United States with a certain portion of the unblockaded ports of her enemy, and condemning our vessels with innocent cargoes on their return voyage from ports where they had deposited contraband articles.

After it had been expressly decided by the High Court of Admiralty, that an American had a right to import into America the produce of a Spanish colony, and that landing the cargo and paying the duties would break the continuity of the voyage, and justify their re-exportation to any part of Europe; and after Lord Hawkesbury had communicated to Mr. King that decision, approved by the Advocate General, and by Lord Hawkesbury, establishing the law, that landing the goods and paying the duties in the neutral country would break the continuity of the voyage, and was such an importation as would legalize the trade, although the goods were shipped in the same vessel, on account of the same owners, and sent to the mother country that produced them. And yet notwithstanding this order—this decision of the High Court of Admiralty—this report of the Advocate General, and this official communication by Lord Hawkesbury to Mr. King, our commerce was swept from the ocean, and condemned in direct violation of the order, the decision, and the report of the Advocate General so officially communicated, and it would seem insidiously to inspire us with confidence, to increase that commerce, that they might, like the panther in ambush, unsuspectingly, leap upon their prey. This outrageous conduct gave rise to clamors in every commercial circle in the United States, and, at the opening of the session of 1805, the President informed us, "that the British had captured, in the very entrance of our harbors, as well as on the high seas, not only the vessels of our friends coming to trade with us, but our own also; that they have carried them off, under the pretence of legal adjudication; but not daring to approach a court of justice, they have plundered and sunk them by the way, or in obscure places, where no evidence could arise against them, maltreated the crews and abandoned them in boats on the open seas, or on desert shores without food or covering." "That new principles had been interpolated in the law of nations. According to them, a belligerent takes to itself a commerce with its own enemy that it denies to neutrals, on the ground of its aiding the enemy in war. But reason revolts at such inconsistency; and the neutral having equal right with the belligerent to decide the question, the interest of our constituents, and the duty of maintaining the authority of reason, the only umpire between just nations, impose on us the obligation of providing an effectual and determined opposition to a doctrine so injurious to the rights of peaceable nations." In January, 1806, remonstrances came in from Boston, Salem, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Charleston, praying that the Government would take the subject under consideration, and also the impressment of seamen. On the 17th January, 1806, the President again pressed the subject on the consideration of Congress, with the memorials of the merchants, which he told us would develop these principles and practices, which are producing the most ruinous effects on our lawful commerce and navigation. He remarks, "that on the subject of impressment our remonstrances have never been intermitted; a hope existed at one moment of an arrangement that might have been submitted to, but it soon passed away; and the practice, although relaxed at times in distant seas, has been constantly pursued in our neighborhood." On the 12th February, 1806, Congress took up the consideration of the Message of the President, with the memorials of the merchants, which relate to the spoliation of our commerce on the high seas, and to the new principles assumed by the British Courts of Admiralty, as a pretext for the condemnation of our vessels in their prize courts, and passed the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the captures and condemnation under the orders of the British Government, and adjudications of their Courts of Admiralty, of American vessels and their cargoes, on the pretext of their being employed in a trade with the enemies of Great Britain prohibited in time of peace, is an unprovoked aggression upon the property of the citizens of these United States, and an encroachment upon their national independence.

2. Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to demand and insist upon the restoration of the property of their citizens, captured and condemned, on the pretext of its being employed in a trade with the enemies of Great Britain, prohibited in time of peace, and upon the indemnification of such American citizens for their losses and damages sustained by these captures and condemnations; and to enter into such arrangements with the British Government on this and all other differences subsisting between the two nations, (and particularly with respect to the impressment of American seamen,) as may be consistent with the honor and interests of the United States, and manifest their earnest desire to obtain for themselves and their citizens, by amicable negotiation, that justice to which they are entitled.

The President immediately appointed Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney Envoys Extraordinary, and instructed them to insist on an arrangement for the protection of our seamen, and indemnification for spoiliations, agreeably to the said resolutions; and he also instructed them to procure an article for defining legal blockades. The British, not content with their new principles and aggressions under them, on the 16th of May, 1806, issued an Order of Council for blockading the coast from the river Elbe to Brest. On the 11th of May, 1807, they issued another order, blockading the Elbe, Weser, and the coast between the same; and also the Dardanelles and Smyrna. On the 8th of January, 1808, of Carthage, Cadiz, and St. Lucar, and all the intermediate ports between Carthage and St. Lucar, comprehending a greater extent of coast than their whole navy could blockade, agreeably to their own definition of a blockade. And Great Britain, although her Order in Council was made on the 16th of May, 1806, from Elbe to Brest, charges it to the account of France as a measure of retaliation for her decree, blockading the British Isles as a measure of retaliation for British violations of the law of nations by their said order, although that decree was made the 21st of November, 1806; and, although on its face it carried the absurdity of making the effect precede the cause, she was not without her votaries in this body, notwithstanding this extraordinary and outrageous conduct. Our Envoys, with all their zeal and abilities, were unable to procure a treaty securing us against impressment, or indemnification for spoliation, or even the definition of a legal blockade; nor have I ever heard an insinuation that they did not do all in their power to obtain it.

After the failure of redress, by treaty, the embargo was adopted, which, no doubt, had the most salutary effect of securing the remnant of our commerce from the gripe of the enemy, whose ports were crowded with the captured vessels of the United States; and when its effects were most sensibly felt by the enemy, writhing under its pressure, at the instance of our Eastern brethren it was repealed, and the non-intercourse law adopted, by which France and England were, after a certain time, interdicted the commerce of the United States, unless they revoked, or so modified their orders and decrees, that they should cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States. After this, Mr. Erskine, on the 18th of April, 1809, informed the Secretary of State, Mr. Smith, "that he was instructed to communicate to the American Government His Majesty's determination of sending to the United States an Envoy Extraordinary, invested with full powers to conclude a treaty on all the points of the relations between the two countries. That, in the meantime His Majesty would withdraw his Orders in Council, if the President would issue a proclamation for the renewal of the intercourse with Great Britain." Mr. Erskine being informed that his proposition would be accepted, on the 19th of April, 1809, in an official note, says: "I am authorized to declare that His Majesty's Orders in Council, of January and November, 1807, will have been withdrawn, as respects the United States, on the 10th day of June next." The President, on the same day, issued his proclamation, declaring, "that the Orders in Council will have been removed on the 10th day of June next; after which day the trade of the United States with Great Britain, as suspended by the act of Congress above-mentioned, and the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto, may be renewed." For this arrangement, the President was eulogised by the Federalists. Britain thereby obtained large supplies of provisions, but rejected the arrangement, as authorized by her Minister; and the President was charged by the Federalists, in conjunction with Great Britain, with seducing their Minister into the arrangement, with a knowledge that he had no power to make it. The non-intercourse law was, of course, again declared in full force against Great Britain. On the 5th of August, 1810, France, through her Minister, declared to our Minister, at Paris, in a note of that date, that, after the 1st of November, 1810, her decrees would be revoked, or so modified that they would cease to violate our neutral commerce, provided we caused our rights to be respected, by enforcing the non-intercourse act against Great Britain. We accordingly passed an act for that purpose, against which, however, the Federalists voted. And France, on the 28th of April, 1811, on the receipt of the act of Congress, enforcing the non-intercourse act against Great Britain definitively, ratified her revocation of her decrees, agreeably to her preliminary act of the 5th of August, 1810, upon the condition pre-expressed in our law. And although, in the Erskine arrangement, not one word was said about spoiliations, and the Government was applauded by the majority for the act; yet, in the arrangement with France, it was opposed by these gentlemen, and the Government denounced for not insisting on a contemporaneous agreement to pay for spoiliations. Great Britain neither revoked her Orders in Council nor sent an Envoy Extraordinary, but she refused to revoke them under the pretext that Erskine had no power: and she sent an Extraordinary Envoy, (Mr. Jackson,) whose history and dismissal you all know, who proved himself to be the same Jackson who so distinguished himself at Copenhagen. After all these things, and the declarations of Great Britain, that, on the revocation of the French decrees, she would revoke her Orders in Council, Mr. Foster, then Minister near the United States, unequivocally declared that, although France should have revoked her decrees as to the United States, Great Britain would not revoke her Orders in Council. In this posture of our affairs, and, after every effort to settle them by negotiation had failed, the war was declared. And, although gentlemen on this floor may declare it unjust, I have no doubt the American people believe it just, and that the honest historian will record it just. But they say the Orders in Council are revoked, which were the cause of the war, and to continue it, would be unjust. Had gentlemen examined the instrument and the despatch enclosing it, they would not have made the assertion. The Prince Regent declares that the Orders in Council of the 7th of January, 1807, and the 26th of April, 1809, be revoked; but, unless we repeal our act prohibiting British armed vessels entering our ports, that the revocation of his Orders are null and void; and "his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, is hereby pleased further to declare, in the name and on the behalf of His Majesty, that nothing in this present Order shall be understood to preclude his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, if circumstances shall so require, from restoring, after reasonable notice, the Orders of the 7th of January, 1807, and the 26th of April, 1809, or any part thereof, to full effect, or from taking such such other measures of retaliation against the enemy, as may appear to his Royal Highness to be just and necessary."

Mr. Russell, in his letter to Mr. Monroe, enclosing this act, says: "I can but regret that, in this document, any reservation has been made of a power of restoring the Orders of the 7th of January, 1807, and the 26th of April, 1809, to their full effect, whenever it shall be judged expedient so to do; as such reservation manifests an intention to maintain the principle on which they were founded, and in which I conceive the United States can never acquiesce." The United States did not repeal the act prohibiting their ships of war to enter our ports; therefore the act was, on its face, null and void. Nor do I presume any American could believe their Orders in Council substantially revoked, whilst they claimed the power to inflict them when it suited their convenience; much less, consent to an accommodation on terms which would imply our assent to an outrage against which we have solemnly protested.

As to the impressment of seamen being of itself no cause of war, I have already, in my review of the causes of the war, presented that subject in colors sufficiently strong to satisfy any American that theory could convince, and such as may not be satisfied, I should have no objection to their being practically taught, that it is such an outrage, that they themselves should declare it a just cause of war.

They also say that the war might have been honorably avoided, by the arrangement made by Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney. And that these gentlemen are high in the confidence of the Government, and I will add, known to be advocates for the war. Mr. Monroe, in his letter from Richmond, of 28th February 1808, after the expiration of his mission, I admit, writes to the President, that "the idea entertained by the public is, that the rights of the United States were abandoned by the American Commissioners, in the late negotiation, and that their seamen were left by tacit acquiescence, if not formal renunciation, to depend for their safety on the mercy of British cruisers. I have on the contrary always believed, and still do believe, that the ground on which that interest was placed by the paper of the British Commissioners of November 8, 1806, was both honorable and advantageous to the United States."

Mr. Monroe says in this letter, "it is far from being my desire to compromise Mr. Pinkney in the slightest circumstance." This, then, is the opinion of Mr. Monroe only, and is confined to the subject of impressment. But I would ask honorable gentlemen to examine the groundwork of this mission; the petitions of the merchants, the resolutions of Congress, the instructions of the President, and the public feeling and expectation, on the issue of the mission, and also the treaty itself, and form an opinion for themselves, before they condemn the President for not submitting the treaty to the Senate; and that on the opinion of one of the Ministers defending himself against the public indignation, as he himself informs us.

Sir, had this been a legislative subject, and submitted to a committee of this House, under such instructions, to protect our seamen, to indemnify our merchants from spoliations, and to define blockades and other minor objects, who had reported a bill omitting the three points on which they were specially instructed, what would have been the conduct of this House? Sir, they would have recommitted the bill to the same, or peradventure to some other committee. The President sent back the treaty to the same Commissioners, to recommence their labors, and to make no treaty if they could not secure such conditions as they were instructed to effect. And I believe no act of that Administration was marked with more energy, nor met more cordially the approbation of the people. What would have been the clamors against the President, if, on a mission in which he had been expressly instructed, as on this case he was by the resolutions of Congress, to demand and insist upon remuneration for spoliations and security especially against impressment, and he had accepted a treaty without either? Our Ministers inform the Government on the 3d January 1807, "they are sorry this treaty contains no provision against impressment;" but that the policy that the British Government had adopted in regard to this very delicate subject, her Ministers assured them, would secure us as perfectly as if in a treaty. And Lords Holland and Auckland subscribed the paper which states—"That His Majesty's Government has not felt itself prepared to disclaim or derogate from a right which has ever been uniformly and generally maintained, and in the exercise of which the security of the British navy may be essentially involved."—"That His Majesty's Ministers had been directed to give Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney the most positive assurances that instructions have been given, and shall be continued and enforced, for the observance of the greatest caution in the impressing British seamen, and that the strictest care shall be taken to preserve the citizens from any molestation or injury, and that immediate and prompt redress shall be afforded upon any representation of injury sustained by them." By this informal act they declare they cannot derogate from a right on which the security of the British navy may depend; although at the moment our Ministers were pressing on them an article, by the instruction of the President, "to impose heavy penalties on our captains who should receive on board or carry to sea British seamen, on her entering into a like stipulation that her captains shall not take on board or carry to sea American seamen." Would any prudent man believe our seamen safe under the policy of Great Britain, when she refused so correct a stipulation? Upon the point of spoiliations, our Ministers tell us—"they regret also, to be under the necessity of stating, that no provision had been made by the treaty to indemnify our merchants for the spoiliations on their commerce; that, at the time of signing the treaty, they stated explicitly they could not conclude it without satisfactory assurances of remuneration for unlawful captures." The British Ministry informed them they did not wish them to abandon their claim, but intimated that in cases of invested right it was not in the power of the Government to interfere to the prejudice of the parties; that it would be hard on the Government and unpopular to apply the public money to such a purpose; that the depending cases would not be unfavorably adjudged; that to enter into an engagement under the present state of things might expose the Government to the imputation of having done it by coercion.

Lord Howick intimated to our Ministers "that it would be better for them to address a note to him than the British Ministers, on the preservation of our rights to indemnity for spoiliations. We are preparing this paper, but fear it will not be ready in time to procure his answer to send you with those despatches. We think it our duty, however, to add, that we do not wish our Government to be too sanguine in the expectation of a favorable result. In the deliberations on this subject it may perhaps be better to presume that such an one may not be obtained, as it is not provided for in the treaty." Our Ministers send the treaty without any indemnity for spoiliations, or any agreement to reserve the subject for future negotiation, and advise the President to act on the treaty as if such a reservation was not to be obtained. Our Ministers also inform the Government that they endeavored to obtain an article to define blockades agreeably to Lord St. Hellen's convention with Russia, but without effect. I therefore ask, if, on their refusing "to derogate from their right of impressment," on their refusing "to stipulate for spoiliations, or even to reserve the subject for future negotiation," and on their refusing to define a legal blockade, three of the specified objects of the mission, any real American can think the arrangement made by Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney either honorable or advantageous to the United States, and that the treaty ought to have been accepted?

They tell us that the system of retaliation resorted to by the President, has given to the war a character of ferocity unknown to civilized nations. The term ferocity they borrow, no doubt, from the Maryland memorial, the production of a hopeful band, who ferociously broke into a temple of liberty, although locked with the key of our holy religion, and rifled it of three golden lamps, that had been selected by the sovereign people of Alleghany, and foisted in their place three others of brass, that had been rejected by them. Can such men, without book, be entitled to credit, who after kissing the book have violated the sacred charter of our liberties, and that in the most vital point, the right of suffrage?

Retaliation is a right of war, governed by the laws of war. Bynkershoek, in his Law of War, declares "that retaliation may be made on him who does the injury—that the safety of the people is the soul of the law of war."

In England it is a prerogative right vested in the Crown, where the sovereignty of the nation is lodged, an unwritten law. In the United States the sovereignty is in the people, and no power vested in the President but by written law, made by their Representatives, and for which purpose the law of retaliation was passed, vesting this power in the President.

King Charles, in his grant to the proprietors of Maryland, in section 12, says: "We have given, and for us our heirs and successors do give, by these presents, as full and unrestrained powers as any captain general of our army ever hath had unto the aforesaid now Baron of Baltimore, and to his heirs and assigns, by themselves, or by their captains or other officers, to summon to their standards, and to array all men of whatsoever condition, or wheresoever born, for the time being, in the said province of Maryland, to wage war and to pursue, even beyond the limits of their province, the enemies and ravagers aforesaid, infesting those parts, by land or by sea, and (if God shall grant it) to vanquish and capture them, and the captives to put to death, or according to their discretion to save, and to do all other and singular things, which appertain or have been accustomed to appertain unto the authority or office of captain general of our army." Here the right to kill the captive is unconditionally given, and, if one of his men was executed, would not only authorize, but by the law of war justify, retaliation. Blackstone, vol. 4, p. 7, says: "The right of punishing crimes against the law of nature, as murder, is in a state of nature vested in every individual, and when those individuals are formed into society, the rights of each must be vested in that body."

By Divine authority it is declared, an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, and whoever sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed; this law was certainly inscribed on the heart of Cain by the finger of God, who on killing his brother expressed his apprehensions, that whoever should find him would slay him.

The Loan Bill.

H. OF R.

On the 10th July, 1776, almost cotemporaneously with the Declaration of Independence, Congress passed the following resolution:

“Resolved, That if the enemy shall put to death, torture, or maltreat the prisoners retained by them, retaliation, the only means of stopping the progress of inhuman butchery, and, for that purpose, punishments of the same kind and degree, be inflicted on an equal number of the captives from them in our possession, until they shall be taught to respect the violated rights of nations.”

Congress on the 3d March, 1799, by a law of that date, authorized the President (if any citizen of the United States, who shall have been impressed into the British service, shall be taken by France, and by the authority of France shall suffer death or other corporal punishment) and required him to cause the most rigorous retaliation to be executed on any citizen of the French Republic.

I have presented to you, on this subject, the laws of war, the law and practice of Great Britain, the law of nature, and the law of God; the law and practice of 1776, and an act of this Congress under the Federal Administration—though I am aware, that it may be said, they were Frenchmen.

Sir, by your naturalization act, we give to persons every right of a citizen, except to be a President, and pledge the faith of the nation for their protection, as a counterpart of their pledge of allegiance. We are therefore as much bound to protect them as if native citizens; and were we to decline their protection by retaliation, we should be accessaries to their murder. And if Great Britain shall presume, under her claim of perpetual allegiance, to execute one of them, who have been taken in arms defending their adopted country, we will convince her that our power, without any claim of allegiance over her subjects, is as well founded, by exercising it. In this opinion I am doubly fortified, by the President recommending the act of retaliation, and by his vote in the old Congress, to hang Agsill for Captain Huddy, when Agsill was given up.

This power was exercised by the patriots of the Revolution, and with so much success, that in the debates in Parliament, we are informed, there were but four cases during the Revolution—then it will be recollected we were liable to be hung as traitors, and that now it would be murder in Great Britain to hang us.

Sure I am, if Great Britain is rash enough to hang these unfortunate captives, it will be owing to the conduct of the minority upon this occasion.

The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. PEARSON) tells us that such was our hostility to Great Britain, that for ratifying Jay's Treaty, which was so unexceptionable, Gen. WASHINGTON had been burnt in effigy; but on the inquiry where it had been done, the gentleman unfortunately fixed on Charleston, which their Representative (Mr. CHEVES) declared to be without foundation; and Mr. PICKERING said was a mistake, that it was Mr. Jay that had been burnt in effigy. Yes, sir, and that proceeded from the declaration of General WASHINGTON to Edmund Randolph, that he never would ratify the treaty with the “provision article in it,” whereby he kindled such a flame against it, that he himself could not extinguish it; and during the fervor it produced, Mr. Jay was burnt in effigy, nor do I believe there would have been much regret on the burning of the original.

This “provision article” was calculated to make us an accomplice in the starving of France, and was for that purpose inserted by Great Britain; then too, it will be recollected, that General WASHINGTON was such an admirer of France, that he said to their Minister on his presenting a pair of French colors, “To call you great would be but common praise—Wonderful people!”

However unexceptionable this treaty may have been, under it Jonathan Robbins was given up and executed, although he swore he was a native of Connecticut and had been impressed. Report has charged it on the then Secretary of State (Mr. PICKERING) without the authority of Mr. Adams; and as that gentleman is now in his seat, he will, by giving us the history of that transaction, enable the American historian to do justice to the man that did it.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. SHIPHERD) tells us we have gone to war for the phantom called honor. I, sir, have been taught to believe that honor in an individual was a substantial ingredient in his character, and regret that any Representative in Congress should consider it a phantom, in the character of the nation, that we had declared war to protect sailors' rights, and that every sailor in the nation was opposed to the war. A solitary tar in the gallery instantly exclaimed, “That's false; belay that fellow there!” This same gentleman exultingly tells us that Britain holds the trident of Neptune—that she is omnipotent on the ocean. Our contests with her on that element have shaken her empire of the ocean, and Captain Perry's signal victory on Lake Erie has marked him as the heir apparent to Neptune.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. SHERWOOD) puts us upon our guard not to offend the Eastern States; “that Connecticut, the State that gave him birth, is superior in arms to all the States to the south of the North river.” Stately, thoughtless youth! Did he think anybody would believe him? Did he believe himself? I confess it defied my credulity. However, I rejoice in the strength of a sister State, because her strength increases the strength of the Union, and I have no fears that her arms will ever be turned against her country, although we are threatened with a civil war. The gentleman has forgotten the valedictory monitions of the Father of his Country, not to use geographical arguments, and put in array one section of the Union against another; but should the seditious speeches in Congress lead to that unhappy catastrophe, I can assure that gentleman that the sons of the South or Centre would not turn upon their heel to avoid a conflict with him, either physically or metaphysically.

Sir, we have already seen some of the fruits of this freedom of debate in the remarks of Mr. Blake, in the Senate of Massachusetts; unless, per adventure, he might have been under the operation of Doctor Henry's pills. "Quid non mortalia pectora cogis auri sacra fames?" He said, that "British influence did exist, and he was proud of it; he was proud of the fast-anchored isle; he was proud of their influence in America; their laws, their manners, their religion—all our blandishments in life are to be ascribed to that moral nation." He declared, "there was more practical liberty in England than in any other section of the globe; and he was ready to exchange the Constitution for that of Great Britain, monarchy and all." I have, notwithstanding, so much confidence in Massachusetts, that I am certain no man can be found in that section of the Union possessed of so much temerity as to induce him to play the part of Cæsar, when he beholds the drawn dagger in the hand of a Brutus by his side. And I confidently hope that no portion of this happy land will ever be found to produce a Cæsar that will not produce another Brutus. I wish, sir, that honorable Massachusetts Senator was in that gallery, and that I possessed the power of Orpheus, I would make that Goddess of Liberty heave a sigh and crimson her marble cheek for the apostasy of so degenerate an American.

The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. Gaston) tells us that the war is offensive. Then, I suppose, the impressment of 6,257 seamen, and capturing 917 ships in time of peace, and refusing to give them up, was not offensive. He tells us Bonaparte insisted on our going to war if our rights were not respected. I would ask that gentleman what was the rider on that honorable arrangement Mr. Jefferson has been calumniated for rejecting? It was this—it was an instrument under the hands of the two British Ministers who signed the treaty, "that they were commanded by His Majesty to say that we must not submit to the Berlin decree of November, 1806; and that they cannot enter into the stipulations of the present treaty without an explanation from the United States of their intentions relative to that decree, or a reservation to His Majesty not to consider himself bound by the treaty in that event." It is well known France meant only our enforcement of the non-intercourse act, as the explanation of it and practice under it has proved. The gentleman finds great fault with the principle that free ships shall make free goods. Has our Government insisted on it? No. But if he will examine the history of the wars of 1737 and 1756, he will find Great Britain then insisting on it; then she was not omnipotent on the ocean, and wished the protection of law—but now, when we are told she holds the trident of Neptune, she prefers the ultima ratio regum; and we have ample testimony she means to use it to produce the penultima ratio regum—their interest. But he tells us we had like to have crowned our violations of all that was dear to the people, by adopting the French conscriptions. Would it not have been more in order to postpone his denunciations for our faults till we had committed them, than through the anticipation of a disordered imagination to charge us with them beforehand? I would ask that gentleman whether French conscriptions, which I understand to be a draught by lot of a certain number from all the young men as they arrive at the age of eighteen, to serve for five years only, can be so outrageous as the impressment of all seamen, without a lot, to serve for life? He politely charges us with practising a ductility of mind that begins its work by deceiving itself. If that was the fact, I ask him if it is half so exceptionable as that ductility of mind that begins and prosecutes its work by deceiving the people? He concludes by charging us with legislating under Executive caprice. I wish I could charge them with not capriciously opposing every measure of Government, however intimately connected with its prosperity and happiness.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. Grosvenor) charges us with pouring out incessant invectives against the British Government, but he forgot to state that they were defensive, and to justify us against the invectives of the Federal party against their own Government. He tells us that the President's soul will be crimsoned with the blood of our officers and soldiers, by violating our act of retaliation, which is limited by the modern usage of nations. If our soldiers, taken in arms, fighting for their country, and carried to England, shall be executed, the honest historian will fix their blood on the head of the Opposition, and will I trust record on the same page their opposition to the law of retaliation, after being informed by the President that he had no such power without a law for that purpose. What ought to be the respect of the Army for them, who, when Britain had such a power, denied it to their own Government? This gentleman is so well read in the secret history of Great Britain, that he tells us these unfortunate captives begged a British captain, on their knees, for a pardon, and offered to enter into their service upon that condition. It was their ferocity, and the scalping knife of their red allies they feared, not their justice. He tells us Great Britain has a right to punish them under her municipal laws—that her claim of perpetual allegiance will justify her in punishing them as traitors. And if Great Britain punishes them under her municipal laws for treason, cannot we punish her subjects in our possession by our municipal law of retaliation? If Great Britain, after being informed as she has been of our intention to retaliate, shall murder one of them, and we retaliate, will she not be guilty, in a court of conscience, of the murder of her own subject? Whatever may be the case, I am sure that while she believes that will be their unhappy lot, she will not venture on the experiment. But if she shall, I have not a ray of doubt that the President will execute as many Britons in their places, agreeably to the law of retaliation which he has sworn to execute, and thereby stop the further effusion of innocent American blood.

When Mr. WRIGHT had concluded—

FEBRUARY, 1814.

The Loan Bill.

H. OF R.

Mr. CALHOUN rose and addressed the Chair, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, it is now more than two weeks since the commencement of this debate; most of which time has been consumed by the Opposition in attempting to prove the bad faith, poverty, folly, and injustice of our Government and country; for all of their arguments and declamation, however variant and contradictory, are reducible to two objections against the passage of this bill. First, that such is the want of capital, or of public credit, that the loan cannot be had, or it must be at an extravagant interest; and secondly, if it could, the bill ought to be rejected, because in their opinion the war is unjust and inexpedient. The last of these objections, I propose to discuss. To examine both at large would occupy too much time. Without, therefore, discussing the question whether the loan can or cannot be had, I will merely offer a few reflections incidentally connected with it. It is a little remarkable that not one of the minority has discussed the material points on this part of the subject; I mean the question, Is the money proposed to be raised by this bill indispensable for the service of the year? and, if so, is a loan the only, or best mode of obtaining it? The Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has presented an estimate of the expenses already ordered, or which must be, by which it appears that the sum proposed to be raised by this bill, with the other sources of the revenue, will be absolutely necessary to meet them. The silence of the Opposition sanctions the correctness of the estimate; and as no other mode has been indicated of obtaining the necessary supplies, this may be presumed to be the only one. It ceases then to be a question, whether the loan can be had at this or that interest. It is necessary; it must be had; and the rate per centum will depend principally on the state of the money market—and not on the arguments here. Again; on comparing the two objections to the passage of this bill, one of them destroys all confidence in the other. Our opponents contend not only that the loan cannot be had, but that it ought not to be granted. To defeat the passage of this bill, or to prevent its successful operation out of this House, are the declared objects of their policy. It is true that all have not made the latter declaration; but none, as far as my memory serves, have disavowed it. When, then, they argue that the loan must fail, they may be considered either as dupes to their wishes, or, what is more probable, as aiming to destroy the confidence of moneyed men in the public faith; for it cannot be presumed that they have any hope to defeat the passage of the bill.

But to proceed to the objection which I proposed to discuss. The war, say our opponents, is unjust and inexpedient, and therefore this bill ought to be rejected. The facts of the supposed injustice and inexpediency of the war, on which this objection rests, have claimed the exclusive attention of the Opposition. The inference deduced from them, that they justify the rejection of this bill, though far from being an intuitive proposition, has received no part of their arguments or elucidation. For my part, I consider it not only false but dangerous; and shall therefore not only consider the alleged injustice and inexpediency of the war, but the inference assumed from those charges. I trust, with the attention of the Committee, to prove that both are equally unfounded. I must beg an attentive and deliberate hearing; for a correct mode of thinking on this subject, I do sincerely believe to be necessary to the lasting prosperity of our country. I say an attentive and deliberate hearing, for it is not sufficient that the mind be fixed on the discussion; but it should also be free from those passions and prejudices unfavorable to the reception of truth. The fact that discussion here assumes the form of debate, produces a state of things unfavorable to dispassionate attention. In debate here, as between two individuals, the opposite sides are much more disposed to find objections to an argument, be it ever so clear, than to receive it with a proper degree of assent. In their zeal the interest of the country is too often forgot. Mutual re-creation, and not to discover and persuade to do what is right, is but too commonly the object. I hope what I have to say will not be viewed as a mere exercise of skill in a discussion, in which those who hear me have little or no interest; but as containing principles believed to be essential to the public interest. I trust I hold in proper contempt the spirit of idle debate. Its heat and zeal are momentary. Not so with our principles and measures. On them must depend our future prosperity and happiness.

Is the war unjust and inexpedient? This is the question which I now propose to discuss. The eagerness and zeal with which our opponents endeavor to prove this point, seem to me not at all consistent with sound principles or due love of our country. In their zeal they often presume that we are wrong and our enemy right; and that on us is the burden to prove that their charges are false, before they have attempted to prove them to be true. How contrary this to the maxims of Roman wisdom! That wise and virtuous people, so far from presuming their country to be wrong, considered it as a crime in a citizen to doubt of the justice of the public cause. In a state of war how worthy of our imitation! It was at the root of Roman greatness. Without it a free State will ever lose much of its peculiar and native strength; the spontaneous and concurring zeal of its citizens. The charge of injustice and inexpediency against the war necessarily leads me to investigate its cause. It originated, as agreed on all sides, in certain commercial aggressions on the part of England, and her practice of impressing American seamen from American vessels on the high seas. Though I have named commercial injuries first, it is my intention to give impressment the preference in the order of discussion; not only because the war is continued for it, but because it is of greater intrinsic importance. The life and liberty of a citizen are more important to him and his country than his property; and consequently the obligation to protect the former more sacred than the latter. To the truth of this position, our political institution bears testimony. A single judicial process determines on a question of property; but it requires a double investigation, first before a grand jury and then a petit, before the humblest and most suspected citizen can be deprived of life or liberty. This is a mode of thinking worthy of a free people, and in fact is essential to the permanent existence of their freedom. Yes, life and liberty, those precious gifts of Heaven, are by our laws and constitutions guaranteed to all. They may be abused and forfeited to the country; but cannot be torn away by the hand of arbitrary power. Let us bear these sentiments in our minds and bring them in our bosoms to the discussion of this subject.

It is fortunate that the facts connected with impressment are few and undoubted. I set aside for the present the pretext and principle on which Great Britain acts in relation to it. None can deny that a great number of American sailors have been impressed from on board American vessels on the high seas, and by force compelled to serve a sovereign to whom they owe no allegiance, and to fight battles in which they have no interest. It is equally certain, that the practice is of long continuance; and that negotiation has often and in vain been resorted to for redress. I say a great number rather than specify any particular, because I do not conceive the exact number to be material; and also, because I do not wish to incorporate anything the least doubtful in the statement. On this point, however, the two Governments are pretty well agreed. Ours estimates the entire number taken at something more than six thousand; and the British Government acknowledged that, at the breaking out of the war, they had sixteen hundred at least on board their public vessels. After deducting from our list the dead by battle and disease, the deserters and the liberated, it will be found that theirs exceeds our estimate. To the shame of the minority, they alone have attempted to throw any doubt on this point—and to diminish the injury of the enemy below their own acknowledgment. On this simple statement, there are two inferences so clear, that I feel it almost an insult to the understanding of this Committee to state them. I must seek for my apology in the efforts of our opponents to render that doubtful which in itself is so manifest; I mean the violation of the rights and liberty of the impressed American seamen, and the correspondent duty imposed on their country to defend them. I know of no illustration of a proposition so perfectly clear. No head can be so impenetrable as not to perceive its truth; no heart so callous as not to feel its obligation. For, who is there in this community of freemen, that is willing to renounce the claim of protection which he has on all, or withhold the duty which he is under to all? It is the essence of civil society. Such and so simple is the truth on which the cause of our country stands. On these essential facts and inferences we are then on all sides agreed. The obligation of the Government is established. How then are we to be absolved from so sacred a duty? The impressed, the enslaved seamen have invoked the protection of their country. Shall it be extended to them, or shall it be withheld? This is the question now proposed for our consideration, and which naturally introduces the various arguments of the minority on this important subject. They combat against inferences the most clear and powerful; proportionally perspicuous and strong must be the reasons to justify their conduct. I will commence with that which I believe to be most relied on; because most frequently and zealously urged in justification of our enemy. It is said that they take American citizens by mistake, and not by principle; their object is to take their own seamen, but, from the impossibility of distinguishing, the American seamen is impressed. The answer is plain and decisive. The argument is founded in a misconception. The duty which the country owes to the impressed sailors originates in a single fact, that they are unjustly deprived by a foreign nation of their liberty. The principle on which they are deprived of their liberty, or the manner, constitutes no part of it. Whether done by principle or mistake, it is true, may have a bearing on the continuance of the practice and its future extent. For what is done by mistake or accident generally leaves this consolation, that it will not probably occur again; but what is done by principle may be expected to continue. We have not even this hope. The evil is inveterate. The mistake, if one it is, must forever happen so long as the present practice is continued of impressing from American vessels. It, therefore, operates, as it regards us, as if it were the result of principle. I, however, deny the fact on which this justification rests. The object of England is not to take her seamen only. By recurring to official documents on this subject, it will be found, that she impresses persons on board of our vessels who could not be mistaken for British sailors. She takes, indiscriminately, Dane, Dutch, Spaniard, and seamen of any nation. To speak another language and to wear a different complexion are, it seems, no evidence with the British Government that he is not an English sailor. What then is the principle of that Government on this subject? If we are to judge by facts, and not by pretexts, which will never be wanting, if we are simple enough to believe them, it is this: they claim, at least as far as we are concerned, that every seafaring person found on the ocean is presumptively an Englishman, and bound to serve the Crown of Great Britain. They admit, it is true, this presumption to be rebutted in a single case, and only in that; by the seaman proving that he belongs to the country to which the flag does under which he sails. If, for instance, the vessel is American, that he was born in the United States. The impress officer, the very person interested against him, is, however, the judge and jury who presides in this mock trial of nativity. It is thus that the American flag is insulted—it is thus the American citizen is stripped of his liberty under its protection! At home, he holds his liberty under the protection of the most sacred laws; abroad—no, I will not admit the distinction, for while under our flag he is still at home—he holds life and liberty at the mercy of every insignificant drunken midshipman! But let us attend for a moment longer to the object of this principle of the British Government, as illustrated by practice. A war in Europe, in which England is engaged, sooner or later, extends to all of the other Powers in that part of the globe. In consequence of her superiority at sea, the navigation and commerce of other States are destroyed, or suspended in a state of war; and their seamen, who cannot readily change their habits, are compelled to seek employment in foreign service. Until lately, America remaining neutral, and offering high wages, they naturally preferred ours. To this state of facts, her principle of impressing all foreign seamen was applied; and by its operation forced those who were by their own consent employed in our vessels, to serve by compulsion in her navy. Thus by a single process, under the pretext of taking her own seamen, the commerce and navigation of the world are converted into a nursery to support the British navy; and the practice of impressment from neutrals, on investigation, is discovered to be, like all of her other encroachments, a system of universal monopoly. Unless resisted by the steady and persevering efforts of other nations, she must eventually draw the commerce of the world into the vortex of her system.

It is next urged, that this is an ancient custom on the part of England, and Europe generally; that it is a part of the law of nations to impress on board of neutral vessels on the high seas. Those who urge this argument ought to substantiate it by a reference to the facts and to elementary writers on public law. Until this is done, it cannot be considered in a stronger light than a mere assertion. I, for my part, do not believe that it ever constituted the custom of Europe, or that of England, till since the period of the American war. If it were a general custom, why not recognised by some of the many writers on the laws of nations? They minutely state the cases in which a belligerent may enter a neutral vessel for the purpose of search. Why not this, also? None of the rights of search would be more important, and would better deserve their attention than this, if it really were one. Their silence, then, is decisive against the custom. I know that some English writers have set up an old claim, formed on the orders of their Government; but there is no proof of acquiescence on the part of other Powers; and, if they had, it could not be obligatory on us. The law of nations is composed principally of usages originating in mutual convenience. Among the nations of modern Europe who are distinguishable by their language and countenance, it is possible that impressment on board of neutral vessels there, may not be liable to the mistakes and abuses of which we complain, and even that it might be a mutual convenience. Such a custom, then, would not be extraordinary. But were those nations related, as are America and England; and if the practice must, from necessity, be attended with incessant abuse, it never could exist. If our opponents, then, had proved, and not merely asserted, such a custom, as between us and England, our country would have formed an exception. It is not applicable to our condition; it is unequal, not reciprocal, and attended with incessant abuse. As applied to us, then, the general usage, if there were one, ought to be removed by treaty, so as to suit the mutual convenience of both parties; an object which this country has ever been anxious to effect, but which has been studiously avoided by our enemy. If, however, our opponents still insist that it is a right, under the law of nations, and must, notwithstanding the argument which I have advanced, be considered as applicable to us, we may meet usage with usage; or rather doubtful uncertain usage, and opposed to reason, by that which is undoubted, and founded in the very essence of civil society. If to impress in neutral vessels is a usage of England and the rest of Europe, how much more so is it to afford protection to the subjects against foreign violence. This is the usage which is certain and universal—not confined to any particular nation—not originating in accidental circumstances—all States, the most weak and contemptible, claim it; and it is so mixed into the very essence of society, that it cannot be relinquished without certain destruction. On this custom, which combines both right and duty, we may oppose any pretext or claim of our enemy.

But, say some of our opponents, we are willing to defend native-born American seamen, but not the naturalized. I know not how those who make this distinction can answer a simple question, founded on fact. American seamen—yes, sixteen hundred, at least, native-born American seamen, by the acknowledgment of the British Government, are impressed and held in bondage. If, then, you are willing to defend such, why not support the war now carried on solely for the defence of these unfortunate citizens? What avail is the declaration, that you are willing to defend them, when you will not move a finger in their cause? But the distinction between native and naturalized is without truth or reason. It constitutes no part of the controversy between the two countries. We contended for the defence of American seamen generally; the enemy has not distinguished between the one or the other class. He insists on continuing a custom which makes both equally liable to his oppression. We will not, we cannot, hear of a distinction, until some security is afforded against the abuse of which we complain. Until then, I can consider it only as an equivocation, which acknowledges the duty of the Government to protect, but evades the discharge of it. We are told that our seamen ask no protection, and that it is strange that those who are most remote and least interested should discover the greatest anxiety for them. As to the first part of this argument, I deny its truth. The sailors have claimed our protection. They have importuned and invoked their country for it. We have had their application for protection laid before this House in the form of a document. It forms a large volume. Considering the cold indifference with which we have heard their prayer, I wonder that they have not, long since, ceased to consider us as their guardians. But we who stand forth to discharge this sacred duty, are charged with being back-woodsmen, men who never saw a ship until convened here in our legislative capacity. Admit the fact, and what then? Such generous sympathy for those who stand connected with us only by the ties of citizenship, does honor to our country. I hope it is not strange. It is usual. Our history abounds with many instances of this sympathy of the whole, with any part. When it ceases to be natural, we will cease to be one nation. It constitutes our real union—the rest is form. The wonder is, in fact, on the other side. Since it cannot be denied, that American citizens are held in foreign bondage, how strange that those who boast of being neighbors and relations, should be dead to all sympathy, or should not have the manly spirit to make a generous effort for their relief! There was a time when our opponents, to their honor, were not so cold on this subject. The venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, and another gentleman, high in the ranks of his party, formerly felt and spoke as we now do on it—like Americans. How unhappy the change! how unaccountable! Unless, indeed, by the poisonous effects of the spirit of systematic opposition; a spirit which, I lately observed on another occasion, clings more strongly to the cause of a party, than that of the country.

But great frauds, say our opponents, are committed in the certificates of protection. I will not spend much time on this frivolous argument. What right has England to complain of the frauds, if they really do exist? Whether they do or not, I do not think worth the inquiry. The argument, taken at the best, can have no weight, except with those who think that the freeborn citizens of this country, under our flag, are to be protected, like a slave, by a pass in his pocket. To give weight to it, we must forget our rights and duties as an independent nation. The framers of the law, under which the protections are taken out, did not intend that they should protect while navigating the ocean. The object was to identify the seamen as Americans in the ports of foreign countries; and this construction has been given to it by our Government in its negotiation with the British. In this view, the law is not unworthy of the wisdom and independence of our country; but I can scarcely conceive a greater national degradation than the policy of affording protection to our seamen on the high seas and under our flag, by a pass.

On the subject of impressment one argument only remains to be replied to. The practice of taking seamen in our vessels is necessary, say our opponents, to the existence of England. I would be happy to know the reason why it is necessary. We have pledged ourselves by a law, which we offer to make the basis of a treaty, not to employ a single British sailor. The provisions of the bill are ample; and we are willing to give her every reasonable security on this point. When the assertion is then made, in the face of this law and disposition to exclude her seamen, that the practice of impressing on board of our vessels is necessary to her existence, it must be meant, if anything is, in relation to American sailors. If so, before we surrender our rights and duty to the disposition of a foreign Power, I think it would be prudent to establish two points connected with this subject. In the first place, it ought to be clearly proved to be necessary to the existence of England. I, for one, will not agree to yield our independence on mere assertion, however respectable the authority may be by which it is made. In the next place, it ought to be proved to be our duty to submit. The sense of moral obligation is peculiarly strong in the bosoms of the American people. However great the sacrifice, if our opponents can establish it to be their duty, I dare pledge myself they will make it. Till both are satisfactorily proved, it would be highly unreasonable for them to demand of this country an acquiescence in a practice so ruinous. Our existence is at stake no less than hers; or, rather, the danger to her is imaginary, to us, real and certain. An undeviating attachment to its duty is the blood and life of a free State. Habitual departure from it must, sooner or later, be fatal. It infuses a poison into the system which will corrupt and destroy. Take this very case. It is our duty, most sacredly our duty, to protect the life and liberty of our citizens against foreign oppression. Instead of doing our duty, we have, for many years, quietly beheld them forced into a hateful foreign service. What has been the reason of this conduct of ours? The want of power? No; a vigorous and decisive effort in the very first instance, before the enemy had learned to be arrogant by our submission, would have strangled it in its birth. We yielded because we wished to enjoy the blessings of peace, its ease, its comforts, above all, its means of making money. The practical language of the Government to the people was, it is better to be rich than to be virtuous. Can we, then, wonder at the alarming growth of avarice? It is to be traced back to the original sin of our Government. The first American citizen impressed, and not immediately liberated, was good cause, in my opinion, imperious cause of war. No calculation of gain should have prevented it. To do our duty is more important than to be rich.

Before I take my leave of this subject, I will present to the Committee what I consider as a confession of the justice of our cause, and the correctness of our policy. I allude to the habitual and obvious misstatement which our opponents make on this subject. They say that we continue the war to compel Great Britain to renounce the right of impressing her own subjects. They must know that this is not the fact, and that it is calculated to mislead the opinion of the people. Why not state it as it really is? Why not say, what they know to be true, that the war is continued to protect from impressment American sailors? Is it not a fear of the public sentiment? Is it not a strong acknowledgment that the principle we contend for, if understood, would meet with kind and congenial feelings in the bosom of the American people? When the head is right, there is, among a free people, but little danger of the heart. When they are agreed in facts and inferences, they will never disagree in sentiment.

I will now proceed to consider the next cause of the war, the injuries done by Great Britain to our commerce. It is not my intention to speak of them in the detail, or to consider them as particular acts injurious to our trading interest. This view has been often presented, and is well understood. I propose to ascend to their origin, and to point out the spirit and principles of the Government from which they have flown. This view has not yet been taken, though it is of the most interesting nature. The detail of British injustice may rouse our indignation, but it is only by reflecting on the principles and character of her Government that we can justly appreciate the extent of our danger, and the measures best calculated to counteract it. Even the repeal of her Orders in Council, and the consequent suspension of commercial injuries, do not strip this view of the subject of any of its interest. For it ought ever to be remembered that the orders rescinding the celebrated orders of 1807 and 1809, expressly retain their principle. They, then, only slumber; and, as sure as we exist, her temper and policy will rouse them into action on the first suitable occasion, unless prevented by the firm and spirited conduct of this and other nations interested in a free trade. The commercial policy of Great Britain, which has vexed and annihilated the commerce of every other nation, began distinctly to develop itself in the year 1756, from which time to the present, I assert, without the fear of contradiction, she has habitually struggled to enlarge what she terms her maritime and belligerent rights on the ocean, at the expense of neutrals. The assertion is predicated on historical facts, which the general information of most of the members of this Committee will enable them to decide for themselves. I have neither the inclination nor the time to recite and examine the whole series in connexion. I will content myself with taking a brief notice of some of the most leading and characteristic facts. At their head, in point of time, is the order which takes its name from the year already mentioned, and which distinctly marks the commencement of this policy. The character of this celebrated rule or order is so well known as to need no comment. In the war of our Revolution she still farther enlarged her maritime and belligerent policy, particularly in the shape of blockades, since so enormously extended. This, and other encroachments at that time, produced that association of nations called the Armed Neutrality. The object of it was to check farther encroachments, and to remedy those that already existed.

It was acceded to by almost every nation in Europe. On the breaking out of the French Revolution, she, in pursuit of the same policy, made farther encroachments. One of the most considerable, and which was severely felt by this country, was an enlargement of articles contraband of war, so as to extend them to the numerous and important articles of breadstuffs. This was during Washington's Administration, and was the principal one of that period of our history. Preparations were then made to appeal to arms for the redress of so serious an injury, but was prevented by England's agreeing to make compensation for the injuries which we had sustained. With such spirit did our Government then act, although the injury then sustained dwindles into nothing compared to the present; and with so little accuracy has a gentleman from New York (Mr. GROSVENOR) spoken, who not only magnified the aggressions of that period over the present, but stated that Washington was unwilling to resort to arms for redress. In the present war with France, her maritime and commercial policy has hastened to its perfection. In the year 1805 it assumed an aspect most threatening to our commerce. It fell on our carrying trade, at that time in a most flourishing condition. Let it be remarked—let it be laid up in our memory—that the old rule of '56, the parent of all these aggressions, was, after many years, revived, and made the apology for our wrongs. Just so may we expect the revoked orders to revive. Blockades and Orders in Council followed the destruction of our carrying trade. They are too recent, and too severely felt, to need a particular recital. Negotiation was tried—negotiation failed; and the injuries continuing, have ended in the present relation between the two countries.

The English maritime and belligerent policy is not only such as I have proved it to be, but it is a policy peculiar to her, and is in opposition to the interest of the rest of the world. It is the interest and wish of all other civilized nations to ameliorate, or, if the expression is justifiable, to humanize the belligerent rights on the ocean. England stands alone. To establish this position it would be necessary to consider a little more in detail the series of facts to which I have already alluded; but, as I am fearful of being tedious, I must check my inclination and confine myself to a few observations only. A signal proof of the peculiar policy of England may be found in the history of the armed neutrality, which had for its object, as already observed, the restriction of some of those pretended belligerent rights. Russia, Sweden, Denmark, Portugal, Spain, and even France, though then a belligerent Power, acceded to it. It may however be said, that France, too, has often committed injuries on neutral trade. The fact is admitted. But without wishing to apologize for her, I conceive there has been a marked distinction (arising out of her situation) between her conduct and England. The latter has steadily pursued a policy hostile to neutral commerce on established principles; the former has been irregular in her hostilities, indicating more of passion than system. Besides, she has always expressed a regret for her injuries; and represented them, however unjustifiable, as intended to counteract those of England.

It remains now to prove what is the tendency of the British maritime and commercial policy; and where, if not counteracted, it will consummate itself. Reason and the general convenience of nations have for centuries established certain usages, by which belligerent Powers are in many instances restrained from doing all the injury in their power to each other from a regard to the interest of others. These usages constitute the rights of neutrals, which are for the most part well defined by the many writers on the laws of nations. Under the cover of what she calls her belligerent and maritime rights, the object and tendency of the British policy is to throw all those restraints on the ocean. It is in fact to undo all that has been gained to civilization on that element, and to return to the lawless state of barbarous ages. It is the interest of every other Power to restrain her within the limits of the ancient barriers; for if they are once transcended, there are no limits but what her power or interest may dictate. Neutral commerce, as such, will be annihilated. She will judge according to her pleasure what is beneficial to her enemy, and what to herself. The latter will be spared, the former destroyed. Nor will the evil stop here. The waves of power are incessantly washing away the mounds that restrain them. The transition is easy from this boundless extension of her belligerent policy, to a system of universal monopoly, in peace as well as war; a system which considers the ocean as her peculiar domain. I omitted, in its proper place, an argument which strongly illustrates this part of the subject; I allude to the great changes made in the British Court of Admiralty. Formerly it held jurisdiction, like all similar tribunals in other countries, under the laws of nations only. It was the creature of those laws, and intended only to carry their rules into execution. They were, of course, not under the municipal laws of the country where they happened to be located, as far as it regarded the rules of their decision. Thus constituted, they were one of the principal ornaments of the civilization of modern times. The whole of this is now reversed. The Courts of Admiralty receive laws as regularly from the British Government, as those of Westminster. The only difference is, that the statutes of Parliament form the rules of decision to the one, and the Orders in Council to the other. It is thus that England legislates for the ocean, and consequently for the world, on that great highway—and has her proper tribunal, with commensurate jurisdiction, to carry into effect her laws. But why should I consume time to prove her maritime policy? Who is there so stupid as not to see and feel its effect? You cannot look towards her shores and not behold it. You may see it in her Parliament, her prints, her theatres, and in her very songs. It is scarcely disguised. It is her pride and boast. The nature of her policy is then manifest and admitted; but it will be asked how can you counteract it? I answer, by the measures now pursued; by force, by war: not by remonstrance, not by negotiation; and still less by leaving it to itself. The nature of its growth indicates its remedy. It originated in power, has grown just in proportion as opposing power has been removed, and can only be restrained by power. Nations are for the most part not restrained by moral principles, but by fear. It is an old maxim, that they have heads but not hearts. They see their own interest, but do not sympathize for the wrongs of others. Such is the fact in relation to England. When neutrals are numerous and powerful, their rights are in some degree respected; when few and inconsiderable, despised. This last has been the unfortunate state of the world for the last twenty years. That counteracting influence, that repulsive power by which she was bound to her proper orb, has been almost wholly removed. This country alone was left to support the rights which belong to neutrals. Perilous was the condition, and arduous the task. We were not intimidated. We stood opposed to her usurpation; and by our spirit and efforts have done all in our power to save the last vestiges of neutral rights. Yes; our embargoes, non-intercourse, non-importation, and finally war, were all manly exertions to preserve the rights of this and all other nations from the deadly grasp of the British maritime policy.

But, say our opponents, these efforts are lost—and our condition hopeless. If so, it only remains for us to assume the habit of our condition. We must submit—humbly submit—crave pardon, and hug our chains. It is not wise to provoke where we cannot resist. But let us be well assured of the hopeless nature of our condition before we sink into submission. On what do our opponents rest this despondent and slavish belief? On the recent events in Europe? I admit they are great; and well calculated to impose on the imagination. Our enemy never presented a more imposing exterior. His fortune is at the flood. But I am admonished, by universal experience, that such prosperity is the most fickle of human condition. From the flood the tide dates its ebb; from the meridian the sun commences his decline. There is more of sound philosophy than fiction in the fickleness which poets attribute to fortune. Prosperity has its weakness; adversity its strength. In many respects our enemy has lost by those very changes which seem to be so much in his favor. He can now no more claim to be struggling for existence; no more to be fighting the battles of the world, and in defence of the liberties of mankind. The magic cry of French influence is lost. Hence were drawn those motives which stimulated her efforts almost to a morbid action; which united the Continent to her cause, and in some degree damped the ardor of her rival in power. In this very Hall we are not strangers to their magic influence. Here, even here, the cry of French influence, that baseless fiction, that phantom of faction, now banished, often resounded. I rejoice that the spell is broken by which it was attempted to bind the generous spirit of this country. The minority can no longer act under cover; but will be obliged to defend their opposition on its intrinsic merit.

It is not in this respect only, that our enemy has lost by the late events. The tremendous and exhausting conflicts of this and the preceding campaign, seem at last to dispose the Continental Powers to peace. If they have a just conception of their true interest, and are not prevented by British gold and intrigue, a Continental peace will ensue. There certainly is much alarm in England on the probability of such an event. Should it fortunately be the case—should the allies prove content with their fortune, and France submit to her present limits, all Europe must speedily combine against the British maritime policy. The great Power on land being crushed, to use the language of our opponents, but more properly being forced within proper limits, the great monopolist on the ocean will, I trust, be the next object of fear and resistance. The principle of the armed neutrality is not and cannot be forgotten. It exists essentially in the policy of modern Europe. Ever since the discovery of the passage round the Cape of Good Hope, and of this continent on which we have the proud pre-eminence of being the first great civilized Power, a great change has gradually been working in Europe. For two centuries the character of that part of the world has been eminently trading and commercial. The habits of every part is formed on that state of things. There lives scarcely a human being, from the ice and snows of Siberia to the sunny plains of Italy, who has not some habit, the gratification of which depends on commerce. Hence it has become an object of primary policy. All of the wars in Europe, for many years, have, with few exceptions, been more or less connected with it. The policy of every Court has been to obtain commercial supplies on the best terms, and as much as possible through the agency of their own subjects. With such habits and policy, it is impossible that they can behold with indifference the monopoly of Great Britain. They will not quietly suffer the common highway of nations, intended by a kind Providence for the common intercourse and benefit of all, to be converted into a domain of her Crown. No; the ocean cannot become property. Like light and air, it is insusceptible of the idea of property: Heaven has given it to man in such abundance and perfection, that no art or industry of his is needed to increase its quantity or improve its quality. All Empires attempted to be raised on it must partake of the fickleness of its waves. A policy so injurious to the common interest of mankind, must sooner or later unite the world against her. For many years, her encroachments, under the dread of France, have advanced without exciting much jealousy. The attention of all the nations of Europe was exclusively directed to the maintenance of their existence, menaced by the power of France. To preserve life is more important than to acquire comfort; so, to resist that Power was more imperious than to oppose England. Liberated now from fear, they will soon have leisure to attend to their interest. The difference between our policy and that of other nations in this respect, is only in appearance, and not reality. Each acted in a manner suitable to the circumstances under which it found itself. Attachment to France, as proclaimed by British partisans, formed no part of our policy. We were safe from the danger with which her power menaced other nations. A broad ocean was our immediate security. We resisted that Power which then and now presses on us, and which will soon cause itself to be felt and resisted by all. Should the course of events be such as I have described, then will the wisdom and spirit of our country be universally applauded. Our situation was trying and responsible. We alone had to sustain all the rights and duties attached to the neutral character. We were not intimidated by its difficulties. We dared, single-handed as we were, to make a stand against the favorite and obnoxious policy of our enemy. The present and temporary interest of commerce was nobly surrendered for its permanent advantages. The example can scarcely fail to produce its effect; but if unfortunately we should be left alone to maintain the contest; and if, in consequence, which may God forbid, necessity should compel us to yield for the present, yet our generous efforts will not be in vain. A mode of thinking and a tone of sentiment are excited, that must stimulate to future and more successful struggles. What we cannot effect with eight millions of people will be done with twenty. The great cause will not be yielded: No; never! never! We cannot renounce our right to the ocean which Providence has spread before our doors; nor will we ever hold that which is the immediate gift of Heaven under the license of any nation. We have already had success worthy of our cause. The future is audibly pronounced by the splendid victories over the Guerriere, Java, and Macedonian. We, and all nations, are in them taught a lesson never to be forgot. Opinion is power. The charm of British naval invincibility is broken.

In this, the only just view of our contest, how pitiful appear the objections of our opponents! Some pecuniary difficulties in Massachusetts and in other places. And must we for them renounce our lasting prosperity and greatness? Have we no fortitude: no self-command? Must we, like children, yield to the impulse of present pleasure, however fatal? If the maritime parts of Massachusetts suffer, let them remember that if the war should be successful, if our future commerce and navigation should be secure, they will partake most largely in the advantages, common and great indeed to all, but peculiarly so to them.

Suppose that our opponents, who object to everything, had been at the helm of Government; and that an opposite line of policy had been pursued. No embargoes, no non-intercourses, no non-importations, no war, and, in fact, no resistance to the injuries and aggressions of Great Britain. Who can be ignorant of what would have been the consequence? They would have multiplied in number and degree till our commerce would be annihilated. Unresisted, they would constitute future principles, and our acquiescence be construed into an acknowledgment of their truth. Then would we have felt what the experience of all ages has taught; that it is more easy to maintain than to wrest back usurped rights—wrongs submitted to, produce contrary effects in the oppressor and oppressed. Oppression strengthens and prepares for new oppression. The first wrong, by the universal law of our nature, is most easily resisted. It excites the greatest degree of union and indignation. Let that be submitted to; let the consequent debasement and loss of national honor be felt, and nothing but the grinding hand of oppression can force to resistance. I know not which to pronounce most guilty; the nation that inflicts the wrong, or that which quietly submits to it. In other respects the difference is marked. The former may be hated, but is respected, at least feared; while the latter is below pity, and any other feeling of the human heart, but sovereign contempt. In submission then there is no remedy; our honor lost; our commerce under the control of our oppressor. What next? The hopes and fears (those universal instruments of Government) of the whole mercantile parts of this country, and all connected interests, would be turned towards Great Britain; for the power of legislation over our commerce would be virtually transferred from the American Congress to the King in Council. Need I trace the consequence? The beams of mid-day sun are scarcely more clear. The very contempt which such baseness would excite, justly excite, in our enemy, would insure our slavery. It is impossible to allow any right, much less independence, to that which creeps and licks the dust. Such is the condition of our nature. We must have the spirit to resist wrongs or be slaves. Such were the alternatives presented to our country; and such would have been the result of the opposite policy, now recommended and applauded by our opponents. I have now delivered all that I intended on this most interesting view of our case. It has an elevation and clearness which render it attractive to my mind. I love to dwell on it, because it imparts a steady and clear conviction of the wisdom and necessity of that course of measures, to the adoption of which it is my pride to have in part contributed. I feel how little interesting all of the common topics of opposition are, after the view already taken. The descent gives a shock, which I know the Committee will partake with him who is addressing them. If, however, they will continue their attention, I will offer a few observations on a subject which has made a principal figure in the speeches of our opponents.

I allude to the character which they give to this war; that it is offensive and not defensive. On this point, I spoke fully when the Army bill was under consideration. What was then said has been introduced and objected to on this occasion. I then stated, the difference between an offensive and defensive war consisted in the motive and cause. If, for instance, a war is forced on the nation waging it by the oppression of that against which it is declared, it would be defensive, however it might be carried on; but if, on the contrary, it originated in ambition, or any improper motive, it would be offensive. This distinction is not supported by reason, but by the declamation of our opponents. They have for almost two years been in the habit of denouncing offensive war. They then acknowledged that such a war is wicked, and how can it bear that character but by its cause? It seems, now, that they have changed their grounds. We hear no more of the wickedness of offensive war; but, what is most strange, all their efforts are made to prove that it may be an innocent and virtuous thing. That nation, say they, is engaged in an offensive war, who first assumes a warlike attitude. However just, however necessary the cause of assuming it, the war is still offensive. Be it so. I care not for words. My answer is decisive. If my conception is just, that an offensive war is to be tested by the cause, I then pronounce ours not to be of that character; but, if your definition is correct, then an offensive war may be most just, most virtuous and necessary, and all of your declamation against it is idle and unmeaning rant. I tender an option, and care not which is taken. Those who defend a bad cause act imprudently in descending to particulars. Our opponents by doing so in this case have furnished the best reply to their own arguments.

On expatriation and retaliation, I will say nothing. The hour is late and I feel myself somewhat exhausted. I pass it the more cheerfully, as the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. ROBERTSON) and my colleague have replied freely to the objection on those subjects.

Before I proceed farther, it will be necessary to restate the propositions with which I commenced, so that the entire chain of the argument, both that which has already been advanced, and what remains to be, may be distinctly seen. It will be remembered, that I reduced all the arguments and objections of our opponents to the passage of this bill into two general propositions. First, that the loan cannot be had, or must be had at an exorbitant interest; and in the next, if it could be, still it ought not to be granted, because the war is unjust and inexpedient. I also stated that the latter position comprehended the assertion of the facts of the injustice and inexpediency of the war; and the assumed inference that they would, if true, justify the minority in their opposition to, and rejection of the war. On the alleged injustice and inexpediency of the war, I have presented my opinion; and trust I have satisfied the Committee that its justice is demonstrably clear and its expediency unquestionable; or rather its necessity imperious, if the preservation of the independence of the country constitutes political necessity.

But is it justifiable to withhold the loan, admitting the war to be, in the opinion of our opponents, unjust and inexpedient? This is the question now proposed to be discussed. It contains the practical consequence of all that has been said in opposition. Few propositions involve principles so deeply connected with the lasting prosperity of our Republican institutions; and in which, consequently, it is more necessary to think correctly. Error here cannot be indifferent. A false mode of thinking must endanger the existence of the Republic. I must then again entreat the attentive and deliberate audience of the Committee, while I offer my opinion and reasons on so interesting a subject.

In considering the question, how far a war thought to be unjust or improper by any portion of the people, would warrant their opposition to it, after it is constitutionally declared, I will set out of it extreme or flagrant injustice. A war impious or sacrilegious cannot be governed by the general rules which apply to ordinary cases. At least, it is not necessary for me to consider such extreme cases, as none can impute a character of that kind to the present.

I have already stated that the sum proposed to be raised by this bill is indispensably necessary to meet the expenses of the ensuing year; and that if it is withheld, it must communicate a fatal shock to public credit. In that event, not only the invasion of Canada would be prevented, which some gentlemen state to be their object, but the whole operations of the war, even that which is defensive in the strictest sense, would be abandoned. Officers and soldiers will no more serve in our garrison than Canada without pay. It is idle to talk of preventing the reduction of the enemy's provinces only by withholding the loan. Nor can gentlemen be serious. They have opposed every attempt to raise supplies in whatever shape it has appeared. They appear to be bold in facing bankruptcy. But have they reflected on the disastrous effects of their efforts should they be successful? The old and recent creditors of the Government, the Army, the Navy, which they boast of cherishing; in a word every individual would feel the calamity, for private no less than public credit would partake of the shock. I am wholly at a loss to perceive on what principle of expediency, policy, or morality, such conduct can be justified. Surely it is not an intuitive proposition, that, because the war is simply unjust and inexpedient in the opinion of the minority, therefore they have a right to involve the country in ruin, and place it bound as a suppliant at the feet of an haughty enemy. They then ought to state some intelligible and satisfactory principle on which their conduct may be justified. I have sought with attention, but have not found the semblance of such a one. On the contrary, all the analogies of private life, as well as reason, forbid and condemn the conduct of our opponents. Suppose a father do some act, which, in the opinion of a son, is not strictly just or proper, by which he becomes involved in a contest with a stranger. Would the son be justified in taking part against him? How much less then can any party be in opposition to their country in a war with another nation, for it stands in the place of the common parent of all, and comprehends, to use the language of a member, (Mr. GASTON,) all of the charities of life?

But what will be thought of the motive and conduct of the minority, when I state that much the greater part of the expenses of the war, for which this bill is intended, in part, to provide, has been incurred by their votes as much as by that of the majority. I hold in my hands the Journal of the 1st session of the 12th Congress, by which it appears that the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations was supported, not only by the votes on this side of the House, but by a decided majority on the other. The report ended in recommending six resolutions to the adoption of the House: to fill up the old establishment; to raise 10,000 additional troops; to increase the Navy; to provide for calling out of the militia; and to authorize the arming of private vessels. On the first of these there was a minority of eleven votes only—so unanimous was this House at that time! On some of the others, it is true, it was more considerable; but all met with the support of the gentlemen on the other side. What ought to be particularly noted is, when the Senate and this House disagreed on the second, to raise an additional number of regular troops, the former supporting 25,000, and the latter at first 10,000 men, it was increased to the Senate's number by the votes of the minority. The leading men on the side of the Opposition at that time, among whom was a gentleman from Massachusetts well known in this country, (Mr. QUINCY,) and another from New York of great influence, (Mr. EMORY,) and many whom I now behold, voted for the report. I have taken the trouble to turn down the pages where the respective votes are recorded, for the satisfaction of any member who may desire it. With what countenance can our opponents then withhold the supplies for expenses incurred by their own votes? Will they say that they knew not the object of the report? Miserable the excuse, and such as it is, not founded in fact. War with Great Britain was unequivocally announced; and even the invasion of Canada, now so hateful to them, was distinctly avowed. Was their object to embarrass, and finally to put the majority out of power? Will they dare to make an avowal so disgraceful to their party? The truth is, that the necessity of the war was, at that time, almost universally acknowledged; and as to its justice, no one doubted it. Its injustice was an invention of a period long subsequent. It is thus, that consistency, no less than reason, ought to check the minority in their opposition, and to induce them to unite with us to carry the war to a successful issue.

I would be glad to know what limits our opponents have prescribed to their opposition. If the supplies may be withheld because the war is unjust and improper in their opinion, will not the same reason justify every species of resistance both in and out of this House? If the public faith solemnly plighted—if the happiness of the country, are no checks to opposition, I see no reason why the laws or Constitution should be. Let some intelligible limitation be prescribed. I see none—to me it appears lawless. I know it will be said, is all opposition to be proscribed? Is none justifiable? We proscribe nothing. We propose no law; no restraint on the conduct of the minority. We appeal to the virtue and the intelligence of the community only. On the people must finally fall the ruinous effects of erroneous and dangerous principles. If our liberty is lost, theirs is the cost. Our Constitution supposes a degree of good sense and virtue in them adequate to self-government. If the fact is not so, our system of Government is founded in error. They only can arrest the effects of dangerous opposition. What they permanently condemn will meet with no support here.

H. OF R.

The Loan Bill.

FEBRUARY, 1814.

How far the minority in a state of war may justly oppose the measures of Government, is a question of the greatest delicacy. On the one side, an honest man, if he believed the war to be unjust or unwise, would not disavow his opinion; but, on the contrary, an upright citizen would do no act, whatever he might think of the war, to put his country in the power of the enemy. It is this double aspect of the subject which indicates the course that reason approbates.—Among ourselves at home we may contend; but whatever is requisite to give the reputation and the arms of the Republic a superiority over its enemy, it is the duty of all, the minority no less than the majority, to support. Like the system of our State and General Governments—within them are many; to the world but one. So it ought to be with parties; among ourselves we may divide, but in relation to other nations there ought to be only the American people. In some cases it may possibly be doubtful, even to the most conscientious, how to act. It is one of the misfortunes of differing from the rest of the community on the subject of war.

I cannot refrain from alluding to an observation made by a gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. GASTON), connected with this view of the subject. Speaking of the reduction of Canada, he observed, that his judgment and feelings were at variance; that when he consulted the former, he believed our efforts would be unsuccessful; but when the latter, his regard to the interest of his country led him to hope for success. I do not allude to this observation to point out any contradiction between it and his opposition to the passage of this bill; though I think it would be difficult to reconcile them. My object is to make an open acknowledgment to him for what I think the commencement of a more correct mode of thinking in relation to war. I thank the gentleman for his good wishes; and that in relation to the reduction of Canada, I know it does not contain an approbation of the attempted conquest—but it comports with the conduct of a good citizen, that since the attempt is determined on by the constituted authority, to wish it well. This seems to me to be in the true spirit of an honest Opposition; and I hope it will be so extended as to influence the general conduct of the minority. It is thus we may divide among ourselves, and the national strength not to be impaired. For I do not believe with those members of the minority who assert there is no loss of strength by their opposition. We are asked by them, why have you not effected your objects? you command the purse and the sword of the country, and can order whatever is necessary to be done. I will tell you the reason—because we have not your good wishes; it is this only which can add heart to heart. Government, it is true, can command the arm and hand, the bone and muscle of the nation; but those are powerless, nerveless, without the concurring good wishes of the community. He who, in estimating the strength of a people, looks only to their numbers and physical force, leaves out of the reckoning the most material elements of power—union and zeal. Without these, the former is inert matter. Without these, a free people is degraded to the miserable rabble of despotism; but with these, they are irresistible.

The same gentleman made an assertion which I am bound to contradict. He asserted, without attempting to prove, that this House had degenerated into a mere registering body of Executive edicts. A sense of decorum prevents me from speaking of the charge with merited severity. I will not meet the assertion with arguments, but assertion. It is easy to assert, but slow and difficult to prove; it were hopeless to oppose the latter to the former—the creeping pace of the one is no match for the winged rapidity of the other. I then assert that what the gentleman has said is untrue in fact. [Here Mr. GASTON entered into some explanation, and denied the use of the word registering; and concluded by wishing to know in what sense Mr. C. used the word untrue.] Mr. C. said, simply as implying that the fact is not as Mr. G. stated, and that he had too much respect for him to have an allusion to any other sense.

Some arguments and observations of mine on a former occasion, on the nature and character of opposition, have on this called forth replies from many of the minority, and particularly from the gentleman just alluded to. He asserted that a majority might also be a faction, and cited the Federalist to prove its truth; with the additional fact, that when it is one, it is far more dangerous than a factious minority. If the gentleman had been more attentive, he would have found that there is nothing in my arguments that contradicts the position taken in the Federalist. What I said was in reply, and was intended to refute the assertion of our opponents on that occasion, that all the misfortunes and miseries of free States originated in the blunders and folly of majorities. The error of this opinion I then sufficiently exposed both by experience and reason. It has found no advocate on this occasion. I will not again repeat my reasons, but simply restate, that opposition in free States is strongly inclined to degenerate into a struggle for power and ascendancy, in which the attachment to a party becomes stronger than that to the country. This opinion, I conceive, is incontrovertibly established; in fact, the truth of it is but too manifest to all who have looked into the character of man, or who are acquainted with his history. On the contrary, I feel no disposition to deny that the majority may possibly become factious—that is, cease to consult the general interest. I claim no peculiar exemption for them; it made no part of my argument; I stated principles, but left their application to the good sense of the community. Much less do I feel disposed to contest the position that, if such a majority could and should by any misfortune exist in this country, it would be more dangerous than a factious minority. I could not doubt, for instance, that if the present minority could be swelled into a majority by the addition of one-third more to their ranks, and that they should, when in power, retain all the principles which I hear them daily advance in this House, that they would not only be more dangerous than they now are, when their power is to divide and distract; but that it would be the greatest calamity that could befall our country.

A very important view of this subject yet remains to be presented to the Committee; but I feel that the hour is too late, and I am too much exhausted to enter so fully into it as it deserves. The view alluded to is the effects of this war, which has been pronounced so ruinous by our opponents. On examination, strong reasons will be found, to believe that it is daily producing the most solid and lasting advantages to the community.

It has already liberated us from that dread of British power, which was almost universal before the declaration of war. If we have done little against our enemy, he had done still less against us. What the state of public feeling was on this point, may be in some degree inferred by the debates in this House before the declaration of war. I cannot but express my surprise at an assertion of a gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SHEFFEY) that all of his fears and predictions had been realized. Has he already forgot the speeches in which he and his friends portrayed the effects of the war in such glowing and terrific colors? Rebellion, civil war, prostrated liberty, and conflagrated towns, all mingled in one horrid group. [Mr. SHEFFEY here explained.] It seems that the gentleman has availed himself of the usual privilege of political prophets. If events turn out anything like their prediction they are claimed as fulfillments; but if entirely opposite they are explained away. No one who hears me, but will acknowledge that the dread of England was great and general. Her power over our hopes and our fears were too great for our complete independence, and but illy comported with the steady pursuit of our own peculiar interest. From this state the war has liberated us, I hope forever.

We have also acquired in some degree, and are progressively acquiring, what to me appears indispensable in the present state of man and the world; military skill and means, combined with the tone of thinking and feeling necessary to their use. Occasional privations are always to be encountered in the defence of national rights, and the habits necessary to meet them with fortitude are of the greatest importance. I know how much this country is attached to peace and quiet industry. I know how delightful repose and safety are to our nature. But universal experience and the history of those nations with whom we are necessarily connected forbid me to indulge in the pleasing dream, that any degree of prudence or justice on our part can render such a state perpetual. The ambition of a single nation can destroy the peace of the world. We must then submit to the inscrutable law of our nature, which forbids the hope in this world of uninterrupted peace and enjoyment. We must also, as prudent men, rejoice at the acquisition of those national qualities necessary to meet the vicissitude of war when unavoidable. Connected with this subject, I rejoice to behold the amazing growth of our manufacturing interest. I regret that I cannot present my thoughts fully on this important subject. It will more than indemnify the country for all of its losses. I believe no country, however valuable its staples, can acquire a state of great and permanent wealth without the aid of manufactures. Reason and experience both, I conceive, support the position. Our internal strength and the means of defence are by them greatly increased. War, when forced on us hereafter, will find us with ample means; and will not be productive of that distressing vicissitude which follows it, where the industry of the country is founded on commerce, and agriculture dependent on foreign market. Even our commerce in the end will partake of the benefits. Rich means of exchange with all of the world will be furnished to it; and the country will be in a much better condition to extend to it efficient protection. I have merely suggested the topics of arguments on this important branch of our political economy: and will conclude by hoping that on some future occasion it will receive a suitable discussion.

When Mr. CALHOUN concluded, the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, February 26.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to amend the act, entitled "An act laying duties on sales at auction of merchandise and of ships and vessels;" which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time on Monday next.

Mr. FISK, of New York, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported the agreement of the committee to the amendments of the Senate, to the bill "to provide for the return to their own districts of vessels detained by the embargo in districts other than those where they are respectively owned or belong."

The amendments were then read and concurred in by the House.

An engrossed bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act for the relief of Thomas Wilson," was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill for the better organization of the Courts of the United States, within the State of New York, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported the bill from the Senate, "for the relief of John Cahoon and others," without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the whole House on Tuesday next.

A Message was received from the President of the United States recommending a suitable provision for such of the inhabitants, &c. of the Territory of Michigan as were left in a destitute and distressed condition during its temporary possession by the enemy; which was read and laid on the table.

The bill for the relief of Samuel Ellis passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to a third reading.

PUBLIC EXPENDITURES.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. EPPES on the 24th instant, for the appointment of an additional standing committee, to be called "A Committee for Public Expenditures."

Mr. EPPES explained his object in submitting his resolution; stating that the duties contemplated to be assigned to this committee would fully occupy it during the session, and was necessary to relieve the Committee of Ways and Means from much of the business at present referred to it, and which it was unable properly to consider, &c.

The resolution was then passed without opposition; and, on motion of Mr. EPPES, the Committee of Ways and Means was discharged from the consideration of such duties as are embraced by the resolution, and the same referred to the Committee for Public Expenditures.

THE LOAN BILL.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the Loan bill.

Mr. PICKERING, of Massachusetts, took the floor, and in a speech of three hours, took a general view of the conduct of the European belligerents, as it affected this country, and the course and policy of the American Government, during Republican Administrations, which he condemned throughout in strong terms.

Before Mr. PICKERING had concluded, he gave way for a motion to that effect, and the Committee rose; reported progress, and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, February 28.

Mr. JOHN REED presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the town of Fishbury, on the Island of Martha's Vineyard, praying that the act laying an embargo may be so modified as to permit them to export fish, oil, salt, wool, and other domestic articles and manufactures, to the States of New York, and Connecticut, and to return with breadstuffs and other articles of family necessity.—Referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. INGERSOLL presented two petitions from John Thompson, one for the allowance of interest on his accounts already settled under a late act of Congress, the other for a pension in consideration of disabilities contracted whilst an officer in the Revolutionary army.—Referred to the Committee on pensions and Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. NELSON presented a memorial of sundry inhabitants of the 19th Congressional District in the State of Virginia, remonstrating against the renewal of patent rights of any description, and complaining of the oppressive exercise, on the part of Oliver Evans, of his patent right to certain mill machinery.—Referred to the Committee of the whole House to whom is committed the report of the committee on the petition of sundry inhabitants of Baltimore, also complaining against the exercise of the said patent right.

Mr. GOURDIN presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the State of South Carolina, praying the aid and patronage of Congress in opening an inland water communication from the Chesapeake bay to St. Mary's river, in Georgia.—Referred to the Committee of the Whole to whom is committed the bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to subscribe for shares in the capital stock of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company.

Mr. JENNINGS presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the Indiana Territory, praying for pre-emption rights to lands on which they have settled and made improvements.—Referred to the Committee of the whole House on the bill to grant the right of pre-emption in the purchase, to certain settlers on public lands in the Indiana Territory.

Mr. ARCHER, from the Committee of Claims; reported a bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act, for the relief of the officers and soldiers who served in the late campaign on the Wabash;" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ARCHER reported a bill for the relief of Jervis Cutler; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. ARCHER also reported a bill for the relief of Edwin T. Satterwhite; which was read twice and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. ARCHER also reported a bill to provide for the payment of persons whose property shall be impressed into the service of the United States; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. ARCHER, the Committee of Claims were discharged from the consideration of the resolution instructing them to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the payment of individuals whose property was impressed by detachments of militia ordered into public service by any State or Territorial Government, and it was referred to the Committee for Revising the Militia System.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Committee for Revising the Militia System, made a report on the resolution instructing them to inquire into the expediency of making provision for the payment of a detachment of militia of the State of Tennessee, ordered into service by the Governor of that State, to act against the Indians; which report was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That no legislative provision is now necessary on the subject of the said resolution.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Jonathan Roberts, resigning his seat as one of the Representatives from Pennsylvania, having been appointed a Senator from that State. The said letter was read, and on motion of Mr. INGERSOLL, Resolved, That the Speaker of this House address a letter to the Executive of the State of Pennsylvania, communicating information of the resignation of Jonathan Roberts, one of the members returned from that State to serve in this House, in order that measures may be taken to supply the vacancy occasioned thereby in the representation of that State.

Ordered, That Mr. PITKIN be appointed of the Committee of Ways and Means, in the place of Mr. ROBERTS.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Samuel Ellis was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill to amend the act, entitled "An act laying duties on sales at auction of merchandise, and of ships and vessels," was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "to provide for the indemnification of certain claimants of public lands in the Mississippi Territory;" also, a bill "for the better organizing, paying, and supplying the Army of the United States;" in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

THE LOAN BILL.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole on the Loan bill.

Mr. PICKERING, of Massachusetts, resumed his speech against the bill, the commencement of which principally occupied Saturday's sitting. His speech to-day occupied three hours. The whole of which is here given entire, as follows:

Mr. Chairman: Yesterday a gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. WRIGHT,) in the course of his observations on the loan bill, mentioned but one thing which I think at all necessary to notice, and that not connected with the bill; it was the old story of Jonathan Robbins—and he expressed a wish that I would inform the Committee, whether the person so called was delivered up pursuant to orders from me alone, as the newspapers had often represented, or by the direction of the President of the United States.

This story, Mr. Chairman, has so often been gotten up for party purposes, I will, from my present recollection, give an account of it; although, like other "lies so oft o'erthrown," it may be again revived, and again rung through the United States, to serve the same unhallowed party views.

Being then Secretary of State, the application for the person called Jonathan Robbins, but whose real name was Thomas Nash, came to my hands. But that the case may be correctly understood, I will read that article in our treaty with Great Britain, (commonly called Mr. Jay's treaty,) which contains a mutual stipulation for the delivery of persons charged with murder or forgery.

"Article 27. It is further agreed, that His Majesty and the United States, on mutual requisitions, by them respectively, or by their respective Ministers or officers authorized to make the same, will deliver up to justice all persons who, being charged with murder or forgery, committed within the jurisdiction of either, shall seek an asylum within any of the countries of the other; provided that this shall only be done on such evidence of criminality, as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive or person so charged shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the offence had there been committed."

The President (Mr. Adams) having been consulted, and his express directions received, I wrote to Judge Bee, then the District Judge of the United States, for South Carolina, to this effect: That if the case of Thomas Nash came within the purview of the treaty; that is, if the evidence of his criminality was such as would authorize his apprehension and commitment for trial, in case the offence charged had been committed within our own territory; then he was to be delivered up to the British officer demanding him. This was done.

It will be in the recollection of gentlemen, that this man, Thomas Nash, with other ruffians of the crew of the British frigate Hermione, rose on their officers and murdered them, and carried the frigate into a Spanish port in the West Indies; Spain being then at war with Great Britain. Nash was discovered and arrested at Charleston, and the proceedings took place which I have stated. But Nash had assumed the name of Jonathan Robbins, and said he was an American citizen, born at Danbury, in Connecticut. This declaration of the ruffian, though entitled to no credit, was sufficient for the partisans of Opposition to raise a hue and cry against the Federal Administration, which they wished to pull down. I therefore wrote to the selectmen and town clerk of Danbury, (which was a small country village,) requesting them to make diligent inquiry, whether any person of the name of Jonathan Robbins had been born there within a period which I supposed would go beyond the age of Thomas Nash. They sent me certificates, that no person of the name of Jonathan Robbins had been born in Danbury, within forty or fifty years then last past. These certificates having been communicated to Congress, and published, put down the party clamor, and for awhile the slanderers were silent; but the ghost of Jonathan Robbins has since been repeatedly conjured up; particularly when at any time it was convenient to bring a railing accusation against me.

I fear, Mr. Chairman, that in discussing the subject before the Committee, I shall disappoint the expectations of my friends, without satisfying myself. For, though I have been long in public life, I have been but little used to public speaking. The memory, the arrangement, and the comprehensive view of a subject, which are necessary to a public speaker, in me are deficient.

I shall endeavor, however, to lay before the Committee facts which I deem important, with such inferences as shall occur to me; relying on the discernment of gentlemen to supply the rest.

A gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) has told you that the object of the minority was, to destroy the faith of the Government by preventing the loan. I am indeed opposed to the loan; but I distinguish between the faith of the Administration, and the faith of my country. The credit of the country is good, and under a proper Administration, acting in a cause in which the great interests and welfare of the country were at stake, the loan would be effected. My aim is, to put an end to this unjust and ruinous war; and therefore I will oppose all supplies for carrying it on. It is the duty of Congress to withhold supplies, pursuant to a power vested in them by the Constitution, when necessary to prevent any Administration from persevering in measures injuriously affecting the public welfare.

The same gentleman told us, that it was a maxim among the Romans, "that their country was never to be presumed to be in the wrong." Had not the Roman people been influenced by this maxim; on the contrary, had they questioned the rectitude of the measures of their Government, and reasoned on the causes and pretences for their perpetual wars, the ancient world might not have been deluged with blood; while nations sunk beneath the arms directed by the ambitious leaders of that Republic, as the continental nations of modern Europe have fallen before the arms of France; which, both in her Republican and Imperial state, appears to have taken Rome for her model. Any Government may err, either ignorantly or corruptly, and in either case, its measures tending to public mischief ought to be opposed.

The same gentleman, advertent to the alleged causes of the war, the British Orders in Council and Impressments, said he would first consider impressments, "because a man is preferable to a bale of goods." Yet property is the ground of almost all the quarrels among mankind, as well between nations as individuals. It was property, affected by the Orders in Council, which was professed to be the principal cause of this war. Property was, in fact, the primary cause of the contest with our mother country, which terminated in the war of our Revolution. Great Britain imposed small duties on a few articles of our imports from her, and claimed a right to impose others by an act of Parliament; and thus to take from us our property without our consent. I will therefore first inquire into the character of the British Orders in Council.

By our treaty with France, in 1800, concluded with Bonaparte himself, then First Consul, in the 12th article, it was agreed as follows:

"It shall be lawful for the citizens of either country to sail with their ships and merchandise (contraband goods always excepted) from any port whatever, to any port of the enemy of the other, and to sail and trade with their ships and merchandise, with perfect security and liberty, from the countries, ports, and places of those who are enemies of both or of either party, without any opposition or disturbance whatever; and to pass not only directly from the places and ports of the enemy aforementioned, to neutral ports and places, but also from one place belonging to an enemy, to another place belonging to an enemy, whether they be, or be not under the same jurisdiction, unless such ports or places shall be actually blockaded, besieged, or invested."

In flagrant violation of this article, Bonaparte, having overturned the Prussian monarchy, and seated himself in its capital, Berlin, there, on the 21st of November, 1806, issued a decree (thence called the Berlin decree) in the preamble of which he sets forth its pretended causes, the falseness or futility of which I shall show as I proceed.

"1. That England does not admit the right of nations, as universally acknowledged by all civilized people."

This general, sweeping and false declaration appears to be the text to be exemplified in the articles which follow.

"2. That she declares as an enemy every individual belonging to an enemy State, and, in consequence, makes prisoners of war, not only of the crews of armed vessels, but also of merchant vessels, and even the supercargoes of the same."

This charge against England might, with equal justness, be made against the United States, and all other nations; for all, including France herself, have always considered the crews of merchant vessels as well as of armed vessels, to be prisoners of war, and confined them accordingly.

"3. That she extends or applies to merchant vessels, to articles of commerce, and to the property of individuals, the right of conquest, which can only be applied or extended to what belongs to an enemy State."

In this England does no more than the United States did in the war of our Revolution, and do in the present war, and what all maritime nations have ever done; that is, capture enemy's merchant vessels and merchandise found on the high seas; and to capture them, is the object and hope of all our privateering.

"4. That she extends to ports not fortified, to harbors and mouths of rivers, the right of blockade, which, according to reason and the usage of civilized nations, is applicable only to strong or fortified ports."

This article, like the others, stating first a justifiable fact, is false in its conclusion. The right to blockade ports, harbors, and mouths of rivers, though not fortified, is not disputed by our own Government; whose only complaint has been, that such places have not, in all cases proclaimed to be under blockade, been blockaded in fact, by a sufficient naval force stationed before or near them, so as to render the entrance of our neutral vessels dangerous.

"5. That she declares blockaded, places before which she has not a single vessel of war; although a place ought not to be considered blockaded, but when it is so invested, as that no approach to it can be made without imminent hazard; that she declares even places blockaded which her united forces would be incapable of doing, such as entire coasts, and a whole empire."

By a document communicated by President Jefferson to Congress, in December, 1808, as one of the acts of the British Government imposing an illegal blockade in the West Indies, it appears plainly that the British Admiral exceeded his authority; the orders from his Government being, "that the strictest naval blockade be established over the Leeward French Islands," evidently meaning, by stationing a sufficient naval force before the ports so declared to be blockaded; for the British Government never claimed any other right of blockade.

As to the Emperor's charge, that Great Britain had declared "entire coasts and a whole empire" to be blockaded, it is one of those unfounded assertions which he can utter with great facility, particularly when Great Britain is the subject of reproach. The declaration of the most extensive blockade of a coast by the British Government, that I have any knowledge of, was that from the Elbe to Brest; which I shall take an opportunity to explain.(1)

On such false and fallacious grounds the French Emperor issued his Berlin decree; of which the following are the articles most pointedly violating our neutral rights, and his treaty with the United States, as well as the rights of Great Britain under the law of nations.

"Art. 1. The British islands are declared to be in a state of blockade."

This, in its terms, subjected to capture, by the French cruisers, all neutral vessels entering or attempting to enter any British ports; and nothing but the absolute inability of the Emperor to execute this part of his decree, prevented its being carried into effect.

"Art. 4. All magazines, merchandise, or property whatsoever, belonging to a subject of England, shall be declared lawful prize."

The object of this article was, to authorize his Ministers and officers to seize on all property of British subjects, wherever found, especially in neutral territories, where, by the law of nations, it should have been secure, and sacred as neutral property itself; but no rights have been regarded, where the power of the French Emperor could extend.

"Art. 5. The trade in English merchandise is forbidden. All merchandise belonging to England, or coming from its manufactories and colonies, is declared lawful prize."

By this article, the manufactures of England, and the productions of her colonies, although the property of citizens of the United States, or of other neutrals, became liable to capture and condemnation. If its immediate execution against American vessels, in the European seas, did not take place, it was owing to causes not explained; and not to the Emperor's intention to dispense with it; as he subsequently declared that he had made no exception in favor of the United States.

(1) See notes at the end of Mr. P.'s speech.

It was in fact executed against our vessels by some French privateers in the West Indies, as was stated by Mr. Madison himself.(2)

But the great object of the Berlin decree was, to blockade the ports of the continent of Europe against the entrance of British vessels, and of the vessels of every nation laden with the manufactures or productions of Great Britain or of her colonies and dominions; in order to ruin her commerce, and thereby destroy her power, which so eminently depended on the wealth and revenues arising from commerce. And on the Continent, the decree was carried into immediate execution; at Hamburg within four days from its date; although that city formed an independent neutral State, entitled to entire exemption from military coercion and violence. The French Minister there caused all English merchandises, "no matter to whom they belong," to be seized and confiscated. The same course was directed to be pursued in all other places, enemy or neutral, occupied, or which should be occupied by French troops.

On the last day of the next month, December, 1806, the treaty negotiated with the British Government, by Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney, was signed. But, before the signing, the British Commissioners mentioned to our Ministers this outrageous decree of Berlin, which threatened to subvert the rights and independence of neutral Powers; and for the information of their Government, delivered to them a note declaring, that "if the enemy (France) should carry those threats into execution, and if neutral nations, contrary to all expectation, should acquiesce in such usurpations, his Majesty might probably be compelled, however reluctantly, to retaliate in his just defence, and to adopt, in regard to the commerce of neutral nations with his enemies, the same measures which those nations shall have permitted to be enforced against their commerce with his subjects."

In the mean time, to check and counteract the violence of France, in actual execution, on the Continent, against British commerce, and against all trade in the manufactures and productions of the British dominions, the British Government issued their Order in Council of the 7th of January, 1807, prohibiting, not all commerce with France, as she, by the Berlin decree, had forbidden all commerce with England—but ordering "that no vessel shall be permitted to trade from one port to another, both which ports shall belong to, or be in possession of France or her allies, or shall be so far under their control, as that British vessels may not freely trade thereat." This Mr. Jefferson called "a new law of the ocean;" although similar to, but less rigorous than an old and established law of France, which prohibited neutral vessels laden, in whole or in part, at one port of an enemy, to go to the ports of any other country than their own, whether allied to France, neutral or enemy.(3) The great object of the British order was, apparently, to prevent neutral vessels carrying on the coasting trade of France, and the intercourse by sea between her and her allies; for the naval power of Great Britain having either captured, or driven from the ocean, the trading vessels of her enemies, they were constrained to resort to neutral vessels to carry on their commerce with one another, and in a greater or less degree, their coasting trade.

This very candid and friendly notice of the course Great Britain might be obliged to pursue, if neutral nations submitted to the Berlin decree, was represented by President Jefferson as cause of offence to the United States, and that no treaty, accompanied with the terms of that note, would be admissible. I know it will be said, that our Government did not submit, but demanded an explanation of the Berlin decree. It is true, that an explanation was asked of the French Minister of Marine, Decres, and that he, contrary to the spirit and letter of the decree, said it was not intended to infringe upon the treaty then subsisting between the United States and France; but added, that he was not competent to decide, and that application must be made to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Talleyrand, then with the Emperor at Berlin. Whether such an application was ever made, or answered if made, has not been publicly known.

The obviously proper course to have been taken by our Government was, to have demanded, not an explanation of a decree, which was too plain to require one, but its revocation; and upon the refusal to revoke, to interdict all commercial intercourse with France and her allies, and to have armed our ships, if necessary, for the protection of our commerce; which, owing to the small number of French cruisers, would then have sustained but little injury. (4) Instead of taking this safe and honorable course, our Government contented themselves with the absurd explanation of the Minister Decres, until the Emperor himself declared it erroneous and unfounded, and that no exception was intended in favor of the United States.

Such was the state of things when Great Britain, having waited almost a year, seeing the Berlin decree operating most injuriously to her commerce with the European continent, all its ports (those of Sweden excepted) being shut against her; Russia, pressed by the French arms in 1807, having also adopted the French Emperor's Continental system, pursuant to the treaty of Tilsit; in this state of things, the British Government issued their Orders in Council, of November 11th, 1807. These orders have been pronounced to be contrary to the law of nations, and unjustifiable; and this opinion, proceeding from men in power, and other citizens of distinction, became, probably, the current opinion in the United States. But for my own part, from the moment that I read those orders, I considered them as justifiable on the ground of retaliation, and on the principles of public law. Of the correctness of my own opinion, however, I should have entertained some doubts, had it not been confirmed by the opinions of gentlemen, among my friends, who were as conversant with public law, and thought as profoundly, as any citizens of the United States.

Among these was one of the first of men*—perhaps the brightest luminary that ever shone on this Western hemisphere.

The French Emperor, by his Berlin decree, and his orders for carrying it into complete and rigorous execution, had subverted the public law of Europe; and by his arms and influence, had brought all the nations (Sweden excepted) to bear against England alone; all thus conspiring for her destruction. What should she do against a world in arms? What would the sense of such impending danger, and the duty of self-preservation, suggest to any nation? (5) Certainly to retort upon those combined enemies and conspirators, the evils of their own injustice and violence; and, as they had taken new and extraordinary measures to deprive her of commerce, that she should retaliate and interdict all commerce with them. This she did by her Orders in Council, and in my view, on the principles of reason and public law. (6) In every new case, to which existing laws do not extend, reason is to be consulted—"reason, whose authority (says Bynkershoek) is of so much weight in the law of nations"—"reason, which is the soul of the law of nations." The municipal laws of a single State, when circumstances are changed, undergo corresponding changes; and when new cases arise, new laws are framed to provide for them. And such a new state of things had been introduced into the civilized world, by the ambition, injustice, and tyranny of the French Emperor; justifying and requiring, on the part of the nations not yet subjugated, new and extraordinary measures to provide for their safety and independence. On these grounds, the British Orders in Council have appeared to me perfectly justifiable; and, consequently, that they never furnished any cause or pretence for the present war; a war on our part, as unnatural and cruel as it was unjust. But, instead of resenting and resisting, as we ought to have done, the Berlin decree, our Government commenced a system of restrictive measures; in form levelled equally against France and Great Britain, but really intended to injure Britain only, while they aided the cause of France. This brings me to the consideration of a subject, old and stale, indeed, but of essential importance to be well understood; and which therefore I will re-examine—I mean the Embargo of December, 1807, the fruitful and immediate source of all the evils which have since afflicted our country; producing non-intercourse and non-importation, and terminating, as to the United States, in the greatest of all evils—war.

It will be recollected, that, just before this embargo was laid, the United States vessel Revenge arrived from France, with despatches from our Minister, General Armstrong. They arrived at Washington on the 14th of December, 1807. By the Revenge, news was brought that the French Emperor had said there should be no neutrals. This, indeed, was not long after gravely denied; but at length it came out in General Armstrong's own despatches, that the Emperor had said, the United States shall take the positive character of allies or enemies. But the people of the United States were not then prepared for a war against Great Britain. A gradual training for some years was requisite to bring them to that point. Nor were they prepared to adopt, knowingly, Bonaparte's Continental system; it could be introduced only under the disguise of an embargo; a name universally understood to mean a very temporary suspension of the sailing of vessels for some special occasional purpose.

Four days only after the arrival of the despatches from France, President Jefferson sent to Congress the following Message:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The communications now made, showing the great and increasing dangers with which our vessels, our seamen, and merchandise, are threatened on the high seas, and elsewhere, from the belligerent Powers of Europe; and it being of the greatest importance to keep in safety these essential resources, I deem it my duty to recommend the subject to the consideration of Congress, who will doubtless perceive all the advantage which may be expected from an inhibition of the departure of our vessels from the ports of the United States.

Their wisdom will also see the necessity of making every preparation for whatever events may grow out of the present crisis.

I ask a return of the letters of Messrs. Armstrong and Champagny, which it would be improper to make public.

TH. JEFFERSON.

DECEMBER 18, 1807.

The communications consisted of four papers. The first a proclamation by the King of Great Britain, dated the 16th of October, 1807, "for recalling and prohibiting British seamen from serving foreign Princes and States." This proclamation had been published in our newspapers. It was a newspaper copy Mr. Jefferson communicated to Congress. Far from having excited any alarm, it naturally lessened the public apprehensions on the subject of impressments; because, although it commanded British naval officers to seize and take, as usual, British natural born subjects from on board foreign merchant vessels, they were strictly enjoined "to permit no man to go on board such ships and vessels belonging to States at amity with Great Britain, for the purposes of so seizing upon, taking, and bringing away such persons aforesaid, for whose discreet and orderly demeanor the said captains could not answer; and that they should take especial care that no unnecessary violence be done or offered to the vessel, or to the remainder of the crew, from out of which such persons should be taken."

The second paper was a letter (bearing date September 18, 1807,) from the French Grand Judge, Regnier, to the Imperial Procureur (or Attorney) General of the Emperor's Council of Prizes, containing the Emperor's declaration concerning his Berlin decree. To the question, "1. Can armed vessels, under that decree, seize,

' in neutral vessels, either English property, or ' merchandise proceeding from the manufactures ' of the English territories? His Majesty notifies ' me, that since he had not thought proper to ' express any exception in his decree, there is no ' ground to make any in the execution, with ' respect to anything whatsoever." "2. His Ma- ' jesty has not decided the question, whether ' French armed vessels may possess themselves ' of neutral vessels going to or from England, ' although they have no English merchandise on ' board." Why this decision was delayed, does not appear. Probably, it was for the purpose of watching for some favorable conjuncture, when the few French cruisers that could venture to sea might make a more extensive sweep of neutral vessels, thrown off their guard by a temporary forbearance.

Of these two papers no secret was made; and for a plain reason—that both had been published in the newspapers: the British proclamation at full length, and the essential part of the letter of the French Grand Judge.

The third paper was General Armstrong's letter to the French Minister, Champagny, simply asking whether the Emperor, by his Berlin decree, intended to violate his treaty with the United States. And the fourth paper was Champagny's answer, announcing, with the usual assurance of a French Minister, that it was easy to reconcile the measures adopted under the Berlin decree with the observance of treaties. I will read these two letters.

General Armstrong's letter to M. Champagny.

PARIS, September 24, 1807.

Sir: I have this moment learned that a new and extended construction, highly injurious to the commerce of the United States, was about to be given to the Imperial decree of the 21st of November last. It is, therefore, incumbent on me to ask your Excellency an explanation of his Majesty's views in relation to this subject, and particularly whether it be his Majesty's intention, in any degree, to infract the obligations of the treaty subsisting between the United States and the French Empire?

I pray your Excellency, &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

The answer of M. Champagny to General Armstrong, dated October 7, 1807.

Sir: You did me the honor, on the 24th of September, to request me to send you some explanations as to the execution of the decree of blockade of the British islands, as to vessels of the United States.

The provisions of all the regulations and treaties relative to a state of blockade have appeared applicable to the existing circumstance; and it results, from the explanations which have been addressed to me by the Imperial Procureur General of the Council of Prizes, that His Majesty has considered every neutral vessel going from English ports, with cargoes of English merchandise, or of English origin, as lawfully seizable by French armed vessels.

The decree of blockade has been now issued eleven months. The principal Powers of Europe, far from protesting against its provisions, have adopted them. They have perceived that its execution must be complete, to render it more effectual; and it has seemed easy to reconcile these measures with the observance of treaties, especially at a time when the infractions, by England, of the rights of all maritime Powers, render their interest common, and tend to unite them in the support of the same cause. Accept, &c.

CHAMPAGNY.

Here we see that Armstrong's and Champagny's letters exhibit no new source of danger to our seamen, ships, and merchandise; but, on the contrary, refer directly to the Emperor's decision in Regnier's letter, already published in substance, and not attempted by Mr. Jefferson to be concealed. Why, then, did he say that Armstrong's and Champagny's letters ought not to be made public, and, with over-abundant caution, desire the return of them to himself? The answer is easy. Had the letters been published, the bold imposture would have been detected. Although the majorities in the two Houses of Congress, reposing a blind confidence in Mr. Jefferson, did not discern the imposition, citizens abroad would, at the first glance, have discovered and denounced the cheat; and the nation, shocked at the contemplated mischief, would not have acquiesced in the measure. But a mystery was thrown over the transaction, by the solemn withdrawing of those two harmless letters; which, it was natural for the people to suppose, contained the evidences of the mighty dangers against which the entire shutting up of our ports was a necessary precaution. The project succeeded; and the people, for near fifteen months, endured all the evils and losses of a suspended commerce and navigation, which had given employment and subsistence to some hundreds of thousands of citizens on the seaboard, and general prosperity to the country. But what ought to be the surprise of gentlemen, after all this mysterious secrecy about the two letters of Armstrong and Champagny, to be informed that, precisely three months after passing the Embargo law, to wit, on the 22d of March, 1808, Mr. Jefferson, of his own accord, laid these same letters openly before Congress? But how? Mingled with a mass of other documents, making now a printed volume of upwards of five hundred pages! And strangers would not suspect, nor members of Congress know, (unless they had good memories,) that the two letters had any relation to the embargo.

I have called the two letters harmless; and so they were, as to any indications of increased danger to our seamen, ships, and merchandise; but in Champagny's, may be seen the latent cause of the embargo. I have before remarked, that the essence and main operation of the Berlin decree, declaring the British islands in a state of blockade, was the shutting up of the ports of the European continent (thence called the continental system) against all British ships, and against all the manufactures and productions of the British dominions, in neutral ships, for the purpose of reducing and destroying the commerce of Great Britain, and with that her naval power. And the French Minister tells General Armstrong, that the principal Powers of Europe, far from protesting against the provisions of the Berlin decree of blockade, had adopted them; and that they had perceived "that its execution must be complete, to render it more effectual." And what was wanting to render it complete? Nothing but to shut up, in like manner, all the ports of the United States, between which and the British dominions commercial intercourse was of vast extent, and alike advantageous to both countries. And this adoption and completion of the French Emperor's continental system was effected under the deceitful name of embargo.

I pray gentlemen to remember, that this embargo was recommended solely and absolutely on the great and increasing dangers to our seamen, ships, and merchandise, pretended to be manifested in the four papers communicated with Mr. Jefferson's Message. Now, I will show, from his own documents, that both he and Mr. Madison (then Secretary of State) knew, and soon after acknowledged, that no such dangers existed.

Mr. Madison, in his letter of March 25, 1808, (only three months subsequent to the Embargo law,) to the British Minister here, Mr. Erskine, referring to the Berlin decree, represents it as a mere declaration of the French Emperor, either without the intention or without the means to carry it into effect against the United States; and therefore not authorizing the retaliatory measure of the British Orders in Council.

But still earlier, on the 8th of February, 1808, only seven weeks after the embargo was imposed, Mr. Madison, writing to General Armstrong, and pronouncing the Berlin decree, as construed and enforced by the Emperor, to be as well a violation of our treaty with France, as of the incontestable principles of public law, declares—"The conduct of the French Government, in giving this extended operation to its decree, and, indeed, in issuing one with such an apparent or doubtful import against the rights of the sea, is the more extraordinary, inasmuch as the inability to enforce it on that element exhibited the measure in the light of an empty menace."

And now, sir, who can think with patience on the extensive mischiefs brought on the people of the United States by this embargo, when the Berlin decree, in which the alleged increased danger lay, was known, and so soon after was acknowledged, to be an empty menace, though solemnly declared by Mr. Jefferson "to show great and increasing dangers to our vessels, seamen, and merchandise?"

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that it may be, as it has been said, that the British Orders in Council were a principal cause of the embargo; but, sir, well known facts and the public documents demonstrate the assertion to be unfounded. The President, as I have said, rested his recommendation of an embargo solely on the papers he communicated; and in the Senate, (of which I was then a member,) while the Embargo bill was before it, not one word was said of British Orders in Council. Further, Mr. Madison in his letter, dated December 23, 1807, (the day after the Embargo law was passed,) to Mr. Pinkney, (our Minister in London,) says: "I avail myself of the opportunity to enclose you a copy of a Message from the President to Congress, and their act in pursuance of it, laying an immediate embargo on our vessels and exports. The policy and the causes of the measure are explained in the Message itself." It is true, that about two months afterwards, when the British Orders in Council had become known, Mr. Madison made some change in his language. It was then convenient to do so. In his letter of February 19, 1808, to Mr. Pinkney, he says: "My last, which was committed to the British packet, enclosed a copy of the act of Embargo, and explained the policy of the measure;" artfully omitting "causes," and adding, "among the considerations which enforced it, was the probability of such decrees as were issued by the British Government on the 11th of November; the language of the British gazettes, with other indications, having left little doubt that such were meditated." But, sir, this was an afterthought, eagerly laid hold on by the advocates of the Administration to appease the growing discontents of the people, suffering under a total interdict of their commerce, without any known cause. To put this miserable pretence at rest, I will recur, in confirmation of the evidence I have already given, to the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations, made to the House of Representatives on the 22d of November, 1808, of which Mr. George W. Campbell (now Secretary of the Treasury) was the chairman. In that report the committee, endeavoring to repel the charge of acquiescence in the unlawful aggressions of either France or England, say: "The Milan decree of December, 1807, can still less rest for its defence on the supposed acquiescence of the United States in the British orders of the preceding month, since those orders, which have not certainly been acquiesced in, were not even known in America at the date of the decree." Now, the decree of Milan was issued in Italy by the French Emperor, on the 17th of December, 1807; and it was on the morning of the next day, in this city, that Mr. Jefferson recommended to Congress the laying of the embargo. It was grounded, as I have shown, solely on the papers communicated with this Message; three of which, and the only ones which presented even the semblance of danger, had recently arrived from France. I may mention another fact corroborating the evidence that the embargo was laid in concert with the French Government, or in conformity with its views. Letters were received in America, from merchants in Holland, stating that General Armstrong had said that a general embargo would take place in the United States immediately on the arrival of the Revenge. And the fact was, (as I have before stated,) that in four days after the despatches by the Revenge had reached Washington, the embargo was recommended. Still further, we know that the French Emperor "applauded the embargo,"* and that he issued his Bayonne decree April 17, 1808, directing all American vessels which should thereafter come into any of the ports of France to be seized; because no vessel of the United States could then navigate the seas without violating the Embargo law. And thus while he, so well pleased with the embargo, as it came in aid of, and rendered complete, his continental system, issued a decree to assist in carrying it into perfect execution, our Administration,* directing General Armstrong to "remonstrate against the injustice and illegality of the French decree" (that of Berlin, for the Milan decree had not then reached America) suggested, that the embargo would be continued until the Berlin decree should be repealed! This farce might amuse, but for the serious and extensive mischiefs which flowed from it.

But it has been said that, prior to the embargo, there were rumors and newspaper reports of orders contemplated by the British Government, like those issued in November, 1807. And did ever an intelligent legislator think of taking rumors and newspaper reports for the foundation of a law; especially of a law which shut up the ports and interdicted the commerce of the whole nation—a commerce the second only in the world for its extent? The pretence is as shameful as it is ridiculous.

One more remark: The embargo law was unlimited in the terms of its duration, and doubtless was intended, by its projector, to be commensurate in length of time with the French Emperor's continental system; that is, with the continuance of the European war; by the termination of which, had the people suffered the embargo to remain, we should have had neither seamen, ships, nor merchandise. And this, probably, was the wished for consummation; for, in Mr. Jefferson's Notes on Virginia, after a plausible flourish on commerce, and a navy for its protection, he says: "Perhaps, to remove as much as possible the occasions of making war, it might be better for us to abandon the ocean altogether, that being the element whereon we shall be principally exposed to jostle with other nations; to leave to others to bring what we shall want, and to carry what we can spare. This would make us invulnerable to Europe, by offering none of our property to their prize, and would turn all our citizens to the cultivation of the earth." "It might be time enough to seek employment for them at sea when the land no longer offers it."

I have gone back to the embargo, because, though it was not the first attempt to interrupt a friendly and useful intercourse with Great Britain; yet it was the first great measure levelled against her, and against our own commerce and prosperity. It was the first great link in that chain of ruinous measures with which we have been bound for the last six years, and the fruitful source of all the evils with which we have been afflicted; it produced non-intercourse, non-importation, and war. For the embargo having been imposed (as I have demonstrated) in concert with, or in subserviency to France, could not be abandoned without some substitute. And this was the non-intercourse law. The people being unwilling to submit any longer to the continental system, which, having for fourteen months shut up all our ports, was driving them to beggary and ruin. The ports, therefore, were opened, and our vessels permitted to depart, and carry with them our productions and merchandise to all countries, except those of France and Great Britain, and their dependencies. The effect of this absurd measure (originating partly in the pride of the Administration, who had relied so much on the efficacy of their restrictive energies) was seriously injurious to ourselves, by compelling our merchants to send their cargoes to other countries than those where they were chiefly to be consumed.

This absurd non-intercourse law, though perfectly acquiesced in by Great Britain, was used by the French Emperor (whom in construction and practice it was really intended to favor) as a pretence for the decree of Rambouillet, under which American property, to the amount of some millions of dollars, was seized in the ports of France and her dependencies, and confiscated; while all American property in English ports remained perfectly secure: for the non-intercourse law itself expired at the end of the succeeding session of Congress, which was the 28th of June, 1809; after which American vessels resorted freely to English ports, some to French ports, and many to the ports of the dependencies of France, which gave the opportunity to the French Emperor to make the extensive seizures I have mentioned. The like difference of conduct was exhibited on the ocean. By British armed ships our merchant vessels (not destined to French ports) were convoyed and guarded; while, by the French cruisers, they were burnt, or captured, and carried in and condemned.(7)

The non-intercourse law being about to expire, another law was introduced and enacted, giving power to the President to revive the most material sections of the non-intercourse law; one being that of non-importation, against either of the two great belligerents who should not revoke his decrees or orders when revoked by the other. And this power was exercised against England upon the pretended repeal of the French decrees; although, as soon as was practicable after their actual repeal, the British Government revoked their Orders in Council—those orders which were made a chief cause for declaring war; and the revocation of which, had the knowledge arrived in time, would, as the honorable Speaker has admitted, have prevented the declaration. But their revocation was expected by our Administration; and therefore it was, unquestionably, that the declaration of war was hastened—was precipitated—lest the news of the revocation should arrive and prevent it. The evidence that the revocation was so expected, appears in a letter from Mr. Russell to the Secretary of State, bearing date the 17th of September, 1812, purporting to recite a conversation between him and Lord Castlereagh, in which Mr. Russell says: "As to the 'supposed ignorance in America of the revocation of the Orders in Council, at the time my instructions were dated, I observed, that if this ignorance did in fact exist, yet, from certain expressions in those instructions, an expectation of such a measure seems to have been confidently entertained, and the Orders in Council appeared no longer to form an obstacle to a reconciliation.'" Now, the first instructions here referred to, are dated only eight days after the war was declared! And yet neither the want of troops, nor the want of money to support them, nor any other considerations, could prevail on the Government to postpone the declaration, even for a very short period, though strenuously urged, particularly by Mr. Bayard, in the Senate.

That this war was declared (as the unlimited embargo had been enacted) in concert and co-operation with France, a long train of proceedings, gradually preparing the public mind for that result, leave little room to doubt. The time, too, which was chosen for the declaration confirms the opinion of such concert and co-operation; for it coincided with the movements of the French army for the invasion of Russia: and this new war would naturally divert a part of the naval and military forces of Great Britain from a prosecution of the war against Bonaparte in Europe, to the protection of her own territories in America. But there is direct evidence that the Minister of the United States in Paris (Mr. Barlow) knew that war would take place between the United States and Great Britain, long before the news of it could have travelled from America to France.

Congress declared war against Great Britain on the 18th of June, 1812. In that Summer, Captain John White, of Salem, master of a ship then in one of the French ports, was in Paris, and there Mr. Barlow told him that this war would take place. The information is stated in a letter which I hold in my hand, from a gentleman of reputation, who took it from the mouths of his father and his father's partner in trade, (gentlemen whom I have known these forty years, and who are entitled to full credit,) who derived their information from Henry White, a brother of Captain John White. Those two merchants meeting Henry White, (they think a little after the war took place,) stopped to talk with him: "Among other questions they asked him, if he did not expect his brother from France soon? No, says Mr. White, and immediately of his own accord, mentioned his reason; which was, that they (the owners of the ship commanded by John White, of whom Henry White was one) had just received a letter from his brother John, informing them that he had been assured by Mr. Barlow, that there would be war between the United States and England immediately, and that this would probably detain him (Captain White) in France, till he could proceed with more safety than at that season of the year. He requested them in his letter to endeavor to get him ex'changed as soon as possible, in case he should be taken.'

I shall now, Mr. Chairman, consider the question of Impressments.

The gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) with his usual courtesy of language, said, that "to the shame of gentlemen in the Opposition, they tried to diminish the number of impressed seamen; that gentlemen most nearly concerned in the protection of seamen were opposed to the measures of Government intended for their relief, and felt less sympathy for our seafaring citizens than those who had no immediate connexion with them." These are very extraordinary charges, and the supposition is so unnatural, that those whose fathers, sons, and brothers are exposed to impressments, should feel less sympathy for them than was felt by gentlemen from the interior, and who never saw a sailor or ship till they came to this city, that the gentleman ought to have paused before he brought this accusation against us—he ought to have doubted its correctness. We do feel for our seafaring brethren as we ought, but have no purpose to answer by gross exaggerations of the numbers impressed; we wish to come at the truth of facts. That there should exist such superior and extreme sensibility for impressed seamen, among those who have no immediate connexion with them, is, in the nature of things, incredible; we are authorized to doubt the sincerity of such professions, and the gentleman (Mr. CALHOUN) who allows himself to call the members on this side of the House a "factious opposition," must excuse me if I say that I do not believe those professions to be sincere.

The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) said, that "if the facts and nature of the case were not disguised, there would be but 'one mind among the people.'" Here I am happy to agree with the gentleman. The subject has indeed been disguised, but not by us. I will strip it of its disguise, by which the people have been deceived, and endeavor to present it in the simple garb of truth.

British impressments of American seamen have constituted a subject of discussion between the two Governments for more than twenty years—yet no practical remedy, satisfactory to both, has yet been discovered. This proves that the question involves great intrinsic difficulties. But these proceed from the novelty of our condition—a part broken off from a nation speaking the same language—the division and separation of children of the same family, and not from the general nature of impressment, when one nation takes its own seamen from the merchant vessels of neutrals speaking different languages. The right of every maritime nation thus to take away its own subjects, must rest on the principle of allegiance, which all men owe to the country in which they were born. The practice of the two great maritime nations of Europe, England and France, I will now exhibit to the Committee from the pamphlet I hold in my hand, entitled "Perpetual War, the policy of Mr. Madison." This pamphlet was written by a gentleman whom I well know; a gentleman distinguished for his learning and abilities, for his knowledge of the common law and of the law of nations, and not less distinguished for his integrity and patriotism. Sir, I think myself honored when I call this gentleman my friend. On the diligence of research and accuracy of quotation by such a man we may confidently rely.

On the practice of Great Britain he says—"The first instruction I have met with, was one issued by the Earl of Northumberland, Lord High Admiral of England, to Sir John Pennington, dated April 4, 1640:—"

"As you meet with any men of war, merchants, or other ships or vessels, belonging to any foreign Prince or State, either at sea or in any road where you or any of His Majesty's fleet may happen to come, you are to send to see whether there be any of His Majesty's subjects on board; and if any seamen, gunners, pilots, or mariners (whether English, Scotch, or Irish) be found on board, you are to cause such of His Majesty's subjects to be taken forth, and so disposed of as they be forthcoming to answer their contempt of His Majesty's proclamation in that kind."

The writer here remarks, that "by the proclamation here spoken of, is intended the usual proclamation issued by all Sovereigns, in the present war—by France, Denmark, Spain, and England—ordering home all their seamen from the service of foreign States, neutral as well as belligerent." He continues—

"The above cited instruction was repeatedly carried into effect, and the particular cases are cited by writers on this subject. In a very famous case in the year 1687, four Scotchmen and a boy were taken out of a Dutch ship of war; and complaint having been made by the Dutch Government, it was referred to the Judge of Admiralty, Sir Richard Raines. The memorial complained that this practice might be inconvenient to foreign ships in stress of weather, and would hinder merchant ships in their voyages, &c. To which Sir Richard Raines replied, 'As if His Majesty must be deprived of the use of his own subjects for his own expeditions, that foreigners might use them for theirs.'"

The pamphlet goes on—

"We find that the same claims, the same objections, and the same rational and just answers, were made in the reign of James II., as at the present day. In the reign, however, of Charles II., great complaints having been made of the search of foreign ships of war, the instructions were modified so as only to include merchant vessels; and the instructions and practice have continued the same from that period to the present."

It appears that these instructions have been executed, both against the Dutch and French, and have been issued to every officer, in every war, for nearly two hundred years; and the writers who speak of the right in the reign of Charles II. call it an ancient and acknowledged right.

The practice of Impressment by France.—The writer of the pamphlet says—

"The authority I shall cite will be Mons. Le Beau, now superintendent in Paris of the details of the laws relative to the marine and the colonies. I have, however, in every case, taken, not the inferences of Mr. Le Beau, but the laws and ordinances themselves."

"By the laws of France, ever since the reign of Louis XIV., all French seamen are classed; and there are regular officers appointed to enrol and license them. Without such an enrolment no man can exercise even the boat or fishing navigation."

"By an edict of February, 1650, all masters of vessels, being French subjects, are forbidden, whether they are domiciliated in France or not, that is, whether they have acquired another domicile or home in a foreign country or not, to take commissions from, or use any other flag than that of France, under the penalty of being treated as pirates."

"By an edict of August, 1676, the pain of death, which had been before inflicted on all the subjects of France found in the service of foreign States or Princes, was changed for that of service in the galleys for life."

"By an edict of October, 1784, it is provided, that any classed seamen who shall, in time of peace, be found serving in any foreign ships, shall be sentenced to fifteen days confinement, and reduced to the lowest wages, and shall serve two years extraordinary at the lowest rate; but those who in time of war shall be arrested in foreign ships, or passing into foreign countries, shall be sentenced to three years service in the galleys."

The writer of the pamphlet, after showing that France, like England, maintains, in respect to her native subjects, the doctrine of perpetual allegiance, concludes with stating one out of many cases in which France has carried these principles into effect on the seas:

"In the year 1806 Admiral Willaumez, in a French ship called the Foudroyant, met with an American brig, and forcibly took out four French seamen, who had entered in this country. Not content with impressing them, he wrote as follows to General Turreau, Ambassador of France:

"My Lord—I have just apprehended four seamen, deserters from the Valeureuse frigate, whom I found on board an American brig, where they had engaged at seventeen dollars a month. Now, sir, if you can succeed in making the American Government pay down a compensation for thus seducing our seamen, you will punish it in a manner it feels most, its avarice, as those people have been for three years seducing our best men from us."

Having, Mr. Chairman, exhibited the evidences of the long established practice of impressment by the two great nations with whom our relations are the most interesting, and mentioned the general principle on which that practice is founded, I will consider its application to the United States in relation to Great Britain.

That the right of any Sovereign in Europe, to take his natural born subjects found on board neutral merchant vessels, should not there have been questioned, is to be accounted for from the simple fact, that the doctrine of allegiance, on which the right of such taking or impressing is founded, is not itself called in question. And the exercise of the right was not attended with any difficulty; because, the nations of Europe speaking different languages, it was easy to distinguish the subjects of each, and thus to avoid the mistakes and hardships of which we complain. The principle of allegiance, and the long usage of the European nations, have constituted the law on this subject; and by maintaining our connexion with that civilized portion of the world, and in forming a part of that society of nations, we must consent to be governed by its public law. The division and separation of one people, and so forming two nations speaking the same language, can make no change in the nature of things; and it as little comports with decency as with reason, that because we at present suffer some inconvenience from it, we should demand that this general law of nations should be abolished. As the British right of impressing their native subjects from neutral merchant vessels is incontrovertible, so is ours; and that Government has publicly declared, that we have the same right to take our native seamen from her merchant vessels that she claims and exercises in taking hers from our merchant vessels.

What then is to be done? A new case has occurred—an evil has arisen out of it—and a remedy is wanting; but, after more than twenty years of claims, discussions, and negotiations, a remedy has not yet been found; and because it is not found, our Government makes war on Great Britain to compel her to abandon an incontrovertible right, or to discontinue its exercise in a manner equivalent to such abandonment! There can be no remedy but that which shall result from negotiations fairly conducted, and with a sincere desire to provide a new rule adapted to this new case; and until that be discovered, Great Britain will neither abandon the right nor suspend the practice.

We may now, Mr. Chairman, I hope, with clearer views, examine the conduct of our Government on this difficult subject.

Mr. Madison has maintained the position, that although the law of nations allows a belligerent to enter and search neutral vessels for the persons and property of enemies, yet that it does not permit him to enter and search the same vessels for his own subjects and his own property.

I have already attempted, and I hope successfully, to show why no positive rule in this case has been found in writers on the law of nations; because the right being unquestioned, no positive explicit rule was necessary. In a case so clear, "reason, whose authority is of so much weight in the law of nations," was a sufficient guide.

But, after admitting the right of a belligerent to enter and search neutral vessels on the high seas, and to take away the persons and property of his enemies, would it not seem strange if he had no right to enter and search and take away what, without question, was his own? Why is he allowed to take his enemies and their property? Because he has a right, and it is his duty, to lessen their power and means of continuing the war. But of how much more value is a subject who will actively contribute to carry on the war, than the person of an enemy who must be supported at great expense, and require, as guards, the subjects who would otherwise be employed in the field or on shipboard in reducing the enemy's power? The ocean is nature's vast common, where all nations have the right to enter; where all have equal jurisdiction; and where each has the right to search for and take his own, whether persons or property. This, to unadulterated reason, seems so plain, that to deny it must shock the common sense of mankind.

It is also said, that a belligerent who enters on board a neutral merchant vessel to search for and take his own subjects and their property, violates the sovereignty of the neutral nation; and that to submit to it, would be to surrender its independence. If there can be any violation of sovereignty and independence in this case, it must be by the entry and search, and not by doing that for which alone the entry and search take place. But as the entry and search in one case is not imagined to violate the sovereignty and independence of the neutral, neither can it in the other.

With regard to the number of native American seamen on board British armed ships, since the war, I think it probable that as many native British seamen have served on board our own. I have received information entitled to credit, that about half the crew of the Constitution, when she took the British frigate Java, were of foreign origin, British, Danes, Swedes, &c., and that half, or rather more than half of the foreigners were English, Scotch, and Irish. Although British seamen, in order to get protections and employment in American vessels, do not hesitate to declare themselves to be Americans, yet the natural frankness of a sailor, and many circumstances difficult to be long concealed, discover, in the course of a voyage, to what country he belongs. There is nothing very extraordinary in British seamen serving in our ships. I well remember in our Revolutionary war, having understood that many British seamen entered on board our private armed vessels, and that an experienced British sailor for the important station of boat-swain was then deemed a great acquisition.

Mr. Madison, in his letter of January 5, 1804, to Mr. Monroe, (then our Minister in London,) supposes, very preposterously, that of the seamen impressed from American vessels, very few were British subjects; because of the applications made to the Ministers and agents of the United States, in London, to obtain their release, only about one-twentieth were detained as real British subjects. But in cases that were clear, as the greatest part must have been, as to real British subjects impressed, no such applications would be made. British naval officers, well acquainted as they must be with the manner of speaking peculiar to the Scotch and Irish, and to Englishmen in many parts of England, where their speech has peculiarities almost as distinct as those of the Scotch and Irish, would seldom fail to distinguish all these from native Americans. The "twentieth part," therefore, mentioned by Mr. Madison detained as British subjects, (being, by his statement, 102 out of 2,059 who had been impressed from 1793, when the war between England and France commenced, to September, 1801,) must have consisted of those few who had the confidence to declare themselves to be Americans, and hoped to escape detection. Of that whole number, he says 1,142 had been discharged, or ordered to be so, as not being British subjects. Discharges of some others had been previously obtained on the applications of our Ministers, Mr. Pinkney and Mr. King.

I will now, Mr. Chairman, present to the Committee a train of facts which must convince every candid mind, that the accounts of the numbers of impressed native American seamen have been vastly exaggerated; and that instead of six thousand and upwards, according to the official statements, probably not as many hundreds were then held under impressments.

Mr. Chairman, before I exhibit the evidence in my possession, it is proper for me to inform the Committee, that an attempt was made in Massachusetts to ascertain, by official investigations, the number of seamen belonging to that State who had been or were then impressed by Great Britain, France, or any foreign Power, by requiring the selectmen and assessors of the several towns, districts, and plantations, to examine and make returns thereof, to be laid before the Legislature. For this purpose a resolve was passed in the House of Representatives, but was rejected by the Senate of that State. The members of the latter body had been elected in the Gerrymander districts into which the State had been formed, unconstitutionally, and in open outrage of all the regular institutions and arrangements of the State from its foundation, and of that order and decorum which had distinguished the country from the early settlement of the province. Every gentleman, it is presumed, now understands the meaning of the word Gerrymander, first applied in Massachusetts to a district monstrously distorted, for the purpose of carrying elections suited to the views of the then temporarily dominant party. Mr. Gerry (now the Vice President of the United States) being then the Governor, and approving of the act, the monster was called after him, the Gerrymander. Other districts were similarly distorted, and the expected effect ensued. Of forty Senators to be chosen in a State decidedly Federal, twenty-nine were Democrats. It was this Democratic majority, in their political year 1812-'13, which negatived the resolve I have mentioned, in order to prevent the discovery of the truth relative to impressments—the purposes of the party being better promoted by shutting the light from the eyes of the people, and talking of thousands of impressed seamen, when the probability was that the number was comparatively small.

Although disappointed in their fair attempt to ascertain, by official returns, the precise number of seamen in the whole State who had been impressed, whether natives or foreigners, and of the latter, to what nations they belonged; the measure adopted by the committee of the House of Representatives enabled them to exhibit a body of facts from which a tolerably correct opinion might be formed of the whole number of impressed seamen, not of the seaports only, but of all the towns (which there mean townships) and places in the State. Their report to the House I hold in my hand. Annexed to it are fifty depositions relative to impressments, by merchants, masters of vessels, and others, without distinction of political parties. It would be improper to repeat here such a mass of evidence; but if any gentleman desire to examine it, the pamphlet is at his service. I can read only some parts of it.

Mr. William Gray, formerly of Salem, now of Boston, so well known for his wealth and the great extent of his shipping and commerce, deposes and says—

"I have been engaged in commerce and navigation forty or fifty years, and have for the last fifteen or twenty years employed about three hundred seamen annually upon an average.

"I recollect the following cases of impressments and detentions of seamen. In the year 1811, while one of my vessels, the Rachel, was at Leith, in Scotland, two of my men, viz: Samuel Tuck, and I think Israel Foster, were impressed from the vessel; one of them I understood escaped from the man-of-war, and reached my vessel before she left Leith; the other I understood effected his escape with the aid of a waterman at Liverpool. I cannot recollect any other cases of impressments by the British from my vessels; but, from the multiplicity of my business, it is almost impossible for me to remember the individual cases; I have no doubt the aforesaid Tuck had a protection.

"I recollect no cases of impressments and detentions by the French, except the three Swedes taken soon after the affair of the Chesapeake, and which are stated in my letter to Colonel Pickering, in the year 1808.

"I have had whole crews taken in my vessels when they have been captured both by the English and French; but I do not mean to say that the men in those cases were impressed or detained by those nations."

[The whole deposition was read together with several others, but they would occupy too much room to be printed here. Mr. Gray mentions four other cases, within his knowledge, of impressments of men belonging to Salem. One was released on his application; he did know what became of the other three. Four fishermen were impressed off Halifax; they belonged to Salem, were sent for, and immediately released. He mentions a letter from the supercargo of a ship belonging to Philadelphia, on which he was an underwriter, stating that her whole crew had been impressed; but Mr. Gray adds, that the captain in his protest made no mention of the impressment of the crew. He thinks he recollects three or four more cases of men impressed, generally from Salem. The other cases mentioned by Mr. Gray, are omitted as not material here, and because these with all others in the depositions are comprehended in the summary reported to the House of Representatives of Massachusetts.]

It will be proper, Mr. Chairman, that I inform the Committee of the occasion on which Mr. Gray wrote me the letter mentioned in his deposition. Mr. Jefferson, in his Message of December 18, 1807, having pretended that one reason for recommending an embargo was to save our seamen from impressments, I wrote to my friend,

Mr. Goodhue, (formerly a Senator in Congress from Massachusetts,) for information concerning impressments. He put the letter into the hands of Mr. Gray, who, on the 8th of January, (seventeen days only after the embargo law had passed,) sent me the following answer, which is subjoined to his deposition:

"SALEM, January 8, 1808.

"SIR: Our mutual friend, Mr. Goodhue, has shown me a letter, in which I think you ask what is the extent of the complaint against the British for impressments of our seamen. I have taken the liberty to give you my opinion, that since the Chesapeake affair we have had no cause of complaint. I cannot find one single instance where they have taken one man out of a merchant vessel. I have had more than twenty vessels arrive in the time, without one instance of a man's being taken by them, except three Swedes that were taken out by a French frigate. I have made inquiry of the commanders of all the vessels that have arrived in this vicinity, and cannot find any complaints against the British cruisers. I think the British engaging that our national ships shall not be searched, ought to satisfy us on that head. I presume the only cause of the embargo was the threat of Bonaparte, that he would put his decree of November 21st in force. This I think was not sufficient to justify so strong a measure. May we expect the embargo will be off soon—or must we wait to hear from France? When you have a moment's leisure, will you write what is the prospect of the times as particular as you can consistently? You know my whole estate is in navigation and foreign commerce; and it is a very eventful moment with such property. I cannot think it possible that we shall be mad enough to go to war with either of the two great nations.

"I am, respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

"WILLIAM GRAY.

"HON. TIMOTHY PICKERING, United States Senator, Washington."

Mr. Gray, as is now generally known, has since gone over to the ranks of Democracy—has loaned money to the Government to carry on this "mad" war for sailors' rights, which he knew were in so small a degree affected; and after saying, that if the British would engage not to search our national ships (as they had done in the case of the Chesapeake) we ought to be satisfied!

Colonel Israel Thorndike, of Boston, deposed that for the last ten or twelve years (excepting the time of the embargo) he had usually employed more than two hundred seamen annually on an average; and that he had not more than six or seven men, to his recollection, impressed during that period. He enumerates them: six were foreigners, and one an African, who, in a state of intoxication, at Liverpool, entered into the British service. He mentioned one more who had been impressed twenty years ago in some port in England. One of the officers of Col. Thorndike's vessel requested him to declare himself an American; but he said he would not deny his country, and surrendered himself. In a few years afterwards he returned to his family in Massachusetts.

Commodore Bainbridge stated, that, during all the time he was in the merchants' service, he had but one man impressed.

Captain Hull, of the Navy, deposed, that, during the five or six years he was in the merchants' service, he never had any of his men impressed from his ships, either by the British or French.

Captain William Story, of Marblehead, deposed, that he had been master of a vessel for ten years, from 1797 to 1807. He does not say that he ever had a man impressed. But in 1794, being in the East Indies, at a British port, mate of a ship, he says ten men were taken from her; of whom four had Consular protections, and he was satisfied they were Americans. "The other six I expect were Englishmen," are his own words. He had heard of ten native seamen impressed, and from whom letters had been received by their friends; and he mentions the names of six more natives whom their friends suppose to have been impressed. Captain Story (a warm partisan of the war for sailors' rights) adds one more to his list—a native who had been taken by the British on board one of our privateers! It was said he was a Portuguese; but Captain Story says, "documents were sent down for his release, and he has returned home."

It will be proper to examine the facts in the cases mentioned by Captain Story. Of the ten cases he had heard of, it appears by the depositions of Messrs. Nathaniel Hooper and B. T. Reed, merchants of Marblehead, that three were taken on board of French vessels, two of them privateers, and had their choice to be prisoners of war, or to enter on board the British ships; they chose to enter. Two found on board British ships, and supposed to have been impressed. One had for misconduct been left on shore in Europe by his American master, and had since written that he was under impressment. Three had been released, and had returned home. One had returned home, as Captain Story states.

One of the six in Captain Story's deposition, supposed to have been impressed, had also been released. It is probable that the remaining five of these supposed impressments might be satisfactorily accounted for could the investigation be made.

Captain Andrew Harraden, of Salem, deposed, that he had been master of a vessel about twenty years, and never had a man impressed by the British. One was impressed by the French; but he was returned next morning.

Captain Josiah Orne, of Salem, deposed, that he had been master of a vessel about twenty years, and never had any man impressed by the British, except in one instance, by a frigate from which one of the men impressed had deserted but three months before; the other was "a green Irishman who had a broad brogue." Both, however, had protections as American citizens, which they had procured at New York.

Captain Moses Townsend, of Salem, (also of the war party,) deposed, that he had been engaged in commerce about thirty years, and was master of a ship about twenty years. He never had any men impressed, except once when at Bristol, in England. They were taken in the evening, and upon his application released the next day. He knew one native impressed, who remained in the British service till his death; and one other who said he had been under impressment some years, but had been released. He then mentions seven others who, he understood from common report, had been impressed; but all of whom (one excepted) had, he believed, been released, and returned home.

This cursory view of impressments, Mr. Chairman, as exhibited in the few depositions I have noticed, (and the rest are like them,) must satisfy every mind, open to conviction, that the actual impressments of our native citizens must have been very few; and of these, that nearly all had been released. The summary, therefore, reported to the Massachusetts House of Representatives last year, by their committee, presents just such a result of the evidence afforded by the depositions as might have been expected. The report states, that it appeared from the deposition of the merchants who were examined, and who had been engaged in commerce and navigation for ten, fifteen, and twenty years past, that the whole number of seamen they had employed, upon an average of the last twelve or fifteen years, (deducting the period of the embargo,) amounted to about 1,560 annually; that of this number, for that whole period, the committee had found the following cases of British impressments, to wit:

Mr. Chairman, as much complaint has formerly been made that some British navy officers paid but little or no regard to sailors' protections, and consular certificates of citizenship, a few facts will show to how little respect a great portion of them were entitled. Mr. Josiah Waters, who had been fourteen years a clerk in the custom-house at Boston, while General Lincoln was the collector, (and in whose time it appears that great care was taken to detect and reject forgeries and false witnesses relative to seamen,) deposed, "that in many cases the seamen used to bring as witnesses to prove their citizenship, the masters of boarding houses; and in some instances, the same masters of boarding houses were brought so often as to excite suspicions of their veracity, and their oaths were not afterwards admitted." Mr. Waters adds: "I have destroyed hundreds of false protections."

Mr. William Parsons, merchant, of Boston, deposed, that in the year 1806, his ship Meridian received her crew at Norfolk, in Virginia, whence she sailed to Rotterdam; in coming out of which port, one man was impressed by a British sloop of war, as a British seaman. The British officer said, that if the man himself would say that he was an American, he would give him up; but the man would not do it, though he said he had a wife in America. When Mr. Parsons paid off this crew they informed him that they had bought their protections at Norfolk for two dollars a piece. And there was but one of the crew (a Connecticut man) whose real name was the same as that in his protection. This appeared on the inquiry of Mr. Parsons for their true names when he paid them, and they gave receipts for their wages. "Many of them had forgotten the names they went by in their protections."

The facility with which British seamen may be obtained to man American merchantmen, even in British ports, is exemplified in the following instance. Some years ago, in this city, (as some of my fellow boarders, still members of this House, will recollect,) Captain Ham, of Portsmouth, in New Hampshire, informed us, that being at Bristol, in England, he wanted a crew for his ship. Upon inquiry, he was told, that for a guinea or two a head, the master of the press-gang would procure hands for him. It was done; and the landlord of a sailors' boarding house furnished American protections. The landlord took out some bundles of protections, and selected such as most nearly answered to their respective descriptions. It seemed that protections came to the hands of such landlords either as pledges, or as the actual payment for the board of sailors.

A few years ago, when Dr. Mitchell, of New York, was a Senator in Congress, I remember his stating, in his place, that one-third or two-fifths of the seamen of that city were British subjects, and other foreigners; and mentioned with what facility, and for how few cents, American protections were obtained for them.

I have been told by a nephew of mine who resided in Charleston, South Carolina, seven years, from 1786 to 1793, that he was then informed, that only two seafaring men of that port were natives of that State; one of them a master of a vessel, the other, I think, the son of an English family which had settled there. The Summer before last, a gentleman of that city, (who is known to the honorable Speaker to be a person of reputation,) travelling in Massachusetts, was pleased to call to see me, though personally a stranger. In the course of conversation, I repeated the above information, that at the time mentioned there belonged to the port of Charleston only two seamen natives of South Carolina. "There are more now," said the gentleman. "How many do you think?" I asked. He answered "fifty." Now, Mr. Chairman, if my memory serves me, by the official return of the tonnage of vessels belonging to Charleston, about the year 1809, the amount was not much short of forty thousand tons, besides about eight thousand tons in coasting craft. And reckoning six men to a hundred tons for the first, say thirty-eight thousand tons, more than two thousand seamen would be requisite to man the vessels of Charleston engaged in foreign trade. These were, consequently, composed of citizens from the Northern States and foreigners, and of the foreigners a very large proportion must have been British subjects.

I wish, Mr. Chairman, to present one more view of this subject of impressments; the result of an examination of the public documents, about a year ago, by one of my colleagues. By those documents, the grand total is the well-known number - - - - 6,257

But doubtless some of those noted as without documents, or with insufficient documents, were Americans, and might swell the sum total of impressments to a few hundreds of native Americans, instead of six thousand.

One fact more, Mr. Chairman, on this subject, indicating how small is the number of native Americans that are impressed. By official returns made last year to the Legislature of Rhode Island, the whole number of citizens of that State under impressment amounted to nineteen, with which the gentlemen present from that State are acquainted.

But, Mr. Chairman, attempts have been made to justify this war for "sailors' rights," by the doings of the Federal Administration, under the Presidents Washington and Adams; and passages in my own official letters on the subject have been read, and with a tone and emphasis which it was thought, perhaps, would strike me dumb. Of those letters, written from thirteen to seventeen years ago, when Secretary of State, I had no particular remembrance. The Administration have now hunted them up with great diligence, and for my own part, I feel no regret. Always accustomed to think freely, and to speak and write what I think, I have never any dread of exposure. Thinking too humbly of myself to imagine that I can avoid errors in opinion, I am, when convinced, not too proud to acknowledge them. But, sir, on reading the passages referred to, I do not find this apology to be necessary. I must be allowed to repeat them, with some additions and remarks.

On the 8th of June, 1796, I thus wrote to Mr. King, our Minister in London: "Among the articles left unadjusted [when Mr. Jay concluded 'his treaty] one of the most interesting regards 'the impressing of American seamen." "The 'long but fruitless attempts which have been 'made to protect them from British impresses. 'prove that the subject is in its nature difficult." "The simplest rule, as remarked to Mr. Pinkney, 'would be, that the vessel being American, 'should be evidence that the seamen on board 'her are such." This "simplest rule" is but the repetition of Mr. Jefferson's words in his letter of July 11, 1792, to Mr. Thomas Pinckney, then our Minister in London. I then add: "But it 'will be an important point gained, if on the 'high seas our flag can protect those, of what- 'ever nation, who shall sail under it. And for 'this, humanity, as well as interest, powerfully 'plead. Merchant vessels carry no more hands 'than their safety renders necessary. To with- 'draw them on the ocean, is to expose both lives 'and property to destruction. We have a right, 'then, to expect that the British Government 'will make no difficulty in acceding to this very 'interesting provision." In my zeal, Mr. Chairman, to protect American citizens and their property, on the high seas, it did not then occur to me that it was always in the power of American merchants to provide for the safety of both by excluding British subjects altogether from their vessels. Had this been done voluntarily, or by the compulsion of laws enacted for that purpose by ourselves, we should no longer have heard of the impressment of American seamen. But the merchants would have been extremely unwilling to have been put under this constraint. By the destruction of the mercantile marine of France, Spain, and Holland, the demand for American and other neutral vessels to carry on the commerce of those three nations, was so rapidly increased, that without British seamen, one-fourth of our merchant vessels must probably have remained unmanned. At the most prosperous period of our commerce, we had probably fifteen thousand British seamen in our merchants' service. In saying that our own merchants could provide for the safety of their vessels on the high seas, by excluding British seamen, I mean, that from their more intimate knowledge of our own country, they would seldom fail to discover, on putting a few questions to a sailor, whether he was or was not born in the United States. The British officers who impress seamen, for want of that local knowledge, must often be deceived; hence, in part, the multitude of English seamen remaining in our merchants' service, in the days of our prosperity, notwithstanding their exposure to impressment.

In the same letter I mention three classes of seamen who ought to be secure from impressment; those born in our country; those, wherever born, who were citizens at the definitive Treaty of Peace; and foreigners, whose language would at once prove that they were not British subjects. The fourth class consisted of British born subjects who had become citizens and inhabitants subsequent to the Treaty of

H. OF R.

The Loan Bill.

FEBRUARY, 1814.

Peace. Of this class, I say—"it may be attempted to protect them as well in time of war as of peace."

In reference to the difficulties thrown in the way of our agent employed in the West Indies to procure the discharge of American seamen, I say, in my letter of September 10, 1796, to Mr. King: "If the British Government have any regard to our rights, and respect for our nation, and place any value on our friendship, they will even facilitate to us the means of relieving our oppressed citizens."⁽⁸⁾

In my letter to Mr. King, of October 26, 1796, having mentioned the British impressment of a Dane and a Portuguese, I remark—"This surely is an abuse easy to correct. They cannot pretend an inability to distinguish these foreigners from their own subjects; and they may with as much reason rob American vessels of the property or merchandise of Swedes, Danes, and Portuguese, as seize and detain in their service the subjects of those nations found on board American vessels."

In a letter to President Adams, dated February 20, 1800, I mention the project of Mr. Liston (the British Minister here) of a treaty, having for its object the preservation of American seamen from impressment, while it should secure to Great Britain the services of her own seamen; which project I disapproved, and deemed "utterly inadmissible, unless it would put an end to impressments, which Mr. Liston seemed to imagine; while the seventh paragraph expressly recognised the right of impressing British subjects, and consequently American citizens, as at present." The last idea is inaccurately expressed; its meaning is, that in exercising the right of impressing British subjects, some American citizens would be impressed, for the reason often mentioned—the impossibility, sometimes, of distinguishing one from the other.

These, Mr. Chairman, are the most material passages in my letter; which, from the manner of exhibiting them, some gentlemen seemed to imagine would confound me. But, with a single exception, I see nothing to change. Where abuses exist, I have censured, and shall always censure, those who commit them, of whatever nation they may be. The exception I refer to respects only the intimation of a doubt of the right of the British to impress their own subjects found on board neutral merchant vessels on the high seas. I did not then know the antiquity of the British practice, nor the corresponding practice of France; nor had ever attempted to trace that practice up to its principle. My enlightened friend, who wrote the pamphlet I have before mentioned, I believe was the first to perform this task; and he performed it in a manner which, I should have presumed, would have satisfied every candid mind.

The letters of Chief Justice Marshall, written when he was Secretary of State, have also been seized upon by gentlemen to aid them in their attempts to justify a war, which is professed to be continued solely on account of British impressments. In his letter of September 20, 1800, to Mr. King, he says: "The impressment of our seamen is an injury of very serious magnitude, which deeply affects the feelings and honor of the nation." "No right has been asserted to impress the natives of America; yet they are impressed; they are dragged on board British ships of war, with the evidence of citizenship in their hands, and forced by violence there to serve, until conclusive testimonials of their birth can be obtained." Yes, conclusive testimonials; for the evidence arising from the common "protections," although it was not then well known that false and fraudulent protections abounded, must now appear of the feeblest kind.

"The right to impress those who were British subjects [from American merchant vessels] has been asserted, and the right to impress those of every other nation has not been disclaimed. Neither the one practice nor the other can be justified." No one more highly respects Chief Justice Marshall than I do; but this opinion (that the right claimed and exercised by Great Britain to impress her own subjects from neutral merchant vessels was not justifiable) was not pronounced after an investigation and discussion of the subject before him as a judge. The truth is, I believe, the question had never in this country been examined on its principles, until, as I have already said, it was done by my friend before referred to.

"The United States require positively, that their seamen who are not British subjects, whether born in America or elsewhere, shall be exempt from impressments." Here the Chief Justice strongly expresses the same sentiment that I had done, that foreigners, not British subjects, should be exempt from impressment, because their different language precluded the possibility of mistake.

"The case of British subjects, whether naturalized or not, is more questionable." This observation of the Chief Justice is a departure from the positive opinion before expressed; and would confirm the justness of my remark, that the question had not then been examined on its principles; yet, he adds, "but the right even of doing this is denied."⁽⁹⁾

But I presume, sir, that the letter of the Chief Justice has been introduced, because when pressed with applications, in the Department of State, for his aid to procure the release of our seamen impressed, some of them with circumstances of abuse from the intemperance of individual naval officers, he had said that "the continuance of the practice of impressments must inevitably produce discord between two nations which ought to be the friends of each other;" and afterwards asks, "Is it not more advisable to desist from, and to take effectual measures to prevent an acknowledged wrong, [the taking of American citizens, who were not British subjects, from our merchant vessels] than by perseverance in that wrong, to excite against themselves the well-founded resentments of America, and force our Government into measures which may

'very possibly terminate in an open rupture.'" As though the state of impressments at any past time would in his opinion have rendered a war expedient; and as though the actual state of impressments, at the time when the war was declared, and when the evil was manifestly and most materially diminished, could furnish an adequate cause of war; and as if the Chief Justice could possibly approve of its principle, its policy, or the manner in which it has been conducted! If any thus imagine, let them now ask his opinion.

For the purpose of exciting keener resentments among the people against Great Britain, her ships of war have been called by the most opprobrious names—dungeons and floating hells, and the condition of our impressed seamen on board of them a state of slavery. Yet, sir, there is not an American naval officer who would not feel it a reproach, if told that the discipline on board his ship was less exact or inferior to that of British ships? It is that exact discipline which enables both to exert their utmost force. That our seamen entertain no such frightful ideas of British ships of war is certain, because considerable numbers voluntarily entered, and some have declined being discharged. But the same parcel of documents which I am now examining furnish proof in point. It is in a letter from Mr. Pinckney, dated in London, the 13th of March, 1793, to Mr. Jefferson, Secretary of State. He says: "Our trade continues subject to great inconveniences, both from our seamen being impressed, from the plea of their being British subjects, and from their entering voluntarily on board of the King's ships, tempted by the present high bounties."

One word more, Mr. Chairman, and I quit this subject. It is said we must continue the war, and take Canada, to induce or compel Great Britain to give up her right, or to abandon the practice of impressing her own subjects from our merchant vessels. It seems scarcely credible that any person of information should believe in this doctrine. I will here oppose to it only the opinion of a gentleman of high standing, and distinguished for his discernment, knowledge, and abilities as a statesman: I mean Mr. Bayard, whom the President selected for one of the Commissioners to negotiate with those of Great Britain on this very subject, in order, as professed, to bring about a peace. This was expressed in a speech delivered in the Senate, on the 16th day of June, 1812, only two days before the fatal declaration of war, on his motion to postpone it to the 31st of October. Had his motion and advice prevailed, we should now have been at peace, and enjoying, if our Government had pleased, a prosperous commerce. Mr. Bayard said:

"The question as to the impressment of our seaman did not present insuperable difficulties. Britain never contended for a right to impress American seamen. The right she claims is to take her own subjects found in our merchant service. She exercises the right in relation to her own private vessels. This right she never will nor can give up. If our merchant flag was a sure protection to British seamen who sailed under it, the British navy must be unmanned by desertion; while our merchants can and do pay a dollar for every shilling a sailor can earn in the naval service of his country."

Another subject of complaint, Mr. Chairman, against Great Britain, is her restricting the commerce of neutral nations, by what has been called the rule of 1756. This rule has been formerly represented by the Administration as peculiar to Great Britain. But the fact is otherwise. The French Government adopted similar regulations long before. The principle of those regulations was the same as that on which the rule and the practice of Great Britain rested. Louis XIV, in his ordinance of 1704, (which was reordained, substantially, by Louis XV, in 1744,) seems to anticipate the satisfaction of the subjects of neutral States, when they should experience the care he had taken "to preserve for them the same extent and the same liberty of commerce which they have been accustomed to enjoy during peace." This is precisely the general rule of Great Britain. And the reason of it is this: That, to carry on, in time of war, a new and extraordinary commerce for one belligerent would be a departure from the duties of an impartial neutrality, and becoming, in effect, an auxiliary Power. This would have been extremely convenient to France, when her own merchant vessels had been either captured, or driven from the ocean by the British navy. But for this British rule of 1756, (the same with the French rule of 1704 and 1744,) the commerce of France would have been placed in as good a situation, or better, than if carried on in her own vessels; because, on the supposition that neutrals, carrying it on for her, were under the protection of the law of nations, it would be perfectly secure from capture; the neutrals only becoming really, or apparently, the owners of the merchandises constituting the articles of that commerce. To this no counter-belligerent, possessing an efficient naval force to prevent or interrupt it, would ever submit. By the laying up of her merchant vessels, the seamen of France employed in them, were at liberty to man her ships of war and privateers; and so far as neutral seamen manning neutral vessels were employed in a trade not allowed by France in time of peace, so far the neutrals became auxiliaries in the war.(10)

By an improper extension of the rule of 1756, in the years 1793 and 1794, British cruisers captured great numbers of American merchant vessels. For these, indemnities were demanded; and, by Mr. Jay's treaty, provision was made for adjusting them. The result was that Great Britain paid to the merchants of the United States about six millions of dollars, for their losses by those captures.

On the other hand, French cruisers were employed in committing depredations on our commerce from an early period of her Revolutionary war until the year 1800; not under any rule, but in direct violation of the law of nations, and of the treaty then existing between the United States and France. These spoiliations amounted, by the best estimates, to twenty millions of dollars, for which no indemnity whatever could be obtained; and the claim for which was finally abandoned.

In the early part of the French revolutionary war, Spain was the ally of Great Britain; and for spoiliations committed by Spanish cruisers during that time, Spain paid indemnities to our merchants in like manner as Great Britain had done. But for those committed by Spanish cruisers, after she became the ally of France, no indemnity has been obtained. This, however, is not to be imputed to a want of good faith in Spain. She was willing, and by a treaty negotiated in 1801 or 1802, she stipulated to give a just indemnity for the illegal captures made by her own cruisers, but refused to pay for those made by French cruisers, carried into Spanish ports, and there condemned by French Consuls. This treaty was concluded by Mr. Charles Pinckney, the Minister to the Court of Spain, appointed by Mr. Jefferson, but was not ratified because the French captures of American vessels condemned by French Consuls in Spanish ports were not comprehended, and thus nothing has been obtained. Another negotiation was set on foot, in which Mr. Monroe was joined with Mr. Pinckney. To settle the boundaries of Louisiana, as well as the question of spoiliations, was an object in this new negotiation, but nothing was effected. The Spanish Government persisted in refusing to pay for American property condemned in her ports by French Consuls. The fact was, it was not in her power to prevent it against the will of France: and the French Government contended, also, that those spoiliations of American property captured by French cruisers, carried into Spanish ports, and there condemned by French Consuls, were comprehended, with the other French spoiliations, in the treaty of September 30, 1800, between France and the United States; and therefore cancelled, by mutual agreement, according to the terms of that treaty.

The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) advertising to the present state of the world, with France driven back and likely to be compressed within limits compatible with the general safety, imagined that the united Powers of Europe would now turn against Great Britain, and confine her within proper limits on the ocean, while he seemed to admit that she had been fighting for her existence. The gentleman spoke with an air of triumph, that the United States had had the courage to resist her on her own element, and said, that if we had made no resistance to England, we should have lost all our commerce. Well, we did resist; and where now is our commerce? Annihilated. But the gentleman consoled himself with the consideration, that if we had not done much against England, she had not done much against us. And is it, indeed, a small matter; is not much done against us when our ports are blockaded and our whole commerce destroyed? The gentleman, however, seemed to admit that we could not now succeed, with our population of eight millions; but may hereafter, when we shall have increased to twenty or thirty millions. And would it not have been wise to have postponed our resistance until the period arrived when resistance might be made with some prospect of success?

That Great Britain should not have accomplished much against us, in the way of fighting, is not strange, seeing she was taken by surprise. For notwithstanding the talks in Congress, and the rumors abroad, about a war with Great Britain, few believed it. When we were without troops, without many of the munitions of war, and without money, the common sense of mankind revolted at the idea of its being voluntarily declared. Great Britain, therefore, had taken few if any precautions even for the defence of Canada. And when war had been declared, seeing the Orders in Council were its principal cause—when these were removed, it was natural to suppose that the war might cease or be suspended. Admiral Warren, therefore, may be considered as having been sent to negotiate rather than to fight. And the efforts on our seaboard have in fact been extremely feeble. Should the war, however, be continued, we may expect it will be conducted in a very different manner. The colossal power of France having been reduced, the allies may find her full employment, and allow Great Britain to point a portion of her attention to her American provinces, and the war on our coast.

When France was, in the view of many, and in the fears of most reflecting men, all-powerful by land; when it was doubted whether Russia could defend her own Empire, then indeed gloomy apprehensions were entertained for the fate of the civilized world. Had Russia been subdued, the French Emperor, with the whole European continent in his hands, and commanding all its means of building and manning a navy more powerful than that of Great Britain, she must have sunk under the pressure. But if any one Power must have the ascendancy on the ocean, it is desirable that Great Britain should be that Power. Circumscribed by the seas which encompass her islands, her population is necessarily so limited, as never to furnish armies capable, by themselves, of making any permanent impressions on the Continent. The trident of the ocean may therefore be safely left in her hands.

On the subject of the Loan, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) asked, what would be the consequences if the bill on your table should fail? And he answered, that the operations against Canada would fail; public credit would fail, at home and abroad, and the Army, the Navy, and every department of the Government would suffer.

With respect to Canada, it is desirable that its conquest should not be attempted. No good could result from the conquest if effected, and the attempt would cost many thousand lives, and many millions of money. If conquered, it must be restored before Great Britain will make peace.

As to public credit, I distinguish between that of the United States, and the credit of the Administration. The latter may fail, and the former be secure. A transfer of the administration of the Government to other hands would restore the public credit, already deeply impaired, because the only solid foundations for its support would then be relaid.

As to the Army and Navy, if one be disbanded and the other laid up, I see no harm that can result. The soldiers can travel home, if, like many of their comrades already discharged, they are dismissed without pay, and compelled, as I have understood these have been, to depend on the kindness of their fellow-citizens by the way. And the seamen will only be returned to the condition of their brethren at home, deprived, by the conduct of our Government, of their usual occupations.

As to the part our "declared" enemies will act, if for want of money we should have no army, I entertain no uneasy apprehensions. They are unwilling enemies; and, unquestionably, if we do not invade their territory, they will leave ours unmolested. And when we shall stand merely on the defensive, the militia will suffice.

But the gentleman seemed to think, that even if the war were unjust, the majority ought to be supported in obtaining a loan rather than hazard the consequences just enumerated. But, sir, there would be one good consequence that would outweigh all the recited evils. If we cannot carry on the war, we must have peace; and this will give employment to the sailor and soldier, and to every class of citizens, and open the way to a revival of our former prosperity.

The gentleman claimed the support of the minority to obtain the loan, because the minority, or some of the minority, voted for the objects of expense which render the loan necessary. With this, sir, I have no concern. I was not then in Congress. Nevertheless, I did not at that time withhold my opinion. It was communicated by letters to some of my friends in the minority; and there are gentlemen present who know it. I was opposed to the voting for a single soldier, or for the timber-head of a ship, because I would not put weapons into the hands of men, who, I was morally certain, would use them only to produce public mischief. I asked them if they voted for an army and a navy, how they would withhold their vote for money to support them?

Different gentlemen have adverted to the terms proposed by our Administration for an Armistice. The honorable Speaker (Mr. CHEVES) thinks they were reasonable and proper; that the refusal by Great Britain to accept them was a sufficient cause for continuing the war; and that to have treated, without orders being previously given, to discontinue the impressment of seamen and to restore those already impressed, would have been an abandonment of our rights.

Let us, Mr. Chairman, examine the terms, as they are stated in a letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Russell, dated the 26th of June, 1812, eight days only after the President and Congress had declared war. "If (says Mr. Monroe) the Orders in Council are repealed, and no

'illegal blockades are substituted to them, and 'orders are given to discontinue the impressment 'of seamen from our vessels, and to restore those 'already impressed, there is no reason why hostilities should not immediately cease." Certainly, Mr. Chairman, if Great Britain at once gave up every point for which the war had been declared, the President must have been strangely unreasonable to refuse to suspend hostilities. And yet all this was required by the President's instructions to Mr. Russell! The Orders in Council had been revoked, and no illegal blockades substituted for them. It remained only to restore the seamen (British as well as American, for the instructions make no exception) already impressed, and discontinue the impressment of seamen (British as well as American) from our vessels; and every alleged cause and pretence for declaring the war would have been removed. And what was next to be done? Why the two Governments were to appoint Commissioners to make "definitive arrangements on these and every other difference, by a treaty to be concluded either here or at London." Now the two Governments had been discussing the question of impressments for eight years, (from 1792 to 1800,) and endeavoring to form a treaty on the subject, during the next twelve years, until war was declared, without being able to agree! And yet the President thought fit, as a preliminary step to any further negotiation, to demand of the British Government to abandon the whole subject in controversy during the time that the new negotiations should be going on—which might be for twenty years more on the single question of impressments! But the instructions state, that besides this great point, "there were many just and weighty causes of complaint against Great Britain," to be removed and settled by the proposed treaty. Among these was explicitly mentioned "indemnity for injuries received under the Orders in Council, and other edicts violating our rights"—"for which it was expected that provision would be made in the treaty." Now this indemnity, so confidently expected, had, during former negotiations, been repeatedly urged on the British Government, who apparently considered it so unfounded as hardly to listen to the demand. Yet this, and all the other "weighty causes of complaint," in addition to the hitherto insuperably difficult question of impressment, were to be the subjects of the proposed negotiations; which, considering the spirit and manner of former negotiations on the part of our Administration, might easily be protracted to twice the length of the siege of Troy. In the meantime, whatever number of British seamen resorted to our merchant vessels, they were to be protected by our flag. Such is the true state of the terms offered by the President to the British Government, as the conditions on which alone he would consent to a cessation of arms.

Sir, I consider this offer of an armistice on such impracticable conditions, tendered only eight days after the President and Congress (choosing their own time for it) had declared war, as of a piece with many former overtures, without any expectation of their acceptance by the British Government; but which, being rejected, would be used as a new topic of popular clamor against Great Britain—increase the resentment of the people, it was hoped—and by rendering the war itself more popular, procure the support necessary for its continuance.

But the honorable Speaker thinks, that to have treated without a previous suspension of impressments, would have been an abandonment of the rights we claim on the subject. What, then, would have been the effect on Great Britain? Her Government is at least as confident of the right to impress British subjects from neutral merchant vessels (and I think I have shown that this confidence is well founded) as our Government is of the right of neutrals to be exempted from such impressments. If, then, the British Government had, as a preliminary to negotiation, restored all impressed seamen, and ordered the entire practice to be discontinued,—this, according to the reasoning used in this case, would have been an abandonment of the British rights. And was it reasonable to make such a demand?

The honorable Speaker, if I understood him correctly, supposed our Government to have given proofs of its desire to obtain peace on terms which the minority themselves would approve; and if the majority should accept less, they would prostrate the honor, dignity, and independence of the country—meaning, I presume, that the entire abolition of impressments would be indispensable to preserve our honor, dignity, and independence. I will put a case: Suppose, what seems likely to happen, that, by the aid of Great Britain, the independence of Holland should be restored, and with that her commerce; and suppose the latter, as formerly, should be spread on the ocean, and that British seamen found on board Dutch merchant vessels, should be impressed and taken from them. Does any gentleman imagine that the States of Holland would consider their sovereignty to have been thereby invaded?

The honorable Speaker mentioned the British strength in their finances, but that their expenses were immense. So likewise are their resources. He remarked that this American war was maintained by Great Britain at a vast expense—double to that of the United States. This, sir, may well be doubted. Just the reverse may be presumed. It has been often said, and I have not heard it contradicted, that the flour furnished to the Western army cost the United States a hundred dollars a barrel, including the enormous expense and waste in the transportation. And two gentlemen, who were in the last Congress, stated to me this striking fact, concerning the forage supplied to that army. A wagon started with forty bushels of corn. The team of horses consumed eighteen bushels in going; the driver reserved eighteen bushels to feed them in returning, and delivered four to the army. It is presumed, then, that this wagon was employed not less than six and thirty days; the hire of which, and the cost of the thirty-six bushels of corn eaten by the horses, must have amounted to at least two hundred dollars—so the corn delivered to the army cost fifty dollars a bushel! And from all we have heard, unexampled extravagance and waste are exhibited in every scene of this miserable warfare.

The honorable Speaker further remarked, that to Great Britain this war promised neither glory nor profit. And does it promise either to us? And which, from the degree of suffering, will first be weary of it? Another motive, he said, would urge Britain to be at peace with us; to enjoy the benefit of our commerce. And would the renewal of that commerce be less beneficial to us than to her? "But she is engaged in a great cause in Europe;" and therefore must desire peace with the United States. Yes. Britain had been pouring out, and was continuing to pour out rivers of blood and floods of money, to rescue Europe from the grasp of the universal tyrant, and restore independence to the nations. This was, indeed, a great cause; and was this a time to attack her; to press her with the burden of the American war? I leave the question to the reflections of that gentleman and his friends.

The gentleman from Louisiana, (Mr. ROBERTSON,) at the beginning of his observations on the loan bill, spoke of a gentleman, for some years an honorable member of this House, whom he denominated "a distinguished Jacobin of the Eastern States." Sir, after the just vindication of Mr. Quincy's character by one of my colleagues, (Mr. BAYLIES,) little is left for me to add. I well knew Mr. Quincy's father. No man was more zealously and ardently engaged in the measures of resistance to the unconstitutional acts of Great Britain, which preceded the actual war of our Revolution. At the instance of eminent patriots of that day, he undertook a secret embassy to England, to effect objects deemed important to the maintenance of our rights. I, perhaps, was the last of his friends who saw him immediately before he embarked. He went, and was returning, but enfeebled in health. Just as he approached his native land he expired. Honored and gratefully remembered for his pure patriotism, abilities, and virtues, it is the high and laudable ambition of the son to imitate his sire; and, in the same honorable pursuits, to render himself eminently useful to his country.

The expression of Mr. Quincy, repeated by the gentleman from Louisiana, "that the majority could not be kicked into a war," I always regretted. Nor did I approve of an expression which lately fell from my honorable friend from New Jersey, (Mr. STOCKTON,) for whom I entertain a very high respect—"that the Administration had struck their colors;"—because I have always thought that such taunting expressions, by touching the pride and rousing the resentments of the persons addressed, tended to produce mischievous measures, or to defeat good ones, contrary to the sober sentiments and better judgments of those who were so reproached.

But I do not view in the same light, precisely, with my friend from New Jersey, the President's

FEBRUARY, 1814.

The Loan Bill.

H. OF R.

acceptance of Lord Castlereagh's overture, to treat on the questions in controversy between the United States and Great Britain. Lord Castlereagh says that the British Government is willing to negotiate and adjust subsisting differences "upon principles of perfect reciprocity, not inconsistent with the established maxims of public law, and with the maritime rights of the British Empire." The President, in answer to this overture, consents to treat, "on conditions of reciprocity consistent with the rights of both parties as sovereign and independent nations." This, to be sure, would seem well enough, if we had not previously known the President's meaning of the words sovereign and independent, as applied by him to the question of impressments. The President holds the opinion, that when a British naval officer enters on board an American merchant vessel on the high seas, to search for and take away native British seamen, the sovereignty, and, of course, the independence, of the United States are thereby violated. Now, as no citizen would consent that the President should, for any consideration, surrender any branch of our sovereignty and independence; and as Great Britain holds to be clear, and will never give up her right so to enter, search for, and take away her own subjects, if the President adheres to his own doctrine, it does not appear very obvious how a satisfactory and lasting peace is to be obtained. A temporary arrangement, indeed, may be made, by which Great Britain may agree to suspend, or discontinue the practice of impressment, if, and so long as the United States shall make provision by law, and in its execution render it effectual, to exclude all British seamen from American vessels. But if no more than this be attainable, (and the nature of the case forbids the expectation that anything more will be attained,) why have so many thousand lives of our citizens, and so many millions of money, been sacrificed in a war for sailors' rights? There has never been a time, I believe, when Great Britain would have rejected such an effectual arrangement. The ready, eager, and sure protection given by the people of the United States to British seamen deserting from British vessels in our ports, furnished, indeed but too much ground of jealousy, that no provision for their apprehension and restoration would prove effectual.

It is much to be regretted, that scarcely any correspondence can take place with the British Government, in which there is not introduced something offensive or calculated to excite, there and here, feelings and passions unfavorable to a fair and amicable adjustment of differences. In the present case, there is in Mr. Monroe's answer to Lord Castlereagh's overture, for a direct negotiation for peace, a representation plainly different from the fact. The British Minister at the Russian Court (Lord Cathcart) having given to the Russian Minister the reasons why the British Government declined treating with the United States, under the mediation of Russia, makes known its readiness to treat with them directly; and adds—"If, through the good offices of his Imperial Majesty, this proposition should be accepted, the Prince Regent would prefer that the conferences should be held at London," &c. In his answer Mr. Monroe says, that "by this communication it appears," that the Prince Regent having rejected the mediation of Russia, "proposed to treat directly with the United States at Gottenburg or London; and that he had requested the interposition of the good offices of the Emperor in favor of such an arrangement." One motive for using an expression obviously offensive to the British Government seems to have been, to induce the people of the United States to believe that that Government was petitioning for peace; driven to it, to be sure, by the energetic measures of our own!

The gentleman from Louisiana said, that the charge of moral treason had been met with indignant silence; a mode of treatment which, perhaps, would have been the most suitable. I, however, had intended to make some observations on this new doctrine; but having occupied so much of the time of the Committee, I will pass it by. Indeed, I think the observations which have been made by my friends on this side of the House amply sufficient.

The same gentleman said that there was now no indisposition, on the part of the Republicans, to foster a navy. The reason is obvious; the exploits of the Navy have saved the party from sinking. In the actual management of their war nothing else has kept their heads above water. The gentleman sought an apology for the early and long-continued opposite conduct in the party called Republicans, in the fact, that Washington was for some time silent on the subject of a navy. Sir, the reason is plain. When at the commencement of his Administration the Government itself was to be organized, and everything requisite to the exercise of its powers was to be created, matters of indispensable necessity were first to be provided for. But as soon as possible, after the depredations of the Algerines required a naval force to protect our commerce, it was proposed that a naval force should be provided. And what then was the conduct of the same party now calling themselves Republicans? They vehemently resisted the attempt to commence building a navy; and one of the ablest leaders of the party thanked God that the trees necessary for such a navy were then yet standing in the woods. This Republican hostility to a navy (with the exception of individuals of the party) continued down to the projected commencement of the present war. I recollect, that when, on a report of the Secretary of the Navy, five or six years ago, it was proposed to make an appropriation for repairing some of the frigates, which, if omitted for another year, would be hardly worth repairing, a Republican Senator, and a very honest man, who spoke the sentiment of his heart, thus accosted me: "If all our frigates were collected into one bunch, and they were all in flames, and if by spitting I could extinguish the fire, I would not spit!"

But the gentleman from Louisiana said the Administration had kept the Navy in repair, and laid out much money upon it. This, sir, I presume is true. In the first year of Mr. Jefferson's Administration, the corsairs of Tripoli captured some American vessel or vessels. A moderate tribute (much less than was paid to Algiers, and similar to what the maritime Powers of Europe had been in the habit of paying, regularly or irregularly,) would doubtless have satisfied that petty Power. But Mr. Jefferson preferred the application of a naval force. He sent a small squadron into the Mediterranean, with orders (as at the time was understood) to capture the Tripolitan cruisers, to throw their guns overboard, and completely disarm them, and then to let them go home! Mr. Jefferson is a philosopher, and thus philosophically was this war commenced. But Congress had not then authorized a war with Tripoli; and the capturing and disarming of the cruisers was represented as a measure of defence. Yet it would seem reasonable to detain, by way of indemnity for the wrong, as well as to take and disarm the vessel of the aggressor. The next year, Congress passed a law authorizing the equipment of a naval armament, to be sent against Tripoli. Its operations were ineffectual. The next and the next year, additional armaments were equipped; and, finally, in the fifth year of the war, had the gallant Eaton on the land, operating with a force collected in Africa, been seconded by the vigorous co-operation of the Navy, Tripoli, if not completely conquered, would probably have been reduced to terms of submission; and such an issue of the war, as honorable as beneficial to the United States, would have made a deep and lasting impression on all the Barbary Powers, favorable to the security of the commerce of the United States. But this prospect was blasted in a moment. Our ships approached Tripoli, but not to fight. They were under the control of Consul-General Lear, who had powers to negotiate a peace; and after expending $4,000,000 on the Navy, (as stated by a member of the Senate in his place,) during the Tripolitan war, to avoid paying a small tribute, or liberal presents, peace was ignominiously purchased. Sixty thousand dollars were paid to the reigning Bashaw, to redeem the crew of the Philadelphia frigate (stranded on his coast) who were his prisoners. Such was the result of so many years expensive war with that petty Power!

The gentleman from Louisiana, continuing to speak on the subject of the Navy, said that Mr. Adams had expended above ten millions of dollars upon it; and on the last day of his existence, ordered all the vessels but thirteen to be sold. How much money was expended on the Navy, under the Federal Administration, I do not know. But whatever was expended, under the able and vigorous conduct of the Department by the first Secretary of the Navy, I do not hesitate to say, was well laid out; and he left to his successor ample stores, on which the Department long after subsisted. I remember that in 1807, when, in consequence of the attack on the Chesapeake, an alarm of war was industriously but causelessly excited, stores of certain kinds were purchased and expenditures made, to the amount of several hundred thousand dollars, without any appropriation; and when application was afterwards made to Congress to sanction the proceeding, by an appropriation, it was stated, on the floor of the Senate, by the brother of the then Naval Secretary, that such ample provision of some important articles had been made by the Federal Administration, that until that time, (and six years had elapsed,) there had been no necessity for making any new purchases. It is true, that all the armed vessels, excepting the thirteen referred to by the gentleman from Louisiana, were ordered to be sold, and the order was perfectly correct. When, in order to protect our commerce against French depredations, Congress authorized the providing, expeditiously, of an armed naval force, it was necessary to purchase of the merchants a number of vessels, the best that could be procured for that service; but these having been constructed for trade and not for war, were not worth retaining, when the emergency which called for them had passed away. And a treaty with France having put an end to hostilities, these original merchant vessels were very properly directed to be sold; while the frigates and other vessels which had been built for war, were directed to be carefully preserved for future use.

The gentleman from Louisiana having undertaken to vindicate the conduct of our Government towards Spain, I beg leave, Mr. Chairman, to make some observations on the subject, without, at this time, going into long details.

At the peace of 1763, between England, France and Spain, the whole country lying between the British Atlantic provinces and the River Mississippi (with the exception of the island of New Orleans) was ceded, or acknowledged to belong, to the King of Great Britain, together with a right freely to navigate the river Mississippi, from its source to the ocean. At the close of our Revolutionary war, the same country, and the same right to navigate the river Mississippi, were ceded to the United States. But Spain possessed the territories on both sides of the river Mississippi, at and towards its mouth; and, commanding the passage, refused the use of it to the United States. At length, however, in October, 1795, a treaty was made with Spain, admitting our claim to the free navigation of the river to the sea; and at the same time, a right was obtained to use the city of New Orleans as a place of deposit for our productions to be exported, and for all our merchandise imported, for the use of the Western States and Territories.

In 1801-2, this free use of the Mississippi, and the right of deposit at New Orleans, were interrupted by the Spanish authority at New Orleans. There was an air of mystery in this affair; for while the Spanish Intendant of commerce caused this interruption, the Spanish Governor, (according to my recollection,) and the Spanish Minister to the United States, were ignorant, or affected to be ignorant, of the cause. But we did not then know that Louisiana had been re-granted by Spain to France. This would have solved, as it now solves the mystery. This retrocession of Louisiana by Spain to France was made by the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, on the 1st of October, 1800. But the war with England prevented any attempt to take immediate possession. During this state of suspense, the experiment was made, at the expense of the Spanish faith, on the temper of the United States, and particularly of the Western people, to whom the free navigation of the Mississippi was essential, by interrupting it in the manner I have mentioned. There can be no question that this was done at the instigation of France; and the Prime Minister of Spain (Godoz, Prince of Peace) was the tool of Bonaparte in making the experiment; for Louisiana, including the Isle of Orleans, having been transferred to France, the Spanish Government and nation had no interest, and could have no possible motive to interrupt the navigation of the river, greatly to the injury, and with the certainty of exciting the resentments of the United States. But the interest of France in this outrage is apparent. If the General Government should forbear to vindicate the national rights, the Western people, to whom the navigation of the Mississippi is indispensable, would be left to their own discretion; and they must either attempt to open the navigation by force, or consent to enjoy it on such conditions as could be obtained. The principal condition which France would have offered, was obviously this: That if they would separate themselves from the Atlantic States, they should enjoy, not only the free navigation of the Mississippi, and the right of deposit at New Orleans, but that that city, and all the French ports in America, and in Europe, should be the open markets for their productions and manufactures. And thus straightened, there can be little doubt as to the decision of the Western people; they would have been constrained to have associated themselves with the French power, had it been established in Louisiana.

The peace concluded with Great Britain at Amiens, in the Autumn of 1801, gave to France the opportunity of equipping a naval and military force—and the same was accordingly prepared to take possession of Louisiana. But war between France and Great Britain being on the point of breaking out afresh, the French armament destined for Louisiana was blockaded in the ports of Holland, and the project was abandoned. It was in this crisis, that the French Emperor, wanting money for the renewal of the war, and especially being apprehensive that if Louisiana remained the property of France, Great Britain would take possession of it for herself—he sold the territory to the United States. The British Government, though determined that France should not possess herself of Louisiana, was perfectly satisfied with the transfer of it to the United States. In addition to the evidence of this fact in possession of the Government, I can state that of Mr. Alexander Baring, (now a member of the British House of Commons,) who came to this city in the Autumn of 1803, after the re-commencement of the war with France, to receive the six per cent. stock, in which eleven millions and a quarter of dollars of the price of Louisiana were to be paid; the house of Barings in London having bargained with agents of the French Government to take that stock in exchange for money to be paid to France. Mr. Baring's marriage and former residence in Philadelphia, had given me an opportunity of forming an acquaintance with him. Conversing on this affair of Louisiana, I asked him if his Government (the British) had no objection to the transaction which furnished so considerable a supply of money to France? Far from it, he answered; and added, that the British Government would itself rather have paid the whole purchase money, than have suffered Louisiana to go into the possession of France.

The treaty for the purchase of Louisiana was concluded on the 30th of April, 1803. It was not till the month of June following, that our Ministers, Chancellor Livingston and Mr. Monroe, appear to have thought that West Florida was comprehended in the purchase; and if it was not in the contemplation of the parties when the treaty was concluded, it could not be justly claimed by the United States. The French Government always denied that West Florida was included in the cession of Louisiana; and as a conclusive proof of the fact, I will refer but to one piece of evidence—the order of the King of Spain to his officers at New Orleans, to deliver possession of Louisiana to France. This order was dated, I think, about the month of October, 1802, some months before the cession of that Territory to the United States was thought of, and when the French Emperor intended to take possession of it for himself. In this order, the King of Spain directs that Louisiana be delivered to France, precisely as by the treaty of 1762 it had been ceded, and was afterwards delivered by France to Spain. Now, by that treaty, nothing was granted by France to Spain, but Louisiana on the western side of the river Mississippi, and the Island of Orleans, which is on the eastern side of the river. And what has since been called West Florida, or so much of it as had belonged to France before the peace of 1763, was then ceded by France to Great Britain, who took and kept possession of it, as well as of the rest of Florida which had been ceded to Great Britain by Spain, until the war of our Revolution; and at the peace of 1783, the Floridas were ceded by Great Britain to Spain. From this short account of the matter, the inference is clear, that the United States have no better title to West than to East Florida; that is, they have no title at all. The gentleman from Louisiana, as an apology, I presume, for the conduct of our Government, spoke of the people living under the Spanish Government, in that country, as in a state of vassalage, in worse than Egyptian bondage; and yet, great numbers of free American citizens had voluntarily quitted the United States, and become Spanish subjects, and afterwards rose in arms against their patrons and benefactors!

The gentleman said that the United States had done no injury to Spain; and intimated that it was our "sympathy" for her, suffering under the attacks and oppression of the French Emperor, that occasioned the United States to forbear so long to take possession of West Florida. Sir, I have never been able to discover the smallest tokens of sympathy for Spain in the dominant party in the United States—neither in those who have administered our Government, nor among their supporters. On the contrary, every victory, and every advantage gained by the French Emperor in Spain, appeared to be with them a subject of rejoicing. On the other hand, it was regretted by the same party, that the Spaniards had risen in arms and resisted their oppressor, who had treacherously dethroned their King and usurped his Crown. I once witnessed an expression of that regret on the floor of the Senate, because of the effect it would produce in the United States! And what was that expected effect? Obviously of universal sympathy among a people who had taken arms, and endured the evils of a war of seven years, to establish their own independence. It was natural to suppose that such a people would, in their feelings at least, take part with the suffering Spaniards whom the usurper was attempting to bring under his yoke. Had such feelings existed, they would have led the people to execrate the oppressor, while they must have hailed those who flew to the aid of the oppressed; but they were the English, whom the people had been taught to hate, and whose hatred, it was wished, for party purposes, to keep up and aggravate. But whatever was the cause, it is a notorious fact, that the great body of the American people who supported the Administration exhibited no sign of sympathy for the Spanish patriots, nor any wish for their success. Through the treachery of the Spanish Prime Minister, the Prince of Peace, the flower of the Spanish army had been sent to Germany, to aid the French in making or maintaining their conquests in that country; while strong French armies were marched into Spain, and put in possession of some of her strongest fortresses. The Spaniards being thus betrayed and surprised, the French Emperor imposed on them his brother Joseph for their King. It was in this forlorn situation that the Spaniards had the courage to rise and resist the tyrant. And who that really hated tyrants and tyranny could forbear to hail those generous spirits, and bid them God speed? Yet, they were not thus hailed by the majority of Americans! Their chief, (Mr. Jefferson) with the coolest indifference, said it was a mere contest about the Government, to decide whom the Spaniards should have for their King! As if it were a matter of indifference to any nation, whether they should have a chief ruler of their own choice, of a family to which they had long been attached, or one whom a neighboring tyrant would impose on them! But the English had taken the side of the Spanish patriots, and sent an army and supplies to aid them in their gallant struggles to throw off the French yoke. It was then that the French Emperor issued his insulting and blasphemous proclamation to the Spaniards: "I will soon (said he) chase from the Peninsula the English army, who have been sent to Spain, not for your aid, but to influence you with a false confidence, and to mislead you." And he thus concludes his proclamation: "But if all my efforts are ineffectual, and if I find you unworthy of my confidence, I will treat you as conquered provinces, and place my brother on another throne. I will put the crown of Spain on my own head; I will be respected even by the worst. For God has given me the power and the disposition necessary to surmount all obstacles!"

The gentleman from Louisiana (as another excuse for the conduct of our Government, in possessing itself of one Spanish province, and for more than contemplating the taking possession of another) said the Spaniards had attempted to corrupt the people of our Western country. Sir, there is reason to believe that this intrigue also, like that for shutting up the Mississippi, originated with the French Government. As early as February, 1797, the American Commissioner, Mr. Ellicott, having arrived at Natchez, was informed that Louisiana was to be ceded by Spain to France. This appears in the journal of Mr. Ellicott, who was employed by the United States to join the Commissioners of Spain, to run the boundary line between the territories of the United States and the Spanish provinces of the Floridas, from the Mississippi to the Atlantic Ocean. For more than a year, the Spanish officers at Natchez and New Orleans interposed delays, on the most frivolous pretences; and contrary to the positive stipulations of the treaty of 1795 with the United States. This conduct of the Spanish officers appeared unaccountable at the time; but suppose only a French intrigue (and Spain, in 1797, was in close alliance with France, and almost absolutely at her devotion) and all difficulty vanishes. (11)

Permit me now, Mr. Chairman, to make a few observations on the transactions in East Florida. Everybody knows that Congress passed a law authorizing the President to take possession of it, in case any other Power should attempt to do it. But no such attempt being made, there could be no pretence, under the act of Congress, for marching troops into East Florida. Yet troops of the United States were marched to the neighborhood of St. Augustine, in some sort beleaguering it a year or more; and certainly by their position, if not actively, countenancing the body of men there calling themselves "patriots," who were in arms against the Spanish Government. Prior to this, however, General Matthews (unquestionably employed by our Administration) had entered East Florida, and with these self-styled patriots (five-sixths of them, as I am informed, inhabitants of Georgia) had taken forcible possession of the Spanish island of Amelia. Here there was a curious coincidence of naval aid, by our gunboats, under the command of Commodore Campbell. I remember seeing a letter with his signature, (as published in the newspapers,) in which, as well as I recollect, in answer to an application of the "patriots" for his assistance, he expressed a sentiment of this kind—"that, although he had no orders from his Government, he would be always ready to render his aid in the cause of liberty." Mentioning this letter to the gentleman from Charleston, to whom I have once before alluded, and who is known to the honorable Speaker, and expressing my opinion that no officer of the United States would dare to carry his arms against the territory of a nation with whom we were at peace, without some kind of authority from the Government to countenance the act; remarking, too, that a law existed making it highly penal for any citizen of the United States to form such an expedition; the gentleman from Charleston answered to this effect: "Perhaps Commodore Campbell's letter from the Government was like the one received, at that time, relating to the East Florida business, by Lieutenant Gadsden, who then commanded a small armed vessel of the United States at Charleston. Lieutenant Gadsden, not knowing what construction to put upon the letter, carried it to the district attorney of the United States, a gentleman well known for his legal talents. The district attorney, having read it, told Lieutenant Gadsden that if he should go with his vessel to East Florida his orders would justify him; and if he did not go, they would also justify him!"

FEBRUARY, 1814.

The Loan Bill.

H. OF R.

In addition to all this, sir, I have received information on which I rely, that General Matthews, when on his way to East Florida, received about ten thousand dollars on account of the United States at Charleston, and additional sums at Savannah, to enable him to prosecute the revolution and invasion of that province. Further still, sir, I can positively assert, that besides these operations on the Atlantic coast, it was intended to take possession of Pensacola; and that, for this purpose, Colonel Hawkins, the United States' agent with the Creek nation, was desired to obtain their permission to march the troops through their country. (12) And yet the gentleman from Louisiana has told us, that our Government had no disposition to do any injury to Spain! But as injuries, and serious ones, too, apparent to all the world, had been committed against Spain, in the unwarrantable acts of our Government in relation to the Floridas, it was necessary to find some apology for them; and hence the mention of the depredations committed by the armed vessels of Spain on our commerce, to the amount of some millions of dollars, for which no indemnity has yet been paid. I have already explained this matter, and shown it to have arisen from an act of our own Government, in coupling with this demand another for indemnity for French spoliations consummated in Spanish ports, but for which, in the actual state of things at the time, Spain was not, in equity, responsible; the power of France being then ascendant, and controlling all Spanish measures.

The gentleman from Louisiana suffered his imagination to be alarmed with the idea of a possible invasion of the United States by Great Britain, who, he said, might subsidize Hessians, Brunswickers, and Russians. Sir, the British Government is too wise to think of so idle a project, as an invasion for the purpose of holding any part of the United States. And were we even to make her a tender of our independence, again to become her colonies, she would not accept the offer. She knows, as every man must know, that with our rapidly increasing population, which in the lapse of a few years will equal her own, we could not long be kept in subjection; and hence would appear the folly of accepting it if tendered. In respect to the United States, Great Britain desires only peace and liberal commerce, which she well knows how to appreciate, but which blessings at this time are of immensely greater importance to us than to her.

The gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. FORSYTH,) in mentioning the opposition of the minority to the loan bill, and other war measures, ascribed it to their "malignant prejudice."

[Mr. FORSYTH rose to explain, and said he did not mean to comprehend generally the party in opposition to the Government, but some only, or a few.]

Well, sir, I do not see that I am excepted in this explanation. The gentleman's remark having been made in this House, must be considered as applicable to some at least of its members. But, sir, my character is not to be affected by any such charges; for (and slandered as I have been, I trust I shall be excused for saying) it stands on the rock of integrity and truth, and not all the powers of Democracy and Hell can shake it.

"Unhallowed ambition (said the gentleman) sits upon their bosom, stifling reason, and subduing the better feelings of the heart!" And then in the language, but not with the tone of lamentation and regret, added—"They must die in their sins—unannointed and unannealed!" Sir, to this gentleman, and to all others who hold the same sentiments, I will content myself with applying the words of Job to his upbraiding friends—"No doubt ye are the men, and wisdom shall die with you."

The gentleman's colleague, (Mr. CUTHBERT,) who spoke before him, and who has so lately taken a seat in this House that I had not seen him before, rose and spoke on the same side of the question; and with extreme vehemence—with apparent fire and fury—but on taking a chair nearer to him I found that, in the midst of the storm, his face wore a benignant smile. This gentleman, (Mr. C.) candidly uttered a truth more important than any I have heard from the same side of the House. He said, "Great Britain has rescued the nations of Europe." Yes, sir, when those nations had been subdued, or awed into submission by the power of France, Britain, undismayed, persevered in her mighty efforts to restore them to their independence; and in the glorious result has proved herself to have been justly entitled "The world's last hope."

But the gentleman from Georgia, to whom I have repeatedly alluded, (Mr. FORSYTH,) said that Great Britain was not fighting for the liberties of the world; that we erred in ascribing to her the safety of nations—and asked, what influence had the mighty navy of Great Britain in deciding the battle of Moscow? What in gaining the victory of the allies at Leipsic? Sir, if I had heard these questions asked anywhere but on the floor of this House, I should have said they were very shallow questions. The British fleet, it is true, could not sail on the plains of Moscow, nor navigate a branch of the river Elbe at Leipsic. But when the nations of the Continent had sunk under the arms of France, Britain, fighting for her existence, successfully maintained the combat. She did much more. With her fleets commanding on the seas she transported her armies to Portugal—encouraged and taught her inhabitants to fight, and, with their united force, defeated and expelled the armies of France. Portugal redeemed, the British and Portuguese entered Spain, uniting theirs with the Spanish arms, to deliver that country also from the yoke of France; and this, too, after years of hard fighting, has been accomplished; the fleets of Britain all the time transporting strong reinforcements of troops, and stores of all kinds, alike indispensable and immense, for such great and long continued operations. The fleets of Britain also, still commanding on the seas, compelled her enemy to transport slowly and expensively, by land, everything requisite for his projected conquest of Russia, and the maintenance and relief of the fortified places accessible by water. But still further—the fleets of Britain gave scope for the exercise of the unconquerable spirit and the energies of her people in those great enterprises, which, by their example and effects, kept alive, or rekindled in the nations of Europe, the spirit to resist, and finally to overthrow the universal tyrant.

H. of R.

The Loan Bill.

FEBRUARY, 1814.

The same gentleman asked, for what were the Spanish patriots contending? And he answered, it was to determine who should be their master, Bonaparte or Bourbon; adding, that to us it was immaterial whether Joseph or Ferdinand ruled Spain. And was it indeed a matter of indifference to us and to the world, whether Bonaparte added another kingdom to his European dominions, and that kingdom Spain, with her immense territories and resources in both the Indies? For who does not know that, with his brother Joseph on the Spanish throne, the French Emperor would have commanded him and all his subjects?

The same gentleman from Georgia also asked, whether the minority did not expect that indemnities would have been demanded of France, for all the injuries we had sustained from the execution of the Berlin and Milan decrees? And then affirmed that such indemnities would have been demanded, although the eagles of Bonaparte had been erected on the walls of Moscow! So, sir, in the words of the poet, often quoted, you may "call up spirits from the vasty deep"—but will they come when called? Sir, the President himself, who has so often mentioned the just expectations—the authorized expectations—of such indemnities, cannot expect any will be obtained. General Armstrong, when our Minister in France, having in a letter to Mr. Madison mentioned the enormous spoliation of American property, particularly, I think, under the Rambouillet decree, declared, "that their very magnitude forbade all hope of restoration." Sir, there is not a member of this House, that sets any value on his reputation as a man of sense, who will expose himself to ridicule, by saying that he expects France will give indemnities for her immense depredations on our commerce—which amount to at least thirty millions of dollars. Mr. Chairman I will notice but one thing more which fell from the gentleman from Georgia: He said he would continue the war an hundred years, rather than subject American seamen to impressment! Sir, without questioning the profound wisdom of this sentiment, I will barely remark, that were the war to be continued but for a small portion only of that period, we should have neither ships nor seamen; a consummation, as I have before observed, undoubtedly corresponding with the wishes of Mr. Jefferson and his genuine disciples.

Mr. Chairman, in the course of the debates on the Loan bill, some gentleman spoke of the Russian mediation, on which I had publicly written, stating that the Russian Minister, Mr. Daschkoff, had made an offer of it without orders from his Government; whereas it now appeared, from the documents lately communicated by the President, that Mr. Daschkoff was instructed to offer the mediation of his master, the Emperor Alexander, to effect a peace between the United States and Great Britain; and the gentleman expressed his expectation that my candor would induce me to acknowledge I had been in an error. Sir, I shall never hesitate, on proper evidence, to confess an error; but in this case I have nothing to retract. I publicly announced, that my whole statement rested on the information I had received—but received from a gentleman on whose correctness I relied. And, sir, I still think the reliance was just. I entertain no doubt that a verbal offer was made without instructions, and rejected. The gentleman's information, as I stated it, came down to the 6th of March, 1813; to which Mr. Daschkoff had received no instructions. And within a few days I have learnt, very accidentally, though from an authentic source, that it was on the same 6th of March, and I understand on the evening of that day, the despatches, containing Mr. Daschkoff's instructions, came to his hands; and on the 8th of March he tendered the mediation in a letter to the Secretary of State.

Here, sir, give me leave to notice the advantage attempted to be taken by different gentlemen, of one expression in Mr. Daschkoff's letter, to justify our Government in declaring war. Mr. Daschkoff says—"His Majesty, who takes pleasure in doing justice to the wisdom of the Government of the United States of America, is convinced that it has done all that it could do to prevent this rupture." If, sir, such a sentiment be expressed in Mr. Daschkoff's instructions from his Government, it must be viewed as one of those diplomatic compliments which mean nothing; and which, if taken seriously by any diplomatist of any experience, would render him ridiculous. And unquestionably an equal compliment, whatever it might be, was paid to the British as to the American Government. But certainly the Russian Government could not have expected that either would have been published to the world. And if we suppose the sentiment was expressed to the American Government, exclusively, we must also suppose that the Emperor Alexander was willing to charge the Government of his distinguished ally, Great Britain, with a conduct directly opposite to that of the American Government; that is, as persisting in claims unreasonable and unjust—a supposition not easily to be admitted, because the imputation is grossly affrontive to Great Britain. But, after all, (as drowning men will catch at straws,) of what value is the sentiment, if really expressed in Mr. Daschkoff's instructions? What does the Emperor Alexander know of the merits of the controversy, which, for so many years, has been kept up between our own and the British Government? Who can be weak enough to imagine, that, amidst the cares of his vast empire, he has spent any time in examining the many volumes of letters and other documents which have been written and published on this subject? The number even of American citizens who have read them, with the critical attention requisite to the forming of a correct opinion, is very small; nor is it credible that the Russian Minister of State, Count Romanzow, was sufficiently acquainted with the controversy to have pronounced such a definitive opinion. And, therefore, if he did entertain that opinion, it must have been formed on the information given him on one side of the question by Mr. Adams; a circumstance, if true, that would show how ill qualified was the Russian Minister of State to act, in the name of the Emperor, the part of a mediator. The case was simply this: The Emperor knew that war had taken place between the United States and Great Britain, and was solicitous to effect a reconciliation, because he wished for the uninterrupted and undiminished aid of his great ally, in the common cause of Europe, against the dangerous power of France; and at the same time that his subjects, who had been long suffering under the French Emperor's continental system, might enjoy all the benefits of a free communication with the United States.

FEBRUARY, 1814.

The Loan Bill.

H. OF R.

By the papers communicated about the Russian mediation, it appears that the British Minister at St. Petersburg offered to give a passport to an American vessel, to proceed to the United States with the despatches of Mr. Adams, and those of the Russian Government containing the offer of its mediation, provided the vessel should touch in England; a condition with which, Mr. Adams says, "he did not think it suitable to comply." Why it was not suitable is not intimated. Had the vessel been despatched, and touched in England, she might have brought with her the decision of the British Government, not to accept the mediation, and thus have prevented the useless mission to Russia, and the delay, for near a year, of measures for a direct negotiation to put an end to the war, if that was really desired. There are many other topics, Mr. Chairman, which have been introduced into this debate, and which I intended to notice; but, weary of the subject, I shall pass them by, and conclude with a few observations on the Army and Navy of the United States, as employed in the present war.

In the debate on the bill for filling the ranks of the Army, in order to continue the war, one reason assigned, was, "to redeem the military character of the country." Sir, I do not think it needs redemption; I mean, that I do not think our country disgraced. The like materials for an army exist as in the time of our Revolutionary war. But, soldiers are not formed in a day. New officers and new men require much and long instruction. Soldiers taken from the tranquil walks of civil life must pass through a course of strict discipline, and be gradually inured to dangers, to acquire the steadiness necessary to meet, on equal terms, the regular troops of an enemy. The uniform exercise of the musket is the easiest part that soldiers have to learn. To march, to wheel, to change their positions as the scenes of action change, and yet preserve their order, are the difficult parts of duty. If without such essential preparation our troops have been led into action, disasters were to have been expected.

Entirely different is our Naval war. There, both officers and men have already learnt to march on the mountain wave, and their minds are familiar with danger—with the perils of storms and tempests—that would appal the hearts of landmen. They are also, as seamen, perfectly skilled in all the movements and manœuvres rendered necessary by changes of the wind or the conduct of the enemy; and nearly all they want besides, at the breaking out of war, is to learn the exercise of cannon—a work of ten or fifteen days. Hence it was, that very early after the commencement of the war of our Revolution, our armed vessels met those of the enemy on equal terms, reckoning man for man, and gun for gun. And, for myself, I wanted no new proofs of our ability to meet an equal enemy on the seas. That, in the encounters which have happened in the present war, a superiority has appeared on the side of the American armed vessels, is not surprising, when it is considered, that by the war, nearly all our seamen were thrown out of employment—the declaration of war having put an end to our fisheries, and almost annihilated our mercantile navigation—whence it happened that our naval officers had it in their power to man their vessels with a superior class of sailors. The enemy, on the other hand, manning thousands of merchant vessels, and many hundred vessels of war, had their choice of seamen lessened. For a long time, too, they had been almost without an enemy on the ocean; and their only enemy there, they had been accustomed almost uniformly to beat, and consequently to despise. Hence, they had grown over-confident and careless—circumstances which, even when the forces should be equal, could hardly fail to produce defeat and disgrace. (13)

Notes by Mr. Pickering.

(1) The blockade from the river Elbe to Brest.

On the 16th of May, 1806, the British Government issued an order declaring the coast, rivers, and ports, from the river Elbe to the port of Brest, to be in a state of blockade. The practicability of such a blockade has been denied by our Government; but, since nearly the whole of our own coast, of much greater extent, has been actually blockaded by the British, the practicability of the former ought no longer to be doubted. It is notorious, that if one of our merchant vessels, and even our public armed vessels, got out or in, without encountering the British ships, it is for the most part owing to their superior sailing. But the fact is, and our Government well knew that by the order of the 16th of May, it was the intention of the British Government to open, not to shut, the ports from Elbe to Brest, (excepting a small part of them from Ostend to the river Seine, already in a state of strict and rigorous blockade,) so as to allow neutrals to carry on what has been called the colonial trade with those ports. This was clearly the intention of the British Government by the terms of the order itself; and so Mr. Monroe understood it. In his letter of May 17, 1806, to Mr. Madison, he says:

"Early this morning, I received from Mr. Fox a note, a copy of which is enclosed, which you will perceive embraces explicitly a principal subject depending between our Governments, though in rather a singular mode. The note is couched in terms of restraint, and professes to extend the blockade further than was heretofore done; nevertheless, it takes it from many ports already blockaded; indeed, from all east of Ostend and west of the Seine, except in articles contraband of war and enemies' property, which are seizable without a blockade. And, in like form of exception, considering every enemy as one Power, it admits the trade of neutrals, within the same limit, to be free, in the productions of enemies' colonies, in every but the direct route between the colony and the parent country."

With this, not only Mr. Monroe, but our Administration appeared satisfied, until, for the purpose of criminating Great Britain and favoring France, it was made a subject of complaint against the former, and offered as an apology for the latter in issuing the Berlin decree.

(2) Mr. Madison's letter of May 22, 1807, to General Armstrong, in Paris. After mentioning the necessity of orders to French cruisers, to prevent their capturing our vessels, according to the tenor of the Berlin decree, Mr. Madison adds—"There are proofs that the West India privateers have, under color of the edict, committed depredations which will constitute just claims of redress from their Government."

(3) The marine ordinance of France, issued by Louis XIV, in 1794, in amelioration of former rules, and re-enacted by Louis XV in 1744, with some alterations to conform the ordinance to certain treaties, contains the following regulation:

"Article VI. Vessels belonging to subjects of neutral States, which shall depart from the ports of a State the enemy of His Majesty, and there have taken their lading, in whole or in part, to go to the States of any other Prince than their own, whether allied to His Majesty, neutral, or enemy, may be stopped and brought into his kingdom, and shall be declared good prize with their lading, even although laden on account of the subjects of His Majesty, or of an allied or neutral State."

(4) Such an arming, vigorously conducted, for the protection of our commerce, would have saved thirty millions of dollars in property, belonging to our merchants, seized, taken, and confiscated by the French Emperor and his allies subsequent to his Berlin decree. And, by such resistance, we should also have prevented the issuing of the British Orders in Council of November, 1807; under the operation of which, vessels and merchandise to a large amount have been lost to our merchants.

In February, 1811, I requested the late Thomas Fitzsimons, Esq., of Philadelphia, one of the best informed merchants in the United States, to give me his opinion of the amount of losses sustained by the citizens of the United States from French captures, seizures, and confiscations. He answered, "I think the amount would exceed fifty millions of dollars." Then mentioning the treaty concluded with France on the 30th of September, 1800, (Bonaparte then First Consul,) in which all claims of our merchants for spoliation on their commerce, up to that time, were relinquished, Mr. Fitzsimons says, "the universal opinion was that the treaty abandoned claims for unjust captures to the amount of twenty millions of dollars." He then adds, "The late seizures in Italy, Holland, Antwerp, &c., (all places under the control of the French Emperor,) and the late reprisals, as they are called, (under the Emperor's peculiarly iniquitous Rambouillet decree,) certainly exceed thirty millions, independently of the property now in jeopardy in the North of Europe."

The above mentioned claims were abandoned, because there was hardly a distant hope that the French Government would ever pay to our citizens the twenty millions of dollars, of which, in the captures of their vessels and merchandise, they had been despoiled by French cruisers; and because, in consideration of that abandonment, the French Government renounced its pretensions to have the old treaties revived, especially the entangling treaty of alliance.

As to losses sustained by our merchants attempting to carry on trade with France, and her allies and dependencies, in contravention of British regulations, Mr. Fitzsimons says, "It may not be useless to add here, that, as respects British captures, they were very large in amount; but, that above four-fifths of the condemnations made in the vice-admiralty courts were reversed upon the appeals. Nevertheless, owing to the sacrifice by sales of the property, and the exorbitant charges of the officers, the recoveries seldom exceeded one half of the actual value."

(5) It is in a case of this kind that the opinion of the celebrated Bynkershoek, on maritime law, may be introduced. He says, "But if we take for our guide Nature, that great teacher of the law of nations, we shall find that everything is lawful against an enemy as such." If ever this principle was applicable, in its most extensive sense, it was in the actual forlorn situation of Great Britain, and the hopeless condition of the Continent, at the time here referred to.

(6) The grounds on which these Orders in Council were issued, are stated, in their preamble, to be the establishing of an unprecedented system of warfare against Great Britain, and aimed especially at the destruction of her commerce and resources, by the Berlin decree, which declared the British islands to be in a state of blockade; thereby subjecting to capture and condemnation all vessels, with their cargoes, which should continue to trade with the British dominions; and prohibiting all trading in English merchandise, which, whether coming from her colonies or manufactures, was declared lawful prize. That the nations in alliance with France, and under her control, were required to give, and had given, and continued to give, effect to that decree; that the Order in Council, of January 7, 1807, was issued either to compel the revocation of the Berlin decree, or to induce neutral nations to interpose with effect to obtain its revocation; but which, on the contrary, had then been recently enforced with great rigor; and that, under these circumstances, the British Government found itself compelled to take further measures for asserting and vindicating the rights of Great Britain, and supporting her maritime power; the maintenance of which was not more "essential to the safety and prosperity of her dominions, than it was to the protection of such States as still retained their independence, and to the general intercourse and happiness of mankind."

Then followed the Orders in Council of November 11, 1807, declaring that "all the ports of France and her allies, or of any other country at war with His Majesty, and all other ports or places in Europe, from which, although not at war with His Majesty, the British flag was excluded, and all ports or places in the colonies, belonging to His Majesty's enemies," should be subject to the restrictions of the most rigorous blockade. But the orders proceed to state, that although His Majesty would be fully justified, by the circumstances above recited, to establish such a system of rigorous blockade, "yet, being desirous not to subject neutrals to any greater inconvenience than was inseparable from his determination to counteract the designs of his enemies, and to retort upon them the consequences of their own violence and injustice;" and being yet willing to hope that "it might be possible (consistently with that object) still to allow to neutrals the opportunity of furnishing themselves with colonial produce for their own consumption and supply; and even to leave open, for the present, such trade with His Majesty's enemies as should be carried on directly with the ports of His Majesty's dominions, or of his allies, in the manner thereafter mentioned:" Therefore, such trade of neutrals with enemy colonies was permitted, so far as regarded articles for their own consumption; and also, in the manner prescribed, they might trade with the enemies of Great Britain, on the payment of certain duties required on the importation into Great Britain of goods destined for the territories of her enemies, and countries under their control, and executing the Berlin decree against Great Britain. These are the duties to which the name of "tribute" has been given—a name selected in order to render Great Britain and her orders the more odious; seeing one nation really under tribute to another, must be considered as dependent and degraded. The true state of the case is simply this: If in the actual state of the world, in 1807, when the French Emperor had subverted the whole law of nations, and, in effect, reduced the small number of nations remaining free from his yoke to a state of nature, in which reason, and not ancient rules, was to be resorted to for direction: if, under such circumstances, Great Britain was justifiable (as many citizens, to whom I have before referred, believed, and, as I think, on solid grounds) in absolutely interdicting all commerce of neutrals with her enemies and their associates—then, if she was willing to relax her system founded on rigid right, in favor of neutral commerce, she had a right to prescribe the conditions under which it should be carried on—whether by the payment of duties, or otherwise. And it would seem that, by demanding such duties, Great Britain expected to receive an equivalent for the benefits which her enemies would derive from the trade of neutrals.

(7) The Rambouillet decree of the French Emperor was distinguished for its unexampled iniquity. On the first of March, 1809, Congress passed the non-intercourse law, which so far repealed the embargo law as to permit the departure of our merchant vessels with their cargoes to all countries, excepting Great Britain and France, and their colonies and dependencies, or places in the actual possession of either. This non-intercourse law was to expire, by its own limitation, at the end of the next session of Congress; and, by a law previously passed, the next meeting of Congress had been fixed for the fourth Monday in May, 1809.

This law was published in the American newspapers, which, of course, went to France, and an official copy of it was delivered by General Armstrong, "with sufficient promptitude" (as he has stated) to the French Government. A whole year elapsed without any known complaint against the non-intercourse law. In that time American vessels with rich cargoes resorted to the ports of Holland, Spain, Italy, and Naples; countries which our own Government chose to consider as independent, although known to be the real "dependencies" of France; some of the ports in Spain excepted, which the patriot Spaniards, by the effectual aid of British forces, had rescued from her grasp.

In this state of things, with such vast American property within his reach, the French Emperor, on the 23d of March, 1810, issued his decree at Rambouillet, ordering to be seized and sold all American vessels and their cargoes which had entered, or should enter the ports of France and her dependencies after the 20th of May, 1809. And the French Minister, the Duke of Cadore, declared to General Armstrong that this decree was an act of reprisal for the non-intercourse law, which prohibited the entrance of French vessels and French merchandise into the ports of the United States after the 20th of May, 1809. But the entrance of British vessels and British merchandise was in the same manner forbidden; yet the British Government acquiesced. Our own Government intended, unquestionably, to favor France, by permitting American vessels to carry cargoes of merchandises really wanted by her to the ports of Holland, Spain, Italy, and Naples, from some of which ports their conveyance to France would be easy; and all those countries, Spain excepted, being then under the perfect control of Bonaparte, might justly be considered as parts of the French Empire. Yet this very distinction between France and those dependent countries, gratuitously made by our own Government in favor of France, the Emperor affected to resent, and to consider as another reason for seizing and confiscating American property.

But this Rambouillet decree, and its execution, are stamped with marks of singular atrocity. It was not issued until near nine months after the non-intercourse law had expired; and was not made known until the 14th of May, 1810, when it was published in French newspapers, (which appeared to be the first notice of it obtained by our Minister in Paris) and carried into immediate execution.

(8) Oppression often takes place, not as the result of a system of government, but of the perverse disposition of individual officers. The passage quoted from my letter of September 10, 1796, to Mr. King, has reference to the conduct of Admiral Sir Hyde Parker, at Jamaica. His predecessor on that station allowed to the American agent there the means of liberating American seamen, by legal process, in which their citizenship was ascertained, and such were discharged. Sir Hyde Parker, succeeding to the command, forbade his officers to submit to the process. His morose temper was felt by his fellow-subjects, the British sailors, who therefore gave him the name of Vinegar Parker. In the present war, in our own country, we have frequent accounts of oppression and outrage exercised on our citizens by men bearing commissions under the authority of the United States; yet no one imputes such wrongs to the Government. But such highly reprehensible conduct as that of Sir Hyde Parker, was probably not repeated by any other commanding officer. And for some years before the war was declared the injunctions of the royal proclamation (of the 16th of October, 1807) were no doubt generally observed.

(9) Mr. Madison himself has always admitted the right of Great Britain to impress her own subjects from American merchant vessels, when these were in British ports. And the instructions written by him, by the direction of Mr. Jefferson, for the negotiations with Great Britain on the subject of impressments, uniformly concede this point.

(10) The remarks relative to the rule of 1756, are connected with the observation of the gentleman from State of South Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun,) "that the English Court of Admiralty formerly regulated its decisions by the law of nations; but latterly by the orders of its Government." To this it may be answered—that the law of nations is still avowed to be the rule by which the adjudications of that court are directed. But it will be said—"Its rules of decision vary, at one time and another, in cases of the same kind, in obedience to the orders of the Government." The question then occurs, whether those orders are, or are not conformable to the law of nations? Under some circumstances a Government may insist on the exercise of its extreme rights, within the limits of public law, and in other circumstances, relax from such rigid adherence to them; and again from the latter state recur to the former. These remarks seem applicable to the changes in the British Admiralty decisions of which we complain. For a time, the rigor of the rule of 1756 was relaxed; and then again braced up to a stricter construction of the rule. If in any case this was done, without reasonable notice to neutrals of the change, it was, like all the decrees of the French Emperor for capturing and seizing neutral property, highly reprehensible and unjust. What has been the fact, I am not sufficiently informed to express an opinion.

(11) The Spanish officers continued to throw obstacles in the way of running the boundary line, from February, 1797, to the Summer of 1798; and nothing but Mr. Ellicott's resolute conduct, and his actually commencing the work, without waiting any longer for the Spanish agents, prevented further procrastination.

(12) My information (in addition to what the newspapers furnished) was derived from the letter of a gentleman whom I have long known, and whose observation, discernment, and accuracy, entitle him to full confidence. On the 17th of May, 1812, he wrote to me as follows: "When General Matthews went on to the southward last Summer, to revolutionize East Florida, he drew from the bank in Charleston about twenty thousand dollars, on account of the Government of the United States. Considerable sums have since been drawn, on the same account, from the custom-house in Savannah. The secret was so badly kept, that the whole country through which General Matthews and his coadjutor, Colonel Isaacs, passed, were apprized of the design; and that this public money, so drawn, was for the purpose above stated. But, sir, East Florida was not the sole object in contemplation. Colonel Hawkins, one of our agents for Indian affairs, was applied to by General Matthews and Colonel Isaacs, to negotiate a passage for their army (so called) through the Creek nation, for the express purpose of attacking and taking possession of the city of Pensacola, after the fall of St. Augustine, which was considered as certain. In consequence of this request from General Matthews and Colonel Isaacs, Colonel Hawkins negotiated with the chiefs of the Creek nation the passage of this army of patriots through their country."

(13) Several gentlemen who spoke in the debate on the Loan bill, having noticed some parts of the preceding speech, it was intended to offer a brief reply, chiefly for the purpose of correcting some material errors in facts into which, through want of information, they had fallen. But, a perversion of what is called the "previous question," (whose legitimate use is to prevent a decision of the main question, when circumstances should render any decision inexpedient, but the perverse use of which compels the immediate decision of the main question,) this "previous question" having stopped all further debate, Mr. Pickering is constrained to offer a few observations, by way of reply, in this note.

A gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Eppes) glanced at many topics, serving for declamation; but generally touching only their surface, no answer is necessary. What seemed most to have roused his feelings, was the statement made by Mr. P. relative to the embargo of December, 1807, enacted on the recommendation of Mr. Jefferson, which was demonstrated to be a gross imposture, but which, by the deception practised on the people, induced their acquiescence in the measure for above fourteen months, by which a general stagnation of this commerce was effected, to the ruin of some, to the grievous damage of multitudes, and to the general injury of the country. Mr. P. also stated the great extent of the commerce which might have been enjoyed, notwithstanding the French decrees and the British Orders in Council, if the embargo had not been imposed; and he showed, on the statement and opinions of eminent merchants, whose practical knowledge enabled them to form the most correct judgments, that, but for the embargo, the United States could have continued to carry on a commerce at least as extensive as they would enjoy in a time of peace, when the European nations should carry on their own commerce, and, as usual, monopolize that with their own colonies.*

* In committing the preceding speech of Mr. P. to writing, for the press, the statement and opinions here referred to were overlooked. They were as follows:

If the French decree of Berlin had been resisted, by interdicting the commerce of our citizens with France and her dependencies; or, if our Government had treated that decree with total disregard, and, instead of the embargo, had suffered our merchants to pursue their commerce according to their own practical, and therefore safe, modes; then their trade with the British dominions—of more value to them, all things considered, than any and all other commerce—and with the other parts of the world—the dominions and dependencies of France excepted—would have stood thus, according to the Treasury report for the year preceding the embargo—that is, from September 30, 1806, to September 30, 1807:

FEBRUARY, 1814.

The Loan Bill.

H. OF R.

The gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Eppes,) instead of attempting himself to controvert the facts or arguments of Mr. P.—which indeed no ingenuity can invalidate—prudently resorted to a speech delivered by Mr. Giles in the Senate, in answer to Mr. P. in that body, five years ago, when a proposition for repealing the embargo law brought the same facts and views under examination. And as they were in their nature too stubborn and too clear to be overthrown and changed, they could be met only by confident assertions and ingenious colorings, accompanied by repeated intimations that they were the offspring of Mr. P.'s angry passions. Of this kind were the passages in Mr. Giles's speech, selected and read by the gentleman from Virginia; while any person who should compare those speeches would find one free from passion, and the other marked with resentment, in almost every sentence, relating to Mr. P., and for an obvious reason—his clear and pointed detection of that embargo imposture.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Eppes) attempted to justify the war for "sailors' rights," by a resolution of the Senate on the 14th of April, 1806, relating to impressments and commerce, for which Mr. P. and other Federal members of the Senate had voted. The gentleman first read from the Senate Journal the motion to strike out the following words in the resolution reported: "Demand and insist upon the restoration of the property of their citizens captured and condemned on the pretext of its being employed in a trade with the enemies of Great Britain, prohibited in time of peace; and upon the indemnification of such American citizens, for their losses and damages sustained by those captures and condemnations"—which was determined in the negative, yeas 13, nays 16. Among the negatives are the names of Adams, Bayard, Hillhouse, Pickering, Tracy, White. But the word insist, every one knows, does not mean an irrevocable perseverance in a demand; much less, that, if the opponent refuses to yield what is insisted on, war should be made to enforce it. The two Houses of Congress often insist on their positions or amendments in bills, the consequence of which is a conference, when they generally agree—one or the other House giving way, or taking together some middle ground. But, on further discussion, the word insist was stricken out; and the resolution as adopted by the Senate—23 yeas to 7 nays, (Mr. P. voting for it)—was as follows:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to demand the restoration of the property of their citizens, captured and condemned on the pretext of its being employed in a trade with the enemies of Great Britain, prohibited in time of peace; and the indemnification of such American citizens, for their losses and damages sustained by these captures and condemnations; and to enter into such arrangements with the British Government, on this and all other differences subsisting between the two nations—and particularly respecting the impressment of American seamen—as may be consistent with the honor and interests of the United States, and manifest their earnest desire to obtain for themselves and their citizens, by amicable negotiation, that justice to which they are entitled."

This resolution the gentleman seemed inclined to wield against Mr. P., as if it were the club of Hercules, to lay him prostrate at one blow, while, for the purpose the gentleman had in view, it is but a straw in the hands of—not a Hercules. The resolution amounts to no more than this: The Senate advised Mr. Jefferson to make demands on the British Government, relative to certain questions in dispute between Great Britain and the United States. These, it was known, would be met by opposite demands on the part of that Government; and, in order to settle the points in controversy, Mr. Jefferson was advised to enter into suitable arrangements, and by amicable negotiation to obtain that justice to which we were entitled. And what is there in all this to give the slightest countenance to the violent measures, and war, to which the Government has had recourse? Nothing.

The gentleman from Virginia having entered the lists to vindicate Mr. Jefferson on the subject of the embargo, proceeded to pronounce his eulogy; as though former deeds, however good, (if such had been done,) would sanction or atone for subsequent bad ones. He rested his eulogy on two grounds—one, that "Mr. Jefferson was the first who taught that man was responsible to God alone for his religious opinions!" This assertion will excite surprise, only because it proves the gentleman's total want of information on the subject. To say nothing of what had been written, proving that point, with the force of demonstration, by the great Mr. Locke, half a century before Mr. Jefferson was born, liberty of conscience, or the right of every individual to think for himself in matters of religion had been practically established before our Revolution in all the British dominions, with some civil disabilities, indeed, in the parts of those dominions where a particular form of public worship had been established by law; but, in a more liberal or absolute sense, in several of the colonies, particularly in Pennsylvania, from its first settlement, a hundred and thirty years ago. But, perhaps the gentleman meant to say, that Mr. Jefferson was the first to propose and to procure the adoption of a law in Virginia abolishing every establishment and provision for the support of the public worship of God; followed by the selling even of the glebe or parsonage lands which the early inhabitants had set apart towards the maintenance of the ministers of religion. But Rhode Island also had been at least equally free with Pennsylvania from any religious establishment, from the foundation of the colony, a hundred and seventy or eighty years ago. Mr. P. however is ready to admit,

Domestic exports	$36,103,991
Exports of foreign merchandise first brought into the United States	24,140,495
Making together	$60,250,486
To which add, for specie exported to India and China, as not appearing in the Treasury reports, estimated at	6,000,000
Making together	$66,250,486
Amounting to more than sixty-six millions of dollars.
What, in time of profound peace, would be the amount of our whole foreign trade, was thus estimated by an eminent merchant, extensively engaged in it:
Domestic exports	$48,699,592
To China and India, in specie	6,000,000
Making together	$54,699,592
Less in peace than was practicable in the war existing at the time the embargo was laid	11,550,594
Making together	$66,250,486

The exports of foreign merchandise, first imported into the United States, would be so trifling, in time of peace, as to be not worth considering, in forming the estimate of our peace trade. An evidence of this, and of the general correctness of the above statements, appears from a view of our trade in the short space of eighteen or twenty months immediately succeeding the Treaty of Amiens, in 1801; during which, the exports from the United States fell from $93,000,512 to $55,800,033—showing a diminution of above thirty-seven millions of dollars:

that Mr. Jefferson may have been the first to teach the doctrine, that it was immaterial to the order of society, whether a man believed in "twenty gods or no god;" "because," says Mr. Jefferson, "it neither picks my pocket nor breaks my leg!"* Of this discovery, Mr. Jefferson will probably continue to enjoy the exclusive honor.†

The other ground of the gentleman's eulogy was, that Mr. Jefferson was "the man who drew the Declaration of Independence." This, among his partisans, has been a constant theme of praise; although the Declaration is little more than a compilation from the most abundant public materials, in which the rights of the Colonies and their violation by the British Government had been often stated by distinguished individuals, by various public bodies, and by the Congresses of 1774 and 1775. But, what lessens still more Mr. Jefferson's share of the work, he had amassed such a redundancy of matter, and in such a form, that when his draught was reported to Congress, they struck out (greatly to his mortification) a third part of it, made various amendments of the remainder, and introduced (what Mr. Jefferson had wholly omitted) an appeal to the Supreme Being, and an acknowledgment of his superintending Providence. Mr. P. speaks positively on this point, because he has seen and compared a copy, in Mr. Jefferson's own handwriting, of his original draught as reported to Congress, with the Declaration as pruned, amended, and adopted by that body. There is one correct and liberal sentiment in the Declaration, to the credit of which Mr. P. believes Mr. Jefferson is entitled; and this is not the less credible, although his subsequent conduct has been so little in unison with it. Having adverted to the address and warnings of Congress to their British brethren on the subject of their grievances, and remarked that "they too had been deaf to the voice of justice and consanguinity," the declaration draws this solemn conclusion: "We must therefore acquiesce in the necessity which denounces our separation, and hold them, as we hold the rest of mankind, enemies in war, in peace friends."

In reference to the attempts to settle our differences with Great Britain, I think it was the gentleman from Virginia who spoke of "the uniform conciliating disposition of this country;" and, mentioning the arrangement made with Mr. Erskine, he asked "if any one would deny it to be sincere?" Mr. P. could answer, not only for himself, but for the great body of Federalists, that, in their opinion, neither that nor any other negotiation with Great Britain has been conducted with sincerity, from 1804 to the declaration of war in 1812. But he will quote an opinion on this point, which ought to be received with peculiar confidence by the friends of the Administration, because it is the opinion of a gentleman, not only of long experience and distinguished discernment in public affairs, but who, it is natural to presume, stands high in the confidence of the present President, by whom he has been selected as one of the Commissioners to negotiate a peace with Great Britain—I mean Mr. Bayard. This gentleman, in a memorable speech in the Senate, five years ago, as addressing the Administration, says: "Your measures have not been impartial as to the belligerents, and your negotiations have not been sincere as to England." Mr. Bayard stated at large the grounds of his opinion; and having mentioned, with regret, the otherwise unaccountable rejection, by Mr. Jefferson, of the treaty concluded with Great Britain, on the 31st of December, 1806, by his own favorite Ministers, Monroe and Pinkney, he adds: "But, in this lies the secret—a secret I will dare to pronounce—Your President never meant to have a treaty with Great Britain. If he had intended it, he would have taken the treaty of the 31st of December, 1806. If he had intended it, he never would have fettered the Commissioners with *sine qua non*s, [indispensable conditions] which were insuperable. It was an invariable article in the instructions, to form no treaty unless the claim to search merchant vessels for deserters was utterly abandoned. This was never expected; and at the arduous crisis [in the affairs of Great Britain] at which it was insisted upon, it was impossible to expect it." To this just conclusion of Mr. Bayard—a conclusion necessarily formed on a full knowledge of the proceedings of the Administration for many years in regard to Great Britain, Mr. P. will add Mr. Jefferson's own explicit acknowledgment to a friend, that he did not desire any treaty with Great Britain. This was about the time, in 1807, when he had peremptorily rejected Monroe and Pinkney's treaty. And he gave as a reason, that a treaty with Great Britain was of little or no consequence, because within a year she would cease to be an independent nation! If such was really his opinion, and so great his ignorance of the power and resources of Great Britain, that in 1807 she could not maintain her independence more than a year, how little is he entitled to the character ascribed to him by his followers, of a well-informed, sagacious, and profound statesman! But during all this time, and indeed throughout his administration, Mr. Jefferson let slip no opportunity of professing his friendly and conciliatory dispositions towards Great Britain. And after he had refused to accept Monroe and Pinkney's treaty, he directed them to renew the negotiations, professing again his "conciliatory sentiments," and "sincere desire that no circumstance whatever might obstruct the prosecution of experiments for putting an end to differences which ought no longer to exist between two nations, having so many motives to establish and cherish mutual friendship."* And two months after this, though determined to decline any arrangement "which did not comprise a provision against impressments from American vessels on the high seas;" yet, "persevering at the same time in his earnest desire to establish the harmony of the two nations, on a proper foundation," he gave instructions to renew the negotiations.†

In the petulant speech of the gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. Fisk,) two things only merit Mr. P.'s notice, and this merely for the purpose of correcting what the gentleman offered as statements of facts. The first, that the number of impressed seamen from Salem alone amounted to one hundred and fifty. The gentleman's statement rests on the information he said he had received. Mr. P. has no hesitation in pronouncing the information utterly unfounded. The whole mass of evidence contained in the depositions which Mr. P. read and referred to, in the course of his speaking, renders the gentleman's information altogether unworthy of credit.

* Mr. Jefferson's Notes on Virginia, answer to query XVII.

† Mr. Locke entertained a different opinion; and it is the more remarkable, as it is expressed in his work on Toleration. He says: "Those are not to be tolerated who deny the being of a God. Promises, covenants, and oaths, which are the bonds of human society, can have no hold upon an atheist. The taking away of God, though but even in thought, dissolves all."

The Loan Bill.

H. OF R.

The other exhibition of a supposed fact, respects the amount of French spoliations—a subject with which the gentleman appears to be wholly unacquainted. Instead of twenty or thirty millions of dollars, he said they amounted only to three millions, and referred to the Louisiana Treaty for the fact. But the gentleman has mistaken the provision in the treaty relating to the purchase of Louisiana, to pay debts due to American merchants, for an indemnity for spoliations on their commerce. The Secretary of State, (Mr. Monroe,) in his correspondence with the British Minister, (Mr. Foster,) having strangely committed the like mistake, it becomes the more necessary to give a statement of the real facts.

In a preceding note (4) the French spoliations prior to the treaty of September 30, 1800, are, on the best attainable grounds, estimated at twenty millions of dollars. These were by that treaty wholly abandoned by the United States, for the reasons given in that note. But the French Government itself was indebted to the American merchants, for supplies of provisions and other articles to a large amount, and for injuries to their vessels and other property in the ports of France, long detained by a wanton embargo. And as a small number of vessels were captured during our naval hostilities with France—which of course would be considered prizes of war, but which at the date of the above mentioned treaty were not definitively condemned—these, agreeably to the fourth article, were to be restored or paid for. By the fifth article of that treaty, France stipulated to pay the debts above-mentioned. They remained unpaid, however, until provision was made for them in the Louisiana Treaty, concluded the 30th April, 1818. The purchase of that province, every one knows, cost the United States fifteen millions of dollars. The probability is, that it might have been purchased for ten millions, and that the five millions more were added to make provision for the payment of the debts due from the French Government to the American merchants. And yet, only three millions and three-quarters of dollars were reserved of the purchase-money to discharge those debts. It had been better, therefore, if the United States had undertaken to pay them, especially as the French board and other officers, in the end, fleeced the American merchants whose claims were admitted of one-fifth or one-fourth of their dues, and choused others out of their whole debts.

To ascertain what claims of debts due to American citizens were just, and comprehended in the provision of the treaty, a board, consisting of three Americans, was constituted by the American Minister in Paris, (the late Chancellor Livingston,) to examine and certify them. Some boards of French officers were also authorized to intermeddle in their examination. This was necessary, and unquestionably designed, as by the provisions of the 10th article of the treaty, to render practicable, a vast project of swindling. For the three millions and three-quarters of dollars, were intended solely and exclusively to discharge those debts: the French Government could not make, nor did make, any pretensions to any portion of that sum. This was expressly avowed by the French Minister Marbois. Nevertheless, under the pretence of preventing the admission of improper, unjust, or exorbitant claims, or the rejection of valid claims, the French bureaux, or board of officers, were authorized to interpose their opinions; and the final report of the American and French examiners was to be sent to the Minister of the French Treasury, “on whose report the French Government should decide definitively in every case.” This provision of the treaty placed the American claimants at the mercy of the officers of the French Government. The consequence was, that to insure the allowance of an honest claim, the agents for the American creditors were obliged to sacrifice one-fifth or one-fourth of it, by way of douceur or bribe, to the French officers. This course of corrupt proceeding was stated to me a few years ago, at one of the public offices in this city, in such manner as to preclude all doubt of the fact. Moreover, the rejection of honest claims (as where the agents of the claimants had not been instructed, and did not feel themselves at liberty, to sacrifice in bribes, any, and especially such large proportions of the whole debts,) made room for the admission of dishonest and exorbitant claims, of which the agents, or dishonest claimants, would, of course, not hesitate to give one-half to obtain for themselves the other half.

Thus, it appears, that the Louisiana treaty had no relation to French spoliations, as the gentleman from Vermont supposed. How it happened that Mr. Monroe should commit the same mistake, is not a little surprising, seeing he was associated with Mr. Livingston in negotiating and concluding that treaty. In his correspondence with Mr. Foster in the year 1811, in which he undertakes to justify our Government for taking possession of the Spanish province of West Florida, he talks of a long catalogue of injuries received by the United States from Spain, but mentions only two; one, the spoliations committed on our commerce, (after Spain became the ally of France, and which has already been fully explained,) and the other, the suppression or interruption of the right of deposit at New Orleans, (which, also, has before been explained.) “For neither of which injuries,” said Mr. Monroe, “has any reparation or atonement been made. For injuries like those of the first class [spoliations] it is known to you that Great Britain and France made indemnity.” The assertion is true as to Great Britain; but wholly unfounded as to France, for whose spoliations, amounting to fifty millions of dollars, no reparation has ever been made.

Having been led to notice the conduct of our Government towards Spain, particularly in relation to the Floridas; and, in doing this, to have recourse to the correspondence between the Secretary of State (Mr. Monroe) and Mr. Foster, (the British Minister,) Mr. P. ought not to omit the following part of that correspondence. Mr. Foster, in his letter of September 5, 1811, having mentioned the proceedings of General Matthews in East Florida, where, as Mr. Foster was informed, he was “taking steps to subvert the Spanish authority,” and “by bribery, and every art of seduction, endeavoring to infuse a spirit of rebellion into the subjects of the King of Spain in that quarter,” he then requests Mr. Monroe to inform him “upon what authority he (Matthews) was acting, and what measures had been taken to put a stop to his proceedings. To this letter Mr. Monroe delays an answer until November 2, almost two months, and then fills several pages about and about East Florida, and the claims of the United States against Spain, but most carefully avoids saying one word in answer to Mr. Foster’s request for information relative to the doings of General Matthews; which studied omission amounts to a confession (of what, indeed, no man of common sense and information can doubt) that General Mat-threws was employed by President Madison, by intrigues, by bribery, and by force, to seduce the Spanish subjects from their allegiance. And yet Mr. Madison, the political head of the American nation, was the person who, in a public Message to Congress, could affect to be so deeply wounded in his moral feelings by the conduct of the Governor of a British province, (which Mr. Madison represented as an act of the British Government) in employing the infamous John Henry to intrigue with the citizens of Boston for some purpose favorable to Great Britain. Mr. Madison, too, had the assurance to speak, in that Message, in a language importing that Henry had actually intrigued with citizens of Boston, when, by his own statement, it appeared that he had not opened his lips to any one of them on the subject of his mission. That whole transaction is stamped with deceit and baseness. Mr. Madison, or (which is the same thing) the Secretary of State, receives a letter from Henry, appearing on the face of it to be from Philadelphia, containing the disclosure of the real or pretended plot; yet bearing date a number of days after Henry had been at Washington, and actually received fifty thousand dollars as a reward for his disclosure!

A very few things in the speech of another gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Nelson) require to be noticed by Mr. P.

In exposing Mr. Jefferson's embargo imposture, Mr. P. mentioned the safe and extensive commerce that our merchants might have continued to carry on, notwithstanding the French decrees and the British Orders in Council, if that embargo had not locked up our vessels in our harbors. In opposition to this, the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Nelson) asserted that nine vessels out of ten, that went to sea about the time that the embargo was laid, were swept from the ocean. The gentleman has relied, not upon his own knowledge of the fact, but on the partial and imperfect statement of some other person. If the vessels referred to were destined to the ports of France and her allies, it is not improbable that the greater part were taken by British cruisers, under the Orders in Council. But no prudent merchant would, after notice of those Orders, attempt to send his vessels to France; the risk, from the great number of British cruisers on the seas, being equal, perhaps, to eighty or ninety per cent. And it merits particular notice that, while French decrees have been made to operate instantly, and some retroactively, against neutral vessels, the British Orders in Council, of November 11, 1807, were stayed in their execution, for a reasonable time; for notice of them to reach different places, proportioned to their distances from England, before such vessels should be liable to condemnation. Such as commenced their voyages before notice of the Orders reached the places of their departure, were to be warned, if met by British cruisers, not to proceed to the ports of France or her allies; and were not to be captured, unless found proceeding afterwards contrary to such notice. And by another Order in Council, of November 25, 1807, the times for gaining notice of the Orders of the 11th, were precisely fixed, in the United States, to the 20th of January following: that is, seventy days were allowed for that purpose; so that American vessels sailing from American ports, prior to the 20th of January, 1808, were not liable to capture under the Orders of November 11, although destined to ports of France, or other enemies of Great Britain.

And to see how little danger attended American vessels going to any other countries, we need only resort to a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, of the number of our merchant vessels which, during Mr. Jefferson's embargo, were permitted to sail, with the real design, or under the plausible pretext, of bringing home American property, remaining in foreign countries, at the time that the embargo was laid. The whole number so permitted to sail was five hundred and ninety-four, nearly all of which returned in safety. Thirteen only were lost by all casualties; and of those thirteen, seven were captured by our own cruisers. Hence, it appears that the whole risk of those five hundred and ninety-four vessels was little more than a sea risk in time of peace.

The gentleman said "he knew the hostility of England to free Governments." It is really astonishing that gentlemen, who are the descendants of Englishmen in this country and whose best birth-rights are the same liberties that Englishmen enjoy, should entertain the preposterous idea, that England is the enemy to free Governments, when her's and our's are the only free Governments on earth—it is most astonishing, when such erroneous notions are broached by gentlemen of the profession of the law, whose studies lead them to acquire a correct knowledge of the English constitution, and of the liberties of Englishmen. Can they name a single liberty which citizens of the United States enjoy, that is not also enjoyed by Englishmen? Both have the same common law, the same security for life, liberty, and property, in the trial by jury; the same writ of habeas corpus to rescue from the hands of great or little tyrants the bodies of persons arrested or imprisoned contrary to law; and the same right of exemption from taxes, unless granted by themselves or their representatives. And surely every gentleman of the law will admit, that in no country on the globe is justice administered with greater ability and purity than in England.

But the people have it continually rung in their ears, that England is a monarchy, and the United States a republic; and they are deceived into the opinion, that monarchy is but another word for despotism, where all the subjects are slaves; and that republic means liberty, where all the subjects or citizens are free. The truth is, both countries, in respect to the forms of Government, are monarchies, and both, at the same time, republics. The English monarch, or chief magistrate, is called King; the American monarch, or chief magistrate, is called President. The powers of the King and President are somewhat different. One, by himself or his Ministers, appoints to the multitude of offices, civil and military, in the kingdom; the other nominates to all offices, civil and military, and, with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoints; but the President can remove all officers at his pleasure, except the Judges; but neither can the King of England remove the Judges. In both countries they hold their offices during good behaviour. In the United States, the power of appointing to some offices is vested in the heads of departments, as in the Post Office; but if the Postmaster General appoints a deputy whom the President, or his supporters, whether blinded by passion or interest, or influenced by party views, disapprove, the President removes the principal. This has recently been exemplified in the case of the Postmaster General, Mr. Granger. The King of England may declare war, as well as make peace; but he will do neither without the advice of his Cabinet Ministers and Council, and these will seldom dare advise either but in conformity with the apparent opinions and wishes of a majority of the people. The President can, indeed, only recommend a war—the assent of Congress is indispensable to its declaration. But the influence of the immense number of offices in the President's gift, and especially the force of party, of which he is head, will generally enable him to carry any point he wishes, almost with certainty, where party views and interests coincide with the measure, or the man, bearing the President's recommendation.

The chief magistrate of England becomes such by birth or descent; whence it may happen, that a child, or person insane, may be the King; but they know and apply the proper remedy—a regency, by one or more competent man or men.

But the President is a chief magistrate of our own choice! This is true in theory, and false in fact. Mr. Madison has been twice imposed on the people for their President, by a caucus composed of members of Congress, although, by the Constitution, members of Congress are forbidden to be electors of the President. The American monarch, too, is but the chief of a party, while the monarch of England is the chief of the whole nation.

The Senators of England (called the Lords) inherit their titles and places, the Senators of the United States are elected for six years by the respective State Legislatures.

In both countries, the members of the Commons or House of Representatives, are chosen by the people. In England, it is said there is corruption in the elections; and is there none in the United States? In England, the electors are treated with beer; in America, with whiskey. In England, it is said money is used to corrupt the electors; in America, the multitudes of offices in the President-monarch's gift, by being conferred exclusively (a few military offices in the present desperate war excepted) on one political sect, become bribes in his hands, to retain his present adherents, and gain proselytes from the ranks of his opponents, in which there are some men too feeble in mind, or too unstable in principle, to resist the lure of office.

In this sketch of the Governments of England and the United States, Mr. P. has aimed at a simple representation of what exists in fact and practice. He offers no inferences—discerning readers will make their own. That both are monarchies, the one elective, the other hereditary, or both republics, is unquestionably true. But whatever they may be called, that they are substantially the same, Mr. P. will need quote but one authority, which must be decisive with all true Democratic Republicans; for it is the authority of Mr. Jefferson himself. In his famous letter to his friend Mazzei, he says of the Federalists, who framed and adopted the present Constitution of the United States: "their avowed object is to impose on us the substance, as they have already given us the form of the British Government."

But, notwithstanding this affected abhorrence by Mr. Jefferson, of this anglo-monarchical Constitution of the United States, perhaps scarcely any ambitious intriguer for a throne ever strove more industriously, and by various means to acquire it, than did Mr. Jefferson to obtain the Presidency of the United States. And being thus seated in the great chair of State, he never attempted (at least I have never heard of an attempt) to change the Constitution to one which should, in his view, be more truly republican. The only change made in it, during his Administration, was a mischievous one; and its object was to secure his own re-election, without the hazard of a competition like that which happened in his first election. One of the strong objections to this change was, that it would naturally lead to the choice of a weak and incompetent person for the Vice President; an officer who ought always to possess the eminent talents and virtues fitting a man to the office of President; because, upon the President's death, inability, or removal, the duties of his office devolved on the Vice President. And for this the Constitution, as originally established, had made the proper provision.

The gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Nelson,) with other gentlemen on the same side of the House, complain of every statement or remark importing any influence of France in the measures of our Government; and yet seem not unwilling to have it thought that British influence prevails on the other side of the House. Mr. P., and his friends, make no charges of French influence against any honorable man. They only state facts and circumstances, and if from a view of these there appears to have been a concert and correspondence of measures and views of our own Government with those of France, whether the cause be ascribed to French influence, or French attachment, on one hand, and inveterate, unrelenting hatred to England on the other, hitherto prompting the wish for success to the arms of France, whose despotic ruler had destroyed the independence of many States, and was hastening to subjugate the rest, while, with equal ardor, they anxiously wished for the overthrow of England, whose downfall must necessarily have been followed by our own; to whatever cause the actual coincidence of American and French measures is to be ascribed, such is unquestionably the fact. The best interests of the United States have been sacrificed, and their safety and independence hazarded, to further the views and increase the destroying power of France, to whose tyrant nothing was wanting but the subjugation of England, to make him master of the world. And for that subjugation all the genuine disciples of Mr. Jefferson, and his successor, Mr. Madison, and the constant and zealous supporters of their measures, must have ardently wished; for, certainly, their measures were calculated to produce that result. Who has forgotten the impious wish of a member from South Carolina, (David R. Williams,) expressed some four years ago, on the floor of the House of Representatives? "that could he command the red artillery of Heaven, he would drive the fast-anchored Isle from her moorings." Meaning, that he would make a wreck of the Island of Great Britain, or sink it in the sea. Mr. P. is aware of a secret motive, of a most powerful influence, for keeping alive and strengthening the popular passions relative to France and England: it was very much by cherishing those opposite passions, (love to France, and hatred to England,) that the present ruling party rose to power; and to preserve it in the same hands, the force of those passions must not be suffered to abate, much less to change; for, with that change, political power, in the National Government, would forthwith be transferred to other hands. And the like change would take place in the administration of the governments of those States which remain under the influence of the popular delusion. The propagation of this delusion was successfully carried on, even during the Administration of WASHINGTON; for, though none had the hardihood to charge him as a friend to monarchy and aristocracy, the slander was industriously spread, and continually repeated, that his principal followers and supporters were all monarchists and aristocrats;—while Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison, forsooth, were Republicans, true patriots, men of virtue and integrity, and withal very great statesmen! It was this erroneous opinion of these two citizens on which the popular delusion was bottomed, and is still maintained—connected with the popular feelings, (excited in our Revolutionary war,) in favor of France, and in opposition to England; and until the popular opinion of those two men be exactly reversed, by a disclosure of their true characters, the popular delusion will probably continue.

Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, replied to a part of Mr. PICKERING's speech, and gave his decided support to the bill under discussion. He spoke till the usual hour of adjournment, without having concluded his remarks on the subject; when the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, March 1.

Mr. MURFREE presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of North Carolina, praying the aid of Congress in opening an inland water communication from the Chesapeake Bay to St. Mary's river, in Georgia.—Referred to Mr. MURFREE, Mr. STOCKTON, Mr. INGERSOLL, Mr. CALHOUN, and Mr. TAYLOR.

Mr. MACON presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the State of North Carolina, to the same effect with the above.—Referred to the same committee.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported the bill from the Senate "to incorporate a Fire Insurance Company in the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia," with amendments; which were twice read and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. MCKEE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill concerning Shawanoe town; which was read twice and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. INGERSOLL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the resolution from the Senate "authorizing the transmission of the public journals and documents printed by order of the Senate and House of Representatives, to each of the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States," with an amendment; which was twice read, and ordered to be engrossed, and the resolution read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. CHAPPELL, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Mary Cheever; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. TROUP, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the more effectual defence of the Northwestern frontier, by granting donations of land to actual settlers; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

Mr. DESHA, of Kentucky, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of J. J. Cunow on behalf of the Unitas Fratrum, made an unfavorable report on the same, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. INGERSOLL, of Pennsylvania, from the Judiciary Committee, reported unfavorably on the resolution ordering an inquiry into the expediency of removing the seat of Government of Missouri; which was concurred in by the House.

JUDICIAL SYSTEM.

Mr. INGERSOLL reported a bill farther to amend the Judicial System of the United States; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next. The bill is as follows:

A bill further to amend the Judicial System of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the circuit court of the United States shall have original cognizance of all actions, suits, controversies, matters and things, of whatsoever nature, which are cognizable by the judicial authority of the United States under the Constitution, saving only such cases where exclusive original jurisdiction is by the Constitution given to the supreme court or by statute to the district court.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That where any action or suit, at common law or in equity, shall be brought in any State court concerning any matters or things, or between parties whereof the judicial authority of the United States hath cognizance by the Constitution, and the final judgment or decree in such action or suit shall be against the party defendant, in the highest court of law or equity in such State, a writ of error or appeal, as the case may require, shall lie in favor of the party defendant, to the supreme court of the United States, who may thereupon re-examine and reverse or affirm such final judgment or decree, and further adjudge therein in the same manner as the causes coming from the circuit courts of the United States by writ of error or appeal; and where their judgments are final in such action or suit may proceed to execute the same accordingly.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the supreme court of the United States shall have appellate jurisdiction from all judgments and decrees of the circuit courts of the United States, in civil actions or suits where the matter in dispute exceeds the sum or value of two thousand dollars exclusive of costs, whether the same actions or suits were originally brought in such circuit courts or were removed there by writs of error or appeal from the district courts.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That in all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, including causes of prize, the forms of process, and the taking of evidence, and all other proceeding, shall be according to the course and practice of admiralty and prize courts, as contra-distinguished from courts of common law: Provided however, That the several courts of the United States shall continue to have full power to alter, amend, and regulate the same. And upon appeals to the supreme court no new evidence shall be admitted in such causes, saving and excepting where said court in prize causes shall, according to usage, direct further proof.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That in all causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction the respective judges of the courts of the United States, before whom any such causes are depending, may in vacation, as well before as after the return term thereof, make all interlocutory orders as to filing claims, stipulations, appraisements, and delivery of property on bail, and other proceedings preparatory to the final hearing of the same causes, in as full and ample a manner, and with the same effect as if the same were had, done, or transacted in term; and in like manner in causes at common law and in equity depending in their courts, the respective judges of the courts of the United States may, in vacation, and as well before as after the return term, make any interlocutory orders as to the process, bail, pleadings, and other matters and things preparatory to the final hearing of such causes, according to the practice and usage of courts of common law and equity, in as full and ample a manner, and with the same effect, as if the same were had, done, and transacted in term.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the several courts of the United States, (in term,) or any judge thereof, in vacation, shall have full power to grant writs of habeas corpus in all cases warranted by the usages of law and cognizable by the judicial authority of the United States: Provided however, That in no case shall the party be discharged upon any such writ by said court, or by any judge thereof, where he shall be in custody under the process of any court or State magistrate, and shall not be exempted from arrest or confinement thereon by the laws of the United States.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That wherever any seizures shall be made by any officer of the United States, under color of his office, the validity and legality of such seizure shall be exclusively examinable and determinable in the proper court of the United States having cognizance thereof. And the party or parties aggrieved thereby, may and shall have full remedy in such courts for all damages sustained by such services, whenever the same shall be without reasonable cause.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That wherever, in cases cognizable by the courts of the United States, the parties defendant in any suit, action, libel, or bill in equity, are citizens of, or resident in, different States, such suit, action, libel, or bill, may be brought in any district where either of the parties defendant dwelleth or hath his home; and the proper process may be served upon all the other parties wheresoever they dwell or may be found.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That juries, to serve in the courts of the United States, shall be designated by lot, or otherwise, in each State or district respectively, according to the mode presented by the laws of the State, for the time being, for forming juries to serve in the highest courts of law of each State, so far as such laws shall render such designation practicable by the courts or other proper officers of the United States. And the judges of the courts of the United States may in vacation order a return of juries from time to time from such parts of the State or district as they shall in their discretion deem meet, in the same manner as they are now authorized to do by law in term.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the respective judges of the courts of the United States and other magistrates having competent authority in this behalf, on all complaints for crimes against the United States pending before them, upon which the defendant or defendants may be imprisoned, or bailed for trial before the proper court of the United States, may, in their discretion, require from any witness in behalf of the United States, on pain of imprisonment, a reasonable recognizance, with surety or sureties for the appearance of such witness to give testimony before such judge or magistrate, where, from the circumstances of the case, or otherwise, it shall appear to the court that the testimony of such witness may otherwise be lost.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the circuit courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction over all common law and admiralty and maritime crimes and offences, which, under the Constitution, are cognizable by the judicial power of the United States; and on conviction thereof may, where no other punishment is prescribed by law, punish the same by fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, and imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by either fine or imprisonment, according to the nature and aggravation of the crime or offence.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That if any suit shall be commenced in the State court, in any case to which the judicial power of the United States does by the Constitution extend, and the party or parties or defendant in any such suit shall, at any time before issue joined in such State court, file a petition supported as to the facts by his or their affidavits, if the court require it, for the removal of the cause for trial into the next circuit court to be held in the district where the suit is pending, or, if the district of Maine or Louisiana, to the district court next to be holden therein, and offer good and sufficient surety for his or their entering in such court, on the first day of its session, copies of said process against him or them; and also for his or their appearing and entering in such court special bail in the cause, if special bail were requisite therein, it shall be the duty of the State court to accept the surety and proceed no further in the cause; and any bail that may originally have been taken shall be discharged, and the said copies being entered as aforesaid in such court of the United States, the cause shall there proceed in the same manner as if it had been brought there by original process. And any attachment of the goods or estate of the party or parties defendant by the original process, shall hold the goods or estate so attached, to answer the final judgment in the same manner as by the laws of the State they would have been holden to answer final judgment, had it been rendered by the court in which such suit commenced. And if the party or parties defendant, so removing such suit aforesaid, shall not, at the trial thereof in such court of the United States, prove that such suit is a case to which the judicial power of the United States does by the Constitution extend, he or they shall not be permitted to avail himself or themselves of any other legal defence at such trial, and judgment shall be rendered against him or them in due form of law. And in all suits so removed as aforesaid, the circuit court shall, after final judgment, proceed to execute the same according to law.

THE LOAN BILL.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the Loan bill.

MR. PICKERING, of Massachusetts, by permission of Mr. LOWNDES, who was entitled to the floor, made a few remarks in addition to, and explanatory of, some parts of his speech yesterday.

MR. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, then resumed the floor, and concluded in an hour and an half the speech which he commenced yesterday, in favor of the bill; during which he replied to various doctrines advanced by gentlemen in the Opposition.

Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, next took the floor, and in a speech of more than an hour, replied to the arguments of the Opposition.

Mr. PITKIN, of Connecticut, spoke about an half an hour in explanation of his former speech.

When he concluded, the bill under debate was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 2.

Mr. LATTIMORE, from the committee appointed on the 12th ultimo, reported a bill further to extend the right of suffrage, and to increase the number of members of the Legislative Council in the Mississippi Territory; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

An engrossed bill concerning Shawanoe town, was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Edwin T. Satterwhite, late purser to the brig Hornet, was read a third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate for the better organizing, paying and supplying the Army of the United States" was twice read, and committed to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill from the Senate for the indemnification of certain claimants of public lands in the Mississippi Territory, was read and ordered to lie on the table.

PROPOSED SUSPENSION OF EMBARGO.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, rose to submit a motion for consideration. He said, feeling, as he did, a perfect confidence in the sincerity of the Administration to effect by negotiation at Gottenburg an honorable peace, and knowing, as he did, that the President had perfect confidence in the Prince Regent in his own proposition to meet at Gottenburg, to settle by negotiation the unhappy differences that subsist between the two nations upon the principles of the laws of nations and the maritime rights of Great Britain; and from the policy of this Government, tested by their proposition through Mr. Russell, after the war, upon an agreement to negotiate, on certain conditions, to agree to an armistice; and from the proposition of the British Government, through Admiral Warren, on our agreement to negotiate, on certain terms, to agree, also, to an armistice; he thought he was justified, from the conduct of both Governments, in the belief that an armistice will be agreed to on the commencement of the negotiations at Gottenburg, as the practice of all nations, as well as the two Powers now negotiating, evinced this to be the common usage of nations. It is certainly, said he, one of the first dictates of humanity to spare the effusion of human blood; and, during pending negotiations, believed to be entered into with sincerity and good faith, it would seem to me to be a measure of primary importance to heal asperities, and then lead to a happy termination of the negotiation.

If then, sir, the sword shall be sheathed during the negotiation, by an armistice—that sword that can only wound the enemy—I ask if the two-edged sword, the embargo, ought not, during the negotiation, also to be sheathed—that which cuts both friends and foes? and whether it is not our duty to test our devotion to our constituents, and relieve them from all pressure that may not be absolutely necessary? Their patriotic submission to it while absolutely necessary to press the enemy entitles them to its removal, while the prospect of peace induces a hope that it may not be necessary as a weapon against the enemy.

Having myself advocated the embargo in the Summer session, and the present embargo, and there being no power to suspend it at this time but by an act of the Legislature, I have thought it my duty to submit the following resolution; but I feel it my duty to the Administration to declare that it is without their concert and without their knowledge:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of suspending the embargo law during the impending negotiation for peace.

Mr. WRIGHT appeared to be inclined to let his motion lie on the table for the present; but

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, said he conceived it was highly proper that the fate of a proposition of this character should be at once known, and, therefore, moved that the House now proceed to consider the resolution.

Mr. SEYBERT, of Pennsylvania, having required the yeas and nays on the question of consideration, which by the rules of the House is not to be debated, it was decided in the negative—yeas 65, nays 68, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bayly of Virginia, Bigelow, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brigham, Caperton, Cilley, Cooper, Cox, Culpeper, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Dewey, Duvall, Ely, Gaston, Geddes, Goldsborough, Grosvenor, Hale, Hopkins of New York, Howell, Hufty, Hungerford, Kent of New York, Kent of Maryland, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Macon, Markell, McKee, Miller, Moseley, Oakley, Pickering, Pitkin, Post, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Richardson, Ridgely, Robertson, Ruggles, Sherwood, Shepherd, Smith of New York, Stanford, Stockton, Stuart, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, Winter, Wood, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Alston, Avery, Bard, Barnett, Beall, Bowen, Bradley, Brown, Burwell, Butler, Caldwell, Calhoun, Chappell, Comstock, Conard, Creighton, Cuthbert, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Earle, Eppes, Farrow, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Griffin, Grundy, Hall, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irwin, Jackson of Virginia, Kennedy, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of North Carolina, Leferts, Lyle, McCoy, McLean, Moore, Murfree, Newton, Ormsby, Parker, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Sevier, Seybert, Skinner, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Tannehill, Telfair, Troup, Udree, Ward of New Jersey, Whitehill, Williams, and Yancey.

So the House refused to consider the said resolution.

The Loan Bill—Remission of Forfeitures.

H. OF R.

THE LOAN BILL.

The engrossed bill authorizing a loan of twenty-five millions of dollars was read a third time; and on the question "Shall this bill pass?"

Mr. STANFORD, of North Carolina, opposed the bill in a speech of considerable length; and

Mr. FISK, of Vermont, spoke also at considerable length in support of it.

A motion for the previous question was lost by a small majority.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, rose to speak in favor of the bill; but had spoken but a few minutes, when, on giving way for the purpose, the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 3.

Mr. EPPEL laid before the House two letters addressed by the Secretary of War to the Committee of Ways and Means, upon the subject of the number of militia employed in the actual service of the United States during the year 1813, and of the strength of the Army of the United States.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill establishing the Bank of the Metropolis; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McKEE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of persons who, by mistake, have made wrong entries on public lands; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. ARCHER, the Committee of Claims were discharged from the consideration of the petitions of sundry inhabitants of that part of the State of Ohio which borders on Lake Erie, presented on the 10th and 24th ultimo, and of the resolution of the Legislature of Ohio, presented on the 25th ultimo; and they were referred to the committee for revising the militia laws.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "for the relief of James Crawford," with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

REMISSION OF FORFEITURE.

Mr. IRVING, from the committee appointed on the petition of George Walkington, made a report thereon; which was read, as follows:

That they have had the same under consideration, and find, by the statement of the petitioner, supported by other respectable vouchers, that, in the year 1808, being a mariner, out of employ, on account of the embargo, he was engaged by a Mr. George M. Woolsey, at that time a respectable merchant in the city of New York, to take charge of the ship Halcyon, to clear her out from the port of said city, and to carry her to the port of Jersey, on the opposite side of the Hudson river.

That shortly after he carried the said ship to Jersey, a captain was placed on board of her, and the petitioner discharged, receiving as a compensation for his services for the time he had charge of her, ten dollars. That, when he cleared the said ship out from the port of New York, he signed certain papers at the custom house which, as he had never cleared a ship out before, he supposed to be mere papers relating to her clearance. That, in the year 1810, he was arrested, at the suit of the United States, on a bond for $57,000, which, to his surprise, he then learned was an instrument he unwittingly signed at the time of the said clearance. That, being friendless, and not able to procure surety for such an amount, he was placed in prison, and remained there for ten months, when, by the commiseration of the collector of the port of New York and the attorney for the district, who joined in a petition with him to the Secretary of the Treasury, the penal bond was reduced to $800, for which he gave bail, and then applied himself to his avocation, in the hope of making sufficient to meet the bond. That, while thus in the prosecution of his calling as a mariner, he was taken at the commencement of the present war with Great Britain, was carried into Gibraltar, where his cargo and all his little property was condemned, and himself detained a prisoner of war eleven months. That being at length exchanged, he returned in a cartel from London to the United States, and on arriving in the city of New York, he found judgment entered against him on the penal bond, and was surrendered to prison by his bail. That he is now peniless, in object want, and has a wife and two small children, who are likewise, through his imprisonment, involved in the same state of penury and suffering.

From the testimony of others in behalf of the character and circumstances of the petitioner, the committee are of opinion that his situation is as deplorable as he represents, and that he has been an unsuspecting dupe; especially so, when they take into consideration the smallness of the sum, ten dollars, which was all that he received for his services on board of the said vessel; which he states to have been at the rate of two dollars per day, the wages usually allowed in the port of New York to those who are employed as ship keepers.

The committee are convinced that a man of the character the petitioner is represented to have possessed, would hardly have rendered himself liable to the consequences which have overtaken him for so paltry a sum. If, however, he should have been guilty, they are of opinion that the law has been fully satisfied for his offence, in his imprisonment for sixteen months, and his having been reduced to his present state of absolute wretchedness and want.

They therefore beg leave to report a bill for his relief.

Mr. IRVING then reported a bill for the relief of George Walkington; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

THE LOAN.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business, viz: the bill authorizing a Loan.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, redeemed the pledge he had yesterday given, by a speech in support of the bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, followed in opposition to it, and in vindication and support of his first speech on this subject.

During Mr. GROSVENOR's speech, considerable irritation was caused in the House by what the SPEAKER deemed the personality of his remarks, and for which he was called to order by the Chair, and made the required explanation.

When he sat down, several gentlemen rose to speak.

H. OF R.

The Loan Bill.

MARCH, 1814.

Mr. MACON, of North Carolina, said his anxiety for the question, and for an early adjournment of Congress, would have induced him to remain in his seat, but that it was now near four o'clock, and he did not expect that any vote would be taken to-day, except the one on the passage of the bill, and he would not delay that but for a short time; he would, therefore, express his opinion in as few words as he could on some of the topics which had been brought into the debate.

It has, Mr. Speaker, been more than once hinted or insinuated that the Southern States are unfriendly to New England. These hints and insinuations are founded in error. No fact had been stated, nor in his opinion could one be stated, which would justify the remarks he had frequently heard made on this subject. Such remarks produce no effect in the Southern States, because the people there know there is no foundation for them, and it is possible they were not intended for that part of the nation; indeed it seems impossible, unfounded as they are, that they should produce any in any part of the country. The fact, if true, could be easily ascertained by almost any person living in New England, because every year people emigrate from there to the Southern States, and the emigrants could surely furnish the proof if it existed. The truth is, the emigrants are there received as brethren of one great family. Besides, it must be known to many gentlemen in the House, that each of the three Southern States have been represented in Congress by a native of New England. Look around this hall, and you will see several Representatives from the Southern States who have been educated there; and the practice is continued of sending young men from the South to the North to be educated, though at this time they have excellent colleges and academies in their own States; and can it be believed that men under such circumstances would send their sons to be educated in a country to which they were so unfriendly as to be almost hostile? Again, it must be known that a great number of gentlemen from the South regularly spend their Summers in New England; and would they go to spend their time and money among a people whom they disliked? If not impossible it is improbable.

It has also been stated in the same indirect way, that the Southern States are unfriendly to commerce. No fact has been stated to support the charge, and it is sincerely believed that one cannot be. Hence this must be met like the other, by an endeavor to demonstrate that this also is founded in error, as in truth it is. The drawback and discriminating duties are proofs that American commerce and navigation are highly favored by law; and the annual reports from the Treasury show that the people of the South are not much engaged in either, and the Journal of this House will show that no Southern member has attempted to get either law repealed. But of what use would their cotton, tobacco, provisions, and lumber be, if they could not be exported? The nation cannot consume them. Of what use would their laborers be, if the products of their labor could neither be consumed in the country nor exported? And while they hold a particular sort of population they will not, I imagine, be either a commercial or navigating people. The reasons for this opinion it is not necessary to state. They will occur to every one. Virginia is an example of its correctness; her natural advantages for commerce and navigation are not surpassed by any part of the country, and we all know that she is not one of the great commercial and navigating States. The Southern people, like all other people, wish to get their produce to market as cheap as they can, and they believe if you suffer any one Power to monopolize the carrying trade, that that Power will extort what price she pleases for carrying; and that if you suffer Great Britain to be the monopolizer, that they will not only in time of peace have to pay her extorted price, but that often in the time of war they will have an extorted war price to pay. In order, therefore, to get their produce carried to market as cheap as possible, they have been willing to encourage a competition. If the people of the Southern States are not friendly to the export and import trade, and the coasting, too, they must be worse than a man, if such a one is in the world, who would cut off his own thumb to pinch the little finger of his neighbor. It had been said that the restrictive system, as it was called, operated harder on New England than on the Southern States. This, I apprehend, was a mistake; it operated on the whole produce of the Southern country, while it only operated to the amount of the freight on those concerned in navigation; so that if the Southern planters could not sell their crops, the New England men engaged in navigation could not get the freight; its operation was rather a postponement of sale and freight than a real loss. But the Southern Republicans have been directly charged with being the inventors of the restrictive system, as it is called. This is another mistake. If gentlemen will examine the documents on the Clerk's table, they will find it first mentioned since the adoption of the Constitution by the then Major (now Major General) Pinckney, when Minister at London. The restrictions, however, of which we have heard so much, certainly grew out of the celebrated Boston memorial. Permit me, sir, here to remark, though it has not much to do with the question, yet quite as much as a great deal you have heard, that I have long thought that the interests of New England and the Southern States are more intimately connected than those of the Middle and the Southern. The Southern are almost entirely concerned in agriculture, and the Eastern are greatly concerned in navigation, hence they are not rivals in any market; and if parties in this country had been formed on local and interested considerations, it is probable they would have been united against the Middle States; but the present parties were formed by putting different constructions on the Constitution of the United States. One word more as to the restrictions. The majority who voted for them undoubtedly did so under a strong conviction that they were promoting the general welfare, and that the state of our foreign affairs absolutely required them. The embargo, every one knows, was the only act among them for which I voted, and that was solely with a view to avoid war; and I now verily believe that an adherence to the first act for a few months longer, would have produced the desired effect. It is possible that the whole of the restrictions may have been wrong, and that it would have been right to let Great Britain go on as she had done, both impressing and plundering; but, if wrong, they were surely not wickedly so, because they operated as equally as any general laws could on the whole community, and the wicked, however willing they might be for others to suffer for the public good, are scarcely ever willing to do so themselves; they are pretty certain, if they have it in their power, to take good care of themselves, and how easy could the majority, if they had acted on wicked principles, have permitted neutrals to carry away the produce of their fields?

Mr. M. said he sincerely lamented that his colleague (Mr. GASTON) should have thought it necessary to have stated the unfortunate situation of their native State; he agreed with his colleague in lamenting that there was a slave in the nation; indeed he should be glad that there was not one of the African race in it; but what had the condition of these people to do with the cause of the war? If it be a reason for not opposing the abominable practice of impressment, will it not be a reason for not opposing any wrong that may be inflicted on the country? And he could not conceive a greater wrong than impressment. But, slave or no slave, he was determined to live and die with her. He would stick to her as well in adversity, if it ever overtook her, as he would in prosperity. No misfortune that could happen to her would induce him to leave her, and he religiously believed that no State in the Union was better governed.

Much has been said about free ships making free goods. The United States have long since given up this point, and cannot now contend for it. But it is surely known to every man the least acquainted with the proceedings of the old Congress, that during the Revolutionary war that House was anxious to have the laws of nations so settled and understood, that free ships should make free goods; and it is believed that the first Administration under the present Constitution was not averse to the principle. The very first treaty made by the United States contains a clause declaring that free ships shall make free goods, contraband of war excepted.

Permit me, sir, to ask the gentlemen from the navigating States, if it is possible that they can believe that Great Britain will ever suffer, if she can prevent it, any nation except herself to be a great commercial and navigating people? If they do, it seems to me that a careful examination of her history from the days of the Stuarts to the present time will convince them that they are greatly mistaken. Some of the many wars which she has been engaged in have been most assuredly carried on to destroy the commerce and navigation of a rival, and this was done at a time when she was not in Europe acknowledged to be the mistress of the ocean; and have not what she calls her maritime rights grown with her maritime power? And now that she has no rival in that kind of power, can it be expected she will suffer one to grow up if she can prevent it? The war in which we are now engaged is to protect our maritime rights. Our growing commerce and navigation had made her jealous of our growing power, and she endeavored by impressment and Orders in Council to destroy both, for she had nearly violated every neutral and maritime right which belongs to us before war was declared; in fact she may be said to have been at war with us while we were at peace with her. But to attempt to conquer Canada in a war carried on for sailors' rights and free trade, (and no words in our language could better define the cause of the war,) is called a new mode of protecting and defending them. It is true that the injuries which have been done to us have been done on the water, and that we undertake, in part, to avenge them on the land, and there is nothing new in this. No matter what the original cause of a war may have been, when two nations are engaged in it, it is the constant practice to strike where the enemy will most severely feel; and nations which have been forced to war, as we have been, have generally been willing to acquire something which might remunerate them at least for the expense they had been compelled to incur, and Canada would reimburse the United States all the expense they may be at—the duties on imports alone would do this. It cannot be forgotten that Great Britain acquired New York from the Dutch in a war not forced upon her, but undertaken to destroy the commerce and navigation of the Dutch. The history of that war ought to convince us that Great Britain is not willing to have a rival of any kind on the ocean; and the last treaty between her and France ought to convince the world that neither of them pay much respect to the rights of other nations.

To the best of my recollection this is the first session of Congress at which the war has been called wicked and unjust; when it was declared, it was only inexpedient; all then seemed to admit that there was just cause for it, and nothing has taken place since which could change its character. The conduct of the enemy at Hampton, and indeed at almost every place where he has had the power, has been such as no civilized man could have expected; but his abominable conduct cannot render the war either wicked or unjust on our part. The most wicked part of the war seems to be the attack on Canada, and a desire as is supposed to attach it to the United States. All the gentlemen who oppose the bill are also opposed to having Canada, though a gentleman from New York (Mr. GROSVENOR) has said that we shall have it some time or other. Is it possible that, when we were British colonies, all the British statesmen, with the great Lord Chatham at their head, were mistaken as to the value and importance of Canada to the then colonies? They considered it of the first consequence, and spared neither men or money to take it. Again, is it possible that all the sages of the Revolution, with General WASHINGTON at their head, were mistaken in their wish to obtain it and attach it to the United States? I ought to have said to admit it into the Union, because the articles of the old Confederation has a clause, expressly declaring that Canada may be admitted into the union of the States. In the first treaty with France provision was made for it, and in the Constitution of the United States there is a clause, which I have always understood was intended to admit it into the Union; the clause does not apply to Territories, because they come into the Union under an ordinance of the old Congress. If these gentlemen are now right in not wishing to have Canada, then all the British statesmen and American Revolutionary patriots were wrong in wanting it; and if it is now wicked to attack it, it was quite as wicked in the Revolutionary war. It was then attacked by men whose purity of heart was never questioned by their countrymen, and by men who lived in the days which tried their souls; and let it be remembered, that the war of the Revolution was defensive, especially by those who talked so much about defensive war; and let it also be remembered by those who have told us that the Canadians were not represented in Parliament, therefore had no hand in injuring us, that they were not then represented in Parliament, and had no hand in opposing the tax on tea; they form a part of the British Empire, and as a part have been attacked. The object of this war and that of the Revolution is the same, though we are not in the same situation with those who concerted that. The object of both is to prevent oppression and to maintain our rights. Will it be believed in this nation that the gallant Montgomery fell in a wicked, unjust attack on Quebec? He lives in the hearts of his countrymen, not for a wicked and unjust attack, but for the brave and faithful discharge of his duty in a most glorious and honorable war. The mentioning his name brings to my recollection the names of Mercer and Gates; could they have heard the doctrine of perpetual allegiance, which has been advocated on this floor, it would, no doubt, have made similar impressions on their minds to those which were made on the mind of the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. FINDLEY.) The first being an Irishman, the second a Scotchman, and the third an Englishman. This doctrine of perpetual allegiance was not I imagine in their day advocated on the floor of Congress. If these men, and many others equally patriotic, were not traitors according to the doctrine we have heard advanced, it must be because rights exist in a civil war, which do not exist in any other; and exactly the reverse is understood to be both the law and the practice of nations. We all wish for peace that may last long; how is such a peace to be obtained? Not by begging, but by manfully maintaining our rights. The acquisition of Canada (pardon me for so saying) and Florida would add much to the probability of a peace being lasting; for while these remain in the possession of any European Government, that Government will most assuredly manage the Indians so as to force an Indian war on us whenever it pleases. The reason is in the nature of the Governments. In Europe there is always secret service money enough to bribe and corrupt whoever will be bribed or corrupted, and with this fund they will manage the Indians. Besides this, in the European Governments there is not the same responsibility in the Executive for the expenditure of public money as in ours; and I hope that ours will never be like theirs in that or in any other respect. It cannot be forgotten that when France owned Canada she so managed the Indians as to have a majority of them on her side whenever she and Great Britain were at war. The cause of her superior management was, that her King was absolute, and could do what he pleased; of course there was no responsibility to the nation for the expenditure of public money; and perhaps not much to him or any one else; certainly much less than there was in Great Britain at that time. And since our independence Great Britain has so managed them, notwithstanding our constant endeavors to civilize them and better their condition, as now to have a majority of them on her side. The cause is the same in her Government. There is less responsibility for public money than in ours; and, besides, she has secret service money, as much as the Minister wishes, and we have none. Our frontier settlements never can be safe, or even comfortable, while any European nation has the management of the Indians; and as long as any of them have Canada or Florida, I have endeavored to show that they will manage them. Let the United States have them, and the Western frontier would not require a cent for protection, and we should save all the expense of naval armaments on the Lakes. How much this might be no man can tell; because no man can tell what force will be sufficient to give us or any other nation the command over them; and we ought to command them for this plain reason: whoever commands them will command the adjoining country.

Some of the gentlemen who oppose the bill, have said they would vote money to defend the soil; that is, they would vote money to defend themselves, but not to defend the poor and almost friendless sailor who carries the produce of the soil to foreign markets, and without whose labor the soil would not be more valuable to us than it is to the savages; and at the same session that they will not vote money to defend him, they vote him thanks and money for his bravery and good conduct in a war which they call wicked and unjust. But they would vote money to defend the soil. I should like to hear from them in what manner they would attempt to defend the Western and Southern frontiers on a plan purely defensive; they could not rely on a few forts and garrisons, because the Indians would steal into the settlements and scalp within sight of the forts. A defensive war to give effectual protection against Indian depredation and murder, would require more men and money than the most active war of invasion. If those who talk so much about defensive war would only take the trouble to inquire of the veteran patriot from Tennessee, who sits before me (Mr. SEVIER,) who has probably been in more battles against the Indians and British than I am years old, he would, I expect, inform them, that experience had taught him that the frontier people could not be defended by forts and garrisons against savage invasion and massacre.

The Loan Bill.

H. of R.

I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. PICKERING,) that wars have been heretofore carried on for property, and will add, that the quasi war with France was for property, and those then in power voted money without any difficulty whatever. But this war differs from all others in this respect, at least, that it is carried on for the rights of the poor and not for the property of the rich; and this is the only country in the world where the rich and the poor are really equal, and where the poor have as much power as the rich; in all others the poor are almost friendless and without any share in the Government. This war is not for property. Therefore it is, that those who claim to have the most wealth are not willing to vote money to support a war carried on for the rights of the poor. The rich are not always willing to relieve the poor, or Lazarus would not have remained unfed at the rich man's door, nor would our poor sailors have wanted the protection of their country or the aid of those who had got rich by their voyages; more noise would have been made for the impressment of twenty rich merchants than for the impressment of twenty hundred poor sailors, and in a war to release and protect them the want of money would not have been heard of. The war of the Revolution was to prevent being taxed without our consent, and I should be glad to know, whether there is one man in the nation who had rather be impressed than to pay a trifling tax on tea, imposed without his consent or that of his representatives. Impressment must be also without his consent. That war was to prevent being taxed when Colonies, by the British Parliament, without our consent; and this war is to prevent being taxed now we are independent by the British Government without our consent; for impressment is a tax of the most grievous kind. All taxes must be paid by the produce of labor, but the tax of impressment not only deprives the sailor of the right of laboring himself, but confines him and forces him to fight not the battles of his country, but those of a foreign nation, who taxes him, receives the tax and forces him to fight her battles. In fact impressment is not only a tax, but the most detestable tyranny and oppression that ever was practised by one independent nation over another. Can it be possible, Mr. Speaker, that the men who so gloriously resisted the tax on tea; the men by whose patriotic efforts you now sit in that chair, would, when independent, submit to impressment, nay, that they would have collected documents to prove impressment, a fact known to every man in both nations? What would have been their feelings, when they knew that their countrymen who had been impressed before war was declared, had, after it was declared, been ignominiously flogged for refusing to do duty; that is, to fight against their own country? Would the tax on tea have gone to the hearts of these men, and impressment have been borne by them with patience? Impressment is as much worse than the tax, as freedom is better than impressment.

A complaint has been made, with a very long face, that this war will cost money. The friends of these gentlemen made no such complaint in the quasi war. It is, however, certainly true that it will cost money; so has every war that ever was. And if we determine not to defend our national rights, we shall soon have none to defend. But, sir, had calculations like these we have heard deterred our fathers from carrying on the war in which they were engaged, we should not have been free, nor now debating, in this elegant Hall, whether American sailors should also be free. They wanted both men and money, but they persevered to the end, and obtained that for which they contended—liberty and independence. If we only follow their example we shall establish sailors' rights and free trade.

Much has been said about a national debt. No man dislikes one more than I do. It never was my opinion that a national debt was a national blessing. And I dislike taxes as much as I do a national debt; but I do not dislike them quite as much as I hate impressment; and before I would acknowledge the right of Great Britain to impress American citizens, I would bear as much of both as I could without complaining. I do not pretend to have more feeling on this subject than others have. Every man in the nation can form a correct opinion on the question, by supposing his own son impressed, and treated like others have been. It seems to me that to the parent there could be but little, if any, difference between impressment and death. This war has not been supported by me because a particular man is President, but because I thought we should lose, one by one, all our national rights, unless we defend them, and because I thought the sailors had the same right to protection that other people had. I care but little who is President; all I ask of him is to administer the Executive part of the Government well and economically. No President will ever please all, and he that has faithfully done the best he could for the nation, and is fully satisfied thereof, and has a clear conscience towards his God and neighbor, will probably be the best off, here and hereafter.

But that which seems to astonish those most who oppose the bill, is that the backwoodsmen, who never saw a ship before they came to this city, should undertake to defend sailors' rights. By the Constitution it is as much their duty to defend them as it is the duty of any other part of the nation; but, leaving their Constitutional duty out of the question, nothing is more natural, than that their situation should compel them to feel for the distress of their countrymen in any part of the Union; especially, too, when their distress is produced by the same power which distresses their countrymen. It may be the effect of sympathy, something like this: If you, sir, were travelling, and to call at a house where you were not acquainted with any person who lived in it, and to find the father or mother of the family, or one of the children, dead, you would immediately feel for the distress of the living, and sympathise with them. The case of the backwoodsmen is much stronger than this; because, when they hear of impressment, they immediately think of their relations and neighbors who had been murdered and scalped by the savage foe, the ally of the Power who impresses their countrymen. These backwoodsmen want no defence for the part they have acted. The zeal and ability with which they have defended their national rights, both in this House and the field, want no defence. If a single waggoner, tobacco-roller, or hog-driver, from the middle country, should be scalped on his way to market, that whole country would immediately have feelings similar to those of the Western people and the people of Georgia, and, like them, convince the world that freemen roused are invincible. During the Revolutionary war it was not whispered that the then backwoodsmen had never seen a ship or salt water, or that they did not understand the tax on tea, or the Boston port act; and they certainly understand the cause of this war as well as they did the cause of that; and then their assistance was gladly seized, and their valiant deeds of that day have not been surpassed by those of late. That war, we have been told, was for property. They might then take part without a complaint; but as this is now for poor sailors' rights, they ought not to meddle with it! Many of the men who fought during the Revolution, I imagine, never saw nor tasted tea when the war commenced. I well remember that, in the part of the nation where I live, it was used in but few families, and in some of the few only on Sundays, or on some great occasion; and in that part of the country the people were not plagued with Tories.

Why, at this time, discuss the causes of the war? They have been discussed before; but then there was no negotiation on foot. I most sincerely wish that the negotiation may produce a treaty which shall be satisfactory to every man in the nation. One would naturally have supposed, if we had not seen to the contrary, that the hearts of all men in the country would have been turned at this time to two great points—the happy termination of the war, by the restoration of an honorable peace, or, in case the negotiation failed, to the manner best calculated to carry it on successfully. I repeat, that I wish for peace as much as any man; but rely on it, sir, that no peace can be lasting which shall be obtained by a surrender of our rights. Disgrace the nation by a disgraceful peace, and the peace cannot last, unless the nation cease to respect itself; and a nation that does not respect itself will be treated by other nations rather worse than an individual is treated by society, who does not respect himself. What will be the effect of an honorable or dishonorable peace on the two parties? The question need only to be stated, and the answer is in the mouth of every man. If an honorable peace be made, and the rights we are justly contending for be pursued, the whole world will respect us—even the gentlemen themselves will respect us for not being driven from the line of duty by their own speeches; but if a dishonorable peace be made, and we meanly surrender the just rights of the nation, the whole world will despise us, and we ought to be put down. I will go a step further and say, that I believe if the gentlemen who oppose the war, and every measure connected with it, were now in the majority, that they would not make a disgraceful peace, and thereby surrender the rights we are now contending for, and that the necessary supplies would be furnished to carry the war on; nay, sir, I feel no reluctance in saying, that there are men opposed to me in politics to whom I should not be unwilling to trust the present negotiation, and that, too, without an instruction. I mean not by this to be understood as having objections to the present negotiators. If we could by any means convince Europe that our disputes were only of the family kind, and that any interference of hers would only more closely unite us, I believe we should never again experience much trouble from her. We ought to remember the great interest which the potentates of Europe took in the election of a King of Poland. This fact alone is enough to induce us to believe, that at least Great Britain and France would be willing to meddle in our elections if they could, and no doubt they look on them with some little concern.

We have had this session a subject before the House, the whole history of which I have been very anxious to know, and gave every vote I could to get it—I mean Turreau's letter. If the Administration acted as it ought to have done on receiving it, I should like to know it, and if it did not so act I should like to know it; however, let the history of this letter be what it may, the letter itself proves, like one read sometime past in his place by a gentleman from New York, (Mr. GREGSVENOR,) written by a man who has been accused of more subserviency to France than any other in the nation, that there never was any French influence in the Cabinet; and we have heard more noise about Turreau's letter than about all the wrongs Great Britain has done us—more than about the one hundred and fifty-six American sailors which the gentleman from Massachusetts (Colonel PICKERING) admitted had been impressed. I must here remark, that this number differs very much from every other calculation that I have seen or heard. The letter of Commodore Rodgers, after examining some

The Loan Bill.

H. OF R.

British documents which he found in some vessel he had taken, supposes the number to be much greater than had ever been thought in the United States; and the Secretary of State had reported the number to be more than 6,000, and Lord Castlereagh has acknowledged 1,600 in the British Parliament, and it cannot reasonably be supposed that he would acknowledge more than was right; on the contrary, it would not be unfair to suppose that many had been impressed of which he never heard, because they were impressed in every quarter of the world. This same letter seems to have displeased the gentlemen more than impressment or plundering on the ocean, or robbery, murder, and rape at Hampton. I have now done with this letter, and having at a former session stated my opinion about foreign influence, I will not now repeat it.

If, sir, there be any monarchy-men in the nation, and I hope there are not, (we however know there were some in the time of the Revolution, and I hope they have been convinced of their error and changed their political opinions,) do you not think that they would be pleased to hear arguments which we have heard about disunion and a separation of the States; would they not calculate that disunion and separation would produce disorder and confusion, and that these might provoke the people to think of a King, and the restoration of Charles II.? I cannot bear to think of such a state of things—I will quit the subject.

We have heard much about the rights of a minority. I hope that I understand them, and I never will knowingly violate one of them. I was politically brought up in a minority, and under the most rigid and severe majority that I have ever seen, and I never will imitate the example of those who abridged my rights when in the minority, by abridging the rights of any minority. It is not, however, the right of any minority to violate the laws, nor have the majority any claim on the minority except that they obey the laws. If laws should be passed which are unconstitutional or inexpedient, there are but two ways pointed out in the Constitution to get clear of them, which are, the people at the elections express their opinion, and their representatives carry that opinion into effect, and the courts of law can decide on the Constitutionality of a law when properly brought before them. If it were true, and I am sure it is not, that the Legislature and the Executive had done all the wrongs which have been charged to them, it would not, according to the Constitution, justify any attempt to change the law, only as before stated. The President may be impeached, but that has nothing to do with a violation of the law by any other person.

Admit that the Administration has managed our own affairs as bad as has been stated, (which is not admitted,) can that give Great Britain any right or cause to impress our citizens or to plunder our property? We might complain, and if we thought proper change our rulers; but it is nothing to her how our affairs are managed, nor can improper conduct of any Administration, so far as it concerns ourselves, give cause to any foreign Power to violate the laws of nations against us. I, however, hope that the Administration is able to maintain and defend our rights, provided we furnish the ways and means, but without these it cannot be done, and without them the gentlemen need not dread offensive war either on land or water, though they do not seem to have any objection to the latter, nor can their favorite system of defensive war be carried on, and we must of necessity return to the old plan of begging and soliciting, not now as heretofore for justice, but for mercy; and we have already tried for justice twenty years, and until neither Great Britain nor France would scarcely answer our applications. We have by persevering experience demonstrated to the world, if it never was before demonstrated, that a begging nation cannot maintain her rights nor prevent injustice by begging; we have also demonstrated that if Great Britain and France agreed on nothing else, they agreed to do us all the injury they could. We must depend either on American valor or British magnanimity for the maintenance and support of our national rights, and I am for depending on American valor. Louis XIV of France and the United Provinces have both tried begging, and both begged of Great Britain, and succeeded no better than we have done, and not long since several Powers in Europe tried it with France, but without success.

We have been reminded of the enormous debt of England, and at the same time of her great wealth and resources. In her career of debt I wish not to follow her, nor in the cause which produced a great part of it, which was the taking part in almost every war which has happened in modern Europe, by raising about one-half to fight the other on land, that she might become mistress of the ocean.

The management of the war has been brought before us: I feel no hesitation in stating it as my opinion, that the military operations in the neighborhood of Lake Ontario have not been well managed, but on the lake, Commodore Chauncey did as much as could have been expected from any man; and it is due to his antagonist, though an enemy, to say that he was qualified to command against Chauncey. But in a country like ours, where we keep in time of peace but a small standing army, great success against trained troops ought not to be expected at the first breaking out of the war; and whenever peace shall be established, I hope to see the Army reduced to the old Peace Establishment. When we speak of the attempt to invade Canada, we ought to recollect the Indian war carried on under the Administration of General WASHINGTON, who certainly knew the merits of every Revolutionary officer better than any man in the nation, and who was a complete judge of military men and affairs; yet the first two commanders which he selected were both defeated; and when the third defeated the Indians, they took shelter under a British fort and garrison, which fort had been recently built within the limits of the United States, and thus saved themselves from the pursuit of the victorious troops.

We have been told, again and again, that the loan will not be obtained. It is probable that no man in the House knows that it certainly will; but, having heard the same said last year, and the loan for that year having been made without any difficulty, and on quite as good terms as the $5,000,000 loan made under a Federal Administration, I hope that it will, and that the gentlemen, at the next session of Congress, will find themselves a second time mistaken about the loan. I feel no hesitation in stating it as my opinion, that if it be not obtained, and the reports which we have heard be true, that the people of Boston will not lend, that the cause of the failure may be traced to the enemy, (the gentlemen from that part of the country will pardon the expression.) Nearly all the money in the nation, it is reported—and it has also been said, I believe, in the House—is travelling to Boston for goods. What produced this? The blockading proclamation, which includes all the country from New York to the South. If, therefore, the people of Boston will not lend, and the enemy, by his proclamation, causes the money of the nation to travel to Boston for goods, does it not follow that the cause of the failure may be traced to him? If this shall be the state of things, it unquestionably follows that the enemy, by his proclamation, regulates the loan. But if, from any cause whatever, the loan cannot be obtained, and the people cannot or will not pay taxes, there is but one poor consolation left to those who believe that the war could not have been avoided without surrendering all pretension to independence, by acknowledging that the national rights could not be supported, and who now believe that every effort ought to be made rather than submit to impressment—that is paper money; and no man is more opposed to paper money than I am; and this, I believe, is known to every person with whom I am well acquainted. Every exertion ought to be made to do without it; and, before it be made, the question ought to be that of surrender at discretion; and before the nation should surrender her rights to British discretion, I would consent to paper money—necessity alone may justify—necessity compelled the old Congress to use it, and it justified them, too. With all its evils and depreciation, it was necessary to them to establish the liberty and independence of the nation, and the same necessity would justify us to use it to maintain them. France was compelled to use it at the commencement of her late troubles, and by the use of it she vanquished the combined Powers; and Great Britain, in her turn, is now beating France with it; for her bank paper is nothing more than paper money at present; so that Great Britain, in the plenitude of her power and wealth, has been compelled to yield to necessity, and to have paper money, by which she is likely to humble her great rival. I wish it to be distinctly understood, that I am not the friend of paper money of any kind; indeed, I have stated the only condition on which it ought to be thought of.

Again, if money cannot be had to carry on the war, of what real advantage have the brilliant victories of the Navy been to the nation; or will any good effect be produced by them? They will neither be the means of getting peace, nor securing us against future injuries; it is only by firmly maintaining our rights that such a peace as we ought to have can be acquired, and only such conduct will secure us against future injuries. Will any of the men to whom the thanks of Congress have been voted for their good conduct, value the vote, when the same Congress refuse to supply the money necessary to carry on a war which was forced on the nation, and which they, by their gallant actions, believe to be just?

My colleague (Mr. PEARSON) said that a shock given to a bank or banks, (if I misstate him. I hope that he will correct me; I have no desire either to misstate what was said by him or any one else,) I did not distinctly hear which, might endanger the public credit. The credit of the country is not bottomed on banks, but on the honesty and industry of the people, and a belief that no Administration dare to violate a public engagement, when the public faith has been constitutionally pledged. I do not believe that either my colleague or myself are prophets, or that we can see further into futurity than other people; and I am a little apt to doubt the predictions of any man or men who have made them before without their coming to pass; and it must be recollected, that when the charter of the United States Bank was about to expire, that we were told that if the charter was not renewed, the public credit would be destroyed, and the nation probably convulsed. The charter did expire, and the Bank went out of existence like the snuff of a candle, scarcely perceived by any one.

[Mr. PEARSON explained, and stated that he had said, that if one of the banks should have subscribed to the loan to a considerable amount, and anything should occur to prevent it making the payment it was thereby pledged to make, it would to that amount affect the finances of the Government.]

Mr. MACON said, that it might, in such a case, affect the revenue was probable; but even that could not affect the credit of the nation, because the fact would show that the bank and not the nation had failed. The failure of a bank in which the nation had no concern, and the credit of the nation, are two distinct things, and not at all connected. He would acknowledge that he felt almost ashamed at having said a word on the subject, after the House had heard the able speech of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWNDES.) The recollection of it would stop him.

The same gentleman said, that no man believes that we can prevent Great Britain impressing her own subjects. I, in my turn, say, that I do not believe that there is a man in the country that will ever attempt it. We have nothing to do, nor never had, with her impressing her own subjects; it is her impressing American sailors.

who ought to be as free from it as we are, of which we have complained, and for which the war is now carried on. She may do what she pleases with her own subjects, and it will never trouble me, though I should be sorry if she was to hang them, because we will not consent that she shall impress ours; all we ask of her is to let ours alone. Old as I am, I would rather serve seven years as a private soldier in the Army, than be impressed by a British officer, and forced on board one of her public ships, and there compelled to serve one month. No man, it seems to me, can bring the question of impressment home to himself or his son, and then consent to permit it one minute. If a son be taken by the Indians, do not the father and neighbors pursue the Indians to retake him? And being taken by the Indians is not worse than impressment.

I also understood the same gentleman to say, that the British Government offered some time ago to make an arrangement on the subject of protections. This offer was like every other one from that Government—it was like a jug handle, as we say in the country, all on one side, there was no reciprocity or equality in it—none but Americans were in the offer to carry protections, and the Americans had long before by sad experience found out that they were of no value, because the British officers would not respect them. If that Government was really desirous to have the impressment of American citizens put an end to, it is only necessary for it to issue one order forbidding it, and it will be ended. The inference drawn from the fact by my colleague, is not, in my opinion, supported by it; and every official paper from the Administration to the British Government, shows an anxious desire to have avoided war. It is certainly true, as he stated, that in the arrangement made with Erskine there was no provision for protecting our sailors from impressment; but this, instead of proving a desire in the Executive to go to war with Great Britain, proves, it seems to me, exactly the contrary; it proves so strong a desire in the Executive to continue at peace, that for it the rights, or rather the liberty, of a part of the American people, was to be left to the will of every British officer who had authority to impress. But, although no provision was made for protecting our sailors against impressment, the British Government refused to ratify it. The offer made to Admiral Warren to treat on equal terms; the offer made by Mr. Russell to the British Government; the ready acceptance of the mediation of Russia, and the ready acceptance of the offer to treat at Gottenburg, after Great Britain had refused both the other offers, and the mediation of Russia, all prove the most sincere desire the Executive had to avoid the war, if it could have been done, and to restore peace since the war was declared. In making arrangements, Mr. Speaker, on the subject of impressment, I should like the Administration to adopt the saying of a good lady to her husband, in the State from which you come, which was this—"if we are quality, let us be quality." And so, if we are a nation, let us be a nation—and let the world know that Americans are not to be impressed.

My colleague, like many other gentlemen who oppose the bill, complains that the country is not defended, and charges the Administration with not defending it. If by defending the country is intended to convey the idea, that the whole frontier of the United States, North and South, East and West, be so defended that no enemy could put his foot within our limits, I agree with him that it has not been so defended, and I fear never will; nay, that it is impossible. Except the military operations in the vicinity of Lake Ontario, as much was done last Fall as could reasonably have been expected. But how can the Executive have men at every place where a vessel may come on our extensive seacoast, or where an Indian may approach the frontier, unless the men be furnished him by the Legislature? and I doubt whether a million would be sufficient to enable him to so defend the country that no enemy should put his foot in it. While the war continues we may expect that small parties will land in different parts of the nation, more with a view to plunder than anything else; and if there should not be any troops at the place, the people of the country will turn out to defend their wives, their children, and their property. When invaded, they will not, they cannot, and they ought not, to wait for an order either from the Governor of the State or the President of the United States to defend themselves. The gentlemen seem to speak of the protection which the Executive ought to afford, as if the Executive alone had the authority to raise both men and money, or as if the Executive was some uncommon being, which could itself see and protect every part of the nation. One day we are told that the Executive does not defend the nation, and that there is a want of energy in it. The real cause of the complaints as I understand them have not been mentioned. They are the British orders and the French edicts. We, however, hear nothing of them; they seem to be forgotten, while we hear it daily repeated that the country is not defended. If the country is not defended, furnish the means and it will be done: and if the means be not furnished we must fold our arms and wait with patience, until Great Britain will in her tender mercy refrain from attacking us, and grant us such a peace as may suit herself.

My colleague said that he would not give his claim on Bonaparte, and he did not appear to value that very high, for his part of the unsettled land of Canada, if it should be taken. I do not know any rule by which the value of either could be ascertained, therefore cannot say which would be most valuable, or whether it would be a good or bad bargain to give one for the other. I will, however, say that I would not give the little claim which my descendants may have to our Western country for all the claims on Bonaparte. Although the Western land may not produce the revenue which many have expected, it is certainly of great advantage to the nation in this respect, if in no other, that it enables every man who wishes it, by moving, to become a landholder on moderate terms, and to better his condition. I appeal to all who have gone to that country for the truth of the statement. In this Congress there is an extraordinary collection of young men of talents. The Western country, like every other part of the nation, has her share of them. Who can look at them and not be proud that he is an American? Young in years, but old in experience; an honor to their parents, an ornament to their country. A friend of mine was here last Winter, who had been in the habit of attending to the proceedings of Congress, expressed his surprise at seeing them, and said that he had thought from reading their speeches they were much older than he found them to be. It is, I think, in some measure, owing to our happy form of Government, that we have such men. It is calculated to stimulate and to make great characters, particularly great orators. The various meetings of the people, the State Legislatures, and this House, and I might add the courts of justice, and all places which have a tendency to promote public speaking. Indeed the fathers of the country, it seems to me, if they had nothing else in view, could not have formed a more perfect plan to encourage the rising generation to be great and to be virtuous; in this view I consider the Western country a very great benefit, because it gives more room for young men to try their talents; some that may not succeed from an accidental cause in one place, may in another. Notwithstanding this and all the other advantages of the Constitution, we have heard disunion talked of in this House, the foundation of which was laid to perpetuate the Union, by the greatest man of the age. To dissolve the Union and destroy the Constitution, would be to throw from us as great a blessing as kind Providence has bestowed on any people in modern times; it would be to acknowledge that we could not be governed by reason, and that party feuds had got the better of our best judgment and destroyed our greatest happiness.

We have heard a great deal about faction. I agree with the gentlemen that a faction, wicked and corrupt if they please, may be either a majority or a minority; and add, that I believe there have been examples of both, and that England, during the time of Cromwell, had a factious minority by whose contrivance or by his management of them, he got the command of the army, and by the army the command of the kingdom. The history of every country that ever was free informs us that faction destroyed the liberty of the people, and we have heard enough of the wickedness of faction in revolutionary France, to admonish and persuade us to keep as clear as we can of its terrible effects. But how is a wicked and corrupt faction to be known? It is only by their doings; from their acts they must be judged, and by this rule all parties ought to be judged.

My colleague, like many others, advises us to repeal the act laying an embargo, and told us if we would that the capital of the people would be put into circulation, and that it would be the means of the Government getting money. He advises us by what means we may get money, though he will not vote for the bill. If I thought his advice good I would follow it; but of that I have some doubts. That the capital of the country may be put into more active operation by the repeal, may be true; but it does not follow that the Government would get money more readily; that must depend on the demand for money here and in Europe. If the demand be greater there than here, then it will not aid the Government, because money, like every other article of trade, will be sent to the market where it will bring the highest price; of course, if the demand be greater in a foreign market than at home, more will be exported than will be imported; but the embargo was not laid to enable the Government to get money, but to prevent the enemy from getting a supply of provisions; and if it be repealed, the object for which it was laid will be abandoned. Repeal it, and his provisions will not cost him half as much as they will with it not repealed. Repeal it, and Halifax will become the receptacle of our provisions by means of neutrals or pretended neutrals, and no more complaints will be heard in the British House of Commons of the enormous expense of the armaments on the American station; but to lay it in the Winter when the coast could not easily be blockaded, and take it off on the approach of Spring when it can, would be to act strangely indeed. That is, put it on when our vessels might go out without danger, and take it off when they cannot. England herself could not be displeased at such doings; indeed it appears to me that it would exactly suit her. Again, repeal the embargo, and let Spain, who is contending for her liberty, get provisions. I do not understand that Spain is contending for liberty, certainly not as we enjoy it, but for the King that shall govern her; and so far as self-government may be concerned I wish her success, and that she may have the King she prefers, be he whom he may; but the liberty of the subject is never cause of war between Kings; any one of them may oppress his subjects as much as he pleases, and no brother King will quarrel with him for that alone, and as I dislike Kings as much as Joshua did, I care not who any nation may have for King. I wish them, however, all to have the person they prefer.

My colleague also said that Great Britain could not conquer France. With the war between Great Britain and France we have nothing to do; they have both treated us in a manner not to command our respect. I hope, however, that Great Britain cannot conquer France nor France Great Britain, nor any other nation; they are both powerful enough as they are, and both willing to have more power. Great Britain, however, has had a greater probability of conquering France, than France ever had of conquering her. The war between them cannot give Great Britain any right to impress American citizens, and it is to prevent their impressment that the war is now carried on by the United States.

My colleague also said there was no opposition

MARCH, 1814.

The Loan Bill.

H. OF R.

made by the Federal party for several years after Mr. Jefferson came into office. In this he is mistaken; for I well recollect the repeal of the internal taxes was as much opposed then as this bill now is; there was at that time no necessity for the taxes, and on that ground they were repealed. The repeal was then called oppression by the Opposition, and they also told us that it would destroy the public credit. In this, as well as all the other predictions made by them at the time, they were mistaken. When the repeal of the taxes was called oppression, the then eloquent chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means replied, it was an oppression of a new kind, and one that the people would not complain of; and they were then assured that taxes would be laid whenever it should be necessary, and when they were necessary they were laid. So that the same party opposed the repeal of the taxes when they were not necessary, and the money which they would bring was not wanted in the Treasury, and opposed the laying of them when they were necessary and the money wanted in the Treasury. Again, during the same period there was a debate which continued as long as this has done, and was quite as violent; it was on the repeal of the act generally known by the name of the midnight Judiciary Act; the act by which some of the then Federal members of Congress contrived to get the appointment of district judge, that was to provide for themselves while they had the power. It was on this repeal that the people were called their own worst enemies by Federal members of Congress.

I am sincerely sorry that my colleague has thought it necessary in this debate to state what was done at any election in the State, or what was the Democratic doctrine in that part of it where he lived. I shall leave the ticket and illumination with him and our colleague, (Mr. YANCEY,) with a single observation, that the doctrine stated to be Democratic was formerly published as Federal by high authority; and that intolerance, according to my understanding, is not a Democratic principle; and the first time I ever heard party intolerance mentioned and supported in Congress, was by a distinguished Federalist, who said, in his place, that the Federal Administration ought to turn every man out of office who did not agree with it in politics; and the advice was pretty well followed. The best and most tolerant among us is often, no doubt, wrong; perfection is not the lot of man; but intolerance, whether in religion or in politics, cannot always be right; argument and reason cannot be used to benefit one who is really intolerant. But, sir, truth has nothing to fear from intolerance, as we have seen; only let the liberty of speech and the freedom of the press be as it now is, and truth will triumph. I dislike all intolerance, no matter from whom or what party it may come; it is an attempt to tyrannize over the mind. I had hoped that the State which we in part represent had been free from it, or at least from the violence of it. I cannot forbear here to remark—and I take not only pleasure, but pride also in doing it—that in that State no person has been turned out of office on account of his political principles by the Republican Administration. Party itself is not so very injurious in a free country; it is, probably, rather an advantage; but the vindictiveness and intolerance of it is a most serious evil, and whenever it assumes the vindictive and intolerant character, it is a certain mark that the worst men of the party are in the lead.

I come now to remark on the observations made by my colleague (Mr. GASTON.) He said that he wanted practical security for our sailors; and that impressment was a grievance too intolerable to be borne. This exactly is what we say, and it seems to me that must forever settle the question about the justice and propriety of the war. No comment on these words could make their meaning more plain or impressive; and the Government has surely made every effort before war was declared which could be thought of, to obtain practical security for our sailors against British impressment, without obtaining it; and this grievance, too intolerable to be borne, must be borne, or opposed by force. I once thought, and so expressed myself on this floor, that it might be obtained by an appeal to her interest. But this appeal has been made, without producing the least effect—indeed, while we suffer impressment, no arrangement by which practical security for our sailors would be obtained would suit her as well as the convenient practice of impressing them, because by it she keeps her ships well manned wherever they may be. I should have been highly gratified if my colleague, who is very capable of forming plans, had told us whether he had formed one by which practical security for our sailors could be obtained. His telling of his desire, without giving a plan by which it was to be carried into execution, was leaving us exactly where he found us—in fact, he did not even suggest a remedy for a grievance which he declared too intolerable to be borne. Every expedient, it seems to me, which the wit of man could devise, has been tried, and tried in vain. I verily believe, state the question of impressment fairly to every man in the State which we are from, and that every one of them will agree with my colleague, that impressment is a grievance too intolerable to be borne. Notwithstanding he has told us five men of the name of one of his constituents had been killed, and they all had protections, this fact did not, however, convince him that impressment was not a grievance—nor would it convince any other man; admit all the five men were British subjects, and that protections have been bought and sold, as I believe they have, and it only proves that British sailors are not willing to be impressed to fight the battles of their own country; and, gracious God! can anything like this give Great Britain a right to impress American citizens? And why, sir, should our sailors carry a pass, when the sailors of no other nation carry one? What would be thought were we to ask Great Britain to give her sailors a pass? and we have the same right to ask it of her as she has of us. Whether she has impressed only one hundred and fifty-six, as has been stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. PICKERING,) or one thousand six hundred as stated by Lord Castlereagh, or more than six thousand as reported by the Secretary of State, or more than that number as Commodore Rodgers supposes in a letter written after he had examined some British documents which he had taken—and permit me here to observe that the British Minister ought not to be suspected of having stated the number too large—the question as to these impressed men, is nothing more or less than this; have they a right to the protection of their country, and the country to which they owe allegiance? If allegiance and protection ought to be reciprocal, the war question ought to be forever settled. For what purpose do men enter into society and form governments? Is it not that each shall be protected in his person and his property by the force of the whole? If this be the fact, are we not bound to try to protect those who have been impressed? and if we are not bound to protect them, would we be bound if the number was one hundred and fifty-six thousand? Remember that England was once so averse to protecting herself, that, after suffering much from those who pillaged and plundered her, she at last hired others to defend her, and that they in their turn become her oppressors. War is certainly a great national calamity; but that nation which will not defend itself, will, like the country just mentioned, find a greater calamity than war.

H. of R.

The Loan Bill.

MARCH, 1814.

My same colleague also said that proper efforts should be made to settle the question by treaty, and, that if Great Britain afterwards persisted in impressing American sailors, that he would support the war to the last. This, like the sentence just noticed, is very elegant, and, like that, cannot produce any beneficial result, because he never told us what he would consider a proper effort, and after the repeated efforts which have been made, it would be impossible to guess what sort of a one would be satisfactory to him. It is true that he advises to suspend the invasion of Canada until the negotiation is ended. Whether an attempt will be made to invade it before the negotiation be ended, I do not know; but I am sure of this, if we are prepared to do it, it ought to be done, unless both parties agree not to molest each other pending the negotiation. He also said that if we invaded Canada we should attack men with whom we associated as friends. This may be the case, but is it not the case in every war where nations border on each other? But, worse than this, brother was to put the bayonet into the breast of brother, and those rocked in the same cradle were to kill one another. This, I imagine, cannot be the case until the right of expatriation be admitted, and it has been denied by those who oppose the bill, because the refugees who went to that country would now be too old to perform military service, if living, and they are the only subjects in that country who can have much kin in the United States without expatriation. But, if this argument about kin has any force, does it not apply as strongly to one side as the other? And what evidence have we the enemy will respect it? And if it applies on land, does it not apply on water? And if it applies to invasion, does it not apply to impressment? But these Canadians are surely a most uncommon people. At one time they are our brothers, friends, and associates; at another, they are French Refugees and Old Tories. Their country, too, must be something like themselves. At one time, it is so valuable that Great Britain will never part with it, and at another, it is so poor that it would be a curse to the United States; at one time the whole nation cannot take it; at another, a single State, and that not a large one, can take it with ease. The war, too, is to be as uncommon as the people or country; it is to partake of the character of a civil war, to engender a spirit of ferocity which will destroy everything before it, and to produce an internal, servile war. The character of the war will depend on the enemy. Let Hampton and Raisin witness the kind he prefers. There is but one act on our side, that I have heard of, which I wish had not been committed. I mean the burning of Newark. Though, in strictness, it might be justified by the conduct of the enemy in the Chesapeake, yet I would rather we had magnanimously have left it as we took it. As to the servile war, I have no dread of it. The few slaves which I have I should not be afraid to trust in any situation, and I believe my neighbors feel as easy on this subject as I do; and the old slaves well remember what became of those taken during the Revolutionary war.

He also said that a certain description of people from Europe had got possession of the printing presses. It is certainly true that newspapers on both sides have been edited by Europeans, and they may, for anything I know, wish to make their feeling the feeling of the nation. He might, also, have added that there were other people besides the printers from Europe, who were willing to make their feeling the feeling of the nation. But all the fuss about the influence of Europeans in the nation is, in my opinion, without foundation. Collect them all together, and they will have no more chance to influence the nation than I have to fly; and as to the press, it has been so abused of late that but few newspapers have any character, and their influence on public opinion is little indeed.

I intended, sir, to have made more remarks on the observations of my colleague, and on those of several other gentlemen; but I am admonished by a monitor who will be obeyed, that I must stop; and I feel the less regret at stopping, because if what the enemy did at Hampton since the war, and the practice of impressment for twenty years before, will not unite the nation in defending their just rights nothing that I could say would. If impressment, plunder, robbery, murder, and rape will not unite the people, words will not.

Before I sit down, I will endeavor, in a few words to compare our situation with that of Russia when invaded by France. Unable at first to resist, or to drive the invader out of her territory, she burnt towns and cities to prevent the invader, from finding shelter against the weather, and to let him know her determination not to be conquered. Was her cause more just and righteous than ours? It was not. France, with all her ambition and desire for conquest, had not impressed a single Russian to fight her battles; and shall Russia burn towns and cities to keep the crown on the head of her Emperor, and free America refuse to protect her citizen-sailors from British impressment? She who would not suffer them to be made slaves by Algiers, Tunis, or Tripoli, can never permit them to be impressed, and forced into bondage worse than Egyptian, by Great Britain. We must protect them or acknowledge that they are no party to the Constitution of the United States, which was adopted to establish justice, (and is justice established by impressment?) to secure domestic happiness, (and is domestic happiness secured by impressment?) to provide for the common defence, (and is the common defence provided for by impressment?) to promote the general welfare, (and is the general welfare promoted by impressment?) and to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, (and does impressment secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity?) Let the impressed and the oppressed answer.

When Mr. MACON had concluded—

Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, obtained the floor and moved to adjourn.—Lost ayes 41.

Mr. FISK, of New York, required the previous question.

Mr. STANFORD, of North Carolina, moved to lay the bill on the table.

After some desultory and rather disorderly debate, in which Messrs. SEYBERT and FARROW opposed Mr. STANFORD's motion, the motion to lay the bill on the table was decided in the negative.

The House determined to have the previous question now put—ayes 91.

The previous question was then put in the following form, viz: "Shall the main question be now put?" and decided in the affirmative, for the previous question 93, against it 53, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Archer, Avery, Bard, Barnett, Beall, Bowen, Brown, Burwell, Butler, Caldwell, Calhoun, Chappell, Clark, Comstock, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Cuthbert, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Duvall, Earle, Eppes, Evans, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Grundy, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irving, Irwin, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Virginia, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of North Carolina, Lefferts, Lowndes, Lyle, McCoy, McKee, McLean, Montgomery, Moore, Murfree, Nelson, Ormsby, Parker, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Ringgold, Roane, Robertson, Sage, Seybert, Skinner, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Troup, Udree, Ward of New Jersey, Whitehill, Williams, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wood, Wright, and Yancey.

NAYS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bayly of Virginia, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brigham, Caperton, Champion, Cilley, Cooper, Culpeper, Ordered, That the title be "An act to authorize a loan for a sum not exceeding twenty-five millions of dollars."

FRIDAY, March 4.

The SPEAKER presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the District of Columbia, praying that the act laying an embargo may be repealed, or so modified as to permit them to export their produce to the Eastern States.—Laid on the table.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill "for the relief of James Crawford," were read, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. KING, the Committee of the Whole, to whom is committed the bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to subscribe, on behalf of the United States, for shares in the capital stock of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, were discharged from the consideration of the petitions presented by him on the 29th of December, from sundry inhabitants of North Carolina, and they were referred to the select committee appointed on the first instant, on petitions from other inhabitants of that State.

On motion of Mr. LOWNDES, the Committee of the Whole to whom are committed the bill from the Senate, in addition to the act, entitled "An act allowing a bounty to the owners, officers, and crews, of the private armed vessels of the United States;" and the bill of this House, authorizing the President of the United States to cause to be built or purchased the vessels therein described, were discharged from the consideration thereof, and the said bills were committed to the Committee of the Whole to whom is committed the bill from the Senate, "to authorize the President of the United States to cause to be built, equipped, and employed, one or more floating batteries for the defence of the waters of the United States."

The resolution from the Senate for furnishing, by transmission of the mail, Judges of the Courts of the United States with a copy of the laws, printed at the end of each session of Congress, having been reported with an amendment, including also the Territorial Judges, was, after an ineffectual attempt to recommit the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary, referred to the Committee of the Whole, to whom is referred the bill concerning Post Offices and Post Roads.

The bill from the Senate to incorporate the Fire Insurance Company in the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, as amended in this House, was read a third time, and passed.

The House then spent some time in Committee of the Whole, on the bill to authorize payment for property of individuals captured or destroyed while in the public service by the enemy.

Some desultory discussion took place on the details of the bill, in which Messrs. ARCHER, DESHA, INGHAM, NELSON, and FARROW, took part; and as there appeared to be considerable difference of opinion in relation thereto, in order to give time for further considering the same—

On motion of Mr. KING, of North Carolina, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

APPROPRIATIONS.

On motion of Mr. EPPES, the bill making appropriations to support the Military Establishment of the United States for the year 1814, passed through a Committee of the Whole, the blanks therein being filled with the following sums:

For pay of army and militia	- - -	$8,505,360
For forage to officers	- - -	264,576
For subsistence	- - -	4,377,470
For camp and field equipage	- - -	460,000
For medical and hospital department	- - -	255,000
For bounties and premiums	- - -	2,540,000
For clothing	- - -	2,036,000
For Quartermaster's department	- - -	3,500,000
For ordnance stores, &c.	- - -	700,000
For fortifications	- - -	500,000
For contingencies	- - -	700,000
For Indian department	- - -	454,500

Thus amended, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. EPPES, the bill to support the Navy of the United States for the year 1814, then passed through a Committee of the Whole, and the blanks therein were filled with the following sums:

For pay and subsistence of officers and seamen	- - - - -	$2,579,341 00
For provisions	- - - - -	1,439,902 52
For medicines, &c.	- - - - -	120,000 00
For repairs of vessels	- - - - -	1,500,000 00
For ordnance, &c.	- - - - -	300,000 00
For contingent expenses	- - - - -	500,000 00
For navy yard, &c.	- - - - -	100,000 00
For pay, &c., of marine corps	- - - - -	218,279 50
For clothing for same	- - - - -	71,788 10
For military stores for same	- - - - -	27,608 75
For contingent expenses of same	- - - - -	46,000 00

The bill having been thus amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

CLOSE OF THE SESSION.

Mr. MACON, of North Carolina, from the joint committee, reported as follows:

"The committee appointed on the part of the House, jointly, with the committee appointed on the part of the Senate, to ascertain when the two Houses can be adjourned without detriment to the public service, have carefully examined the state of business before both Houses, and report, as their opinion, that they may be adjourned on Monday, the 11th day of April next, and submit the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on Monday, the eleventh day of April next."

After the rejection of two motions to postpone and lay the report on the table, on which some little desultory debate took place, the report of the committee was concurred in by this House.

FLOATING BATTERIES, &c.

The House, on motion of Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on three several bills referred to said Committee of the Whole, viz: the bill from the Senate authorizing the building of certain floating batteries; the bill from the Senate giving a bounty to prisoners brought into port by private armed vessels; and the bill reported by the Naval Committee of this House, authorizing the President to cause to be built or purchased a certain number of vessels to carry not less than sixteen nor more than twenty guns.

No objection was made to either of the two first of these bills, the objects of which were severally explained by Mr. LOWNDES, the chairman of the Naval Committee.

The last mentioned bill being under consideration—

Mr. W. REED, of Massachusetts, required of the Chairman of the Naval Committee such information as he might be possessed of, touching the progress of execution of the law, passed a year ago for the increase of the Navy.

H. of R.

Mr. LOWNDES stated that, of the sloops of war ordered to be built, two were ready for sea, three nearly ready, and the other in forwardness. Of the other vessels, several were in a state of forwardness, but none of them yet launched.

Mr. REED said, he could not see the propriety of passing a bill to build these smaller vessels, whilst those of a larger class, already authorized by law, were not completed, and the crews of those already prepared for service were not yet completed, and, from what he had heard, he believed could not be readily made up, on account of the difference between the inducements held out to the land and naval service, &c. He was disinclined to vote for more vessels of the class now proposed, until the frigates, which he considered a substantial part of the Navy, should be built and manned.

Mr. LOWNDES remarked, that he did not consider the unavoidable delay in completing the larger vessels authorized to be built as any argument against building those of a smaller class. With regard to the difficulty alleged to exist in the recruiting of men, arising from the present high land bounties, he believed it did prevail, and that some measures might possibly be necessary in consequence; but he did not see the force of this objection against the present bill.

Mr. INGERSOLL, of Pennsylvania, stated, as the reporter understood, that, in a rendezvous lately opened for seamen, the recruiting service had been much more successful than was anticipated.

Mr. MCKIM, of Maryland, after stating the reasons, drawn from experience, which operated to induce him to prefer vessels of a smaller class than that proposed by the bill, moved to amend the bill by striking out the words from "sixteen to twenty guns, and inserting from "eight to sixteen guns," as the force of the vessels proposed to be built.

Mr. LOWNDES expressed his great respect for the opinion of Mr. MCKIM on this subject; but he had heard, from persons whose experience entitled their opinions on this head to some weight, that the small privateers first fitted out had been generally exchanged for those of a larger class. Mr. L., however, was willing so to amend the bill as to leave the rate of these vessels subject to Executive discretion, from eight to twenty guns, if that would meet the views of the gentleman. He added, that he had formed the opinion that, in general, too little latitude had been allowed to the discretion of the head of the Naval Department, and that the proper course would be, generally, to vote a certain number of men and a certain amount of money for the Navy, and leave the application thereof to the Executive. But a different policy had prevailed, to which he was willing to conform.

Mr. MCKIM consented to adopt Mr. LOWNDES's suggestion; and the bill was amended so as to fix the rate of the vessels at from eight to twenty guns.

Mr. REED then moved to amend the bill, by striking out that part of it which authorized the purchase of vessels of this description. He said, experience had demonstrated the folly of the practice of purchasing vessels instead of building them for the purposes of war; because not one in five, perhaps not one in ten, suited the purpose; and the expense of preparing them for the service, after they were bought, was almost equal to that of building them throughout.

Mr. LOWNDES said, he had no doubt the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts were perfectly correct as applied to large vessels, but the same objection did not apply to vessels of the size proposed, which might frequently be bought more advantageously to the public service than they could be built.

The motion of Mr. REED was negatived—ayes 41.

The Committee rose and reported the bills; and the latter bill, and that giving a bounty to prisoners taken by private armed vessels, were ordered to a third reading without opposition.

On the question of passing the bill authorizing the building of one or more floating batteries to a third reading, some debate arose.

Mr. POST of New York, Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH of Maryland, and Mr. KING of Massachusetts, objected to making an appropriation of so large a sum of money as half a million of dollars, to make a mere experiment; nor did they see why the experiment need be tested on so large a scale, or at the expense of Government. They preferred that the inventors themselves should first essay the practicability of the invention. They said they were unwilling to put the reputation of the nation at hazard on such a project by giving it, untried as it was, the sanction of the Government. Torpedoes, the utility of which had been so completely exploded, were held up as affording an example of the impracticability of these theoretical inventions. Besides, it was remarked by these gentlemen, however much respect they might be disposed to pay to the recommendation of the officers of the Navy, Captains Decatur, Jones, Lewis, Perry, &c., who had so strongly recommended this invention, or to the opinions of any member of this House, they conceived that the recommendation of some responsible officer of the Government was necessary to authorize Congress to pass such a bill.

To these observations—

Mr. MCKIM, of Maryland, replied that, however desirable it might be to husband the public money, there were other considerations of a more imperative character, such as the siege of our cities, the infesting our waters by the enemy, &c., which required the House to adopt any plan of defence presenting itself under such auspices as this, and so strongly recommended by several of the most respectable officers of the Navy, as well as the Naval Department.

Mr. SMITH, of New York, who had inspected the model of this floating battery very particularly, rose, as he said, with reluctance to oppose his opinion to that which appeared to be entertained by those gentlemen (Federalists) with whom he generally acted. He said that the perfect efficiency of this model had been proved to him. If necessary to the defence of our waters, as he believed it to be, the expense ought to be no objection; his only objection to the present appropriation was, that it was not double as much. He spoke of the opinion of Commodore Bainbridge, with whom he conversed when at Boston last Summer, of the complete protection such a floating battery would afford to the harbor of Boston. The plan which this bill proposed to carry into effect was, he said, perhaps the most perfect thing of the kind ever proposed to any Government; the men would be perfectly protected, and the steam engine, by which it would be impelled, would be entirely out of reach of the enemy. If set on fire by red-hot shot, the fire could be instantly extinguished by water from the engine; and the same engine would keep boarders at a distance by the facility with which hot water could be ejected on them in almost any quantity, &c.

Mr. LOWNDES said, it was indeed an experiment, but so was every useful invention when first put into use. The true question was, is it an experiment which there is reason to believe may be beneficial to the country? He believed it was, from the evidence which appeared in its favor. It was, moreover, strongly recommended by the Secretary of the Navy, in a letter which he desired should not be made public, that the measure now proposed should be adopted. The bill, therefore, had the sanction, not only of the most distinguished naval officers, of the Naval Committee of this House, but of the Executive authority.

The question, on ordering the bill to a third reading, was determined by yeas and nays. For the bill 82, against it 44, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Archer, Avery, Barnett, Breckenridge, Brown, Butler, Caldwell, Calhoun, Chappell, Clark, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Cuthbert, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Duvall, Earle, Evans, Findley, Fisk of New York, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Grosvenor, Hall, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hungerford, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irving, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Virginia, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Lefferts, Lowndes, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKim, McLean, Moore, Murfree, Nelson, Newton, Ormsby, Parker, Piper, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Richardson, Ringgold, Roane, Robertson, Sage, Sevier, Skinner, Smith of New York, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Udree, Whitehill, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wood, and Yancey—82.

NAYS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Brigham, Burwell, Caperton, Champion, Cilley, Cox, Culpeper, Davenport, Dewey, Ely, Goldsborough, Hale, Hufty, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Markell, Moffit, Oakley, Pearson, Post, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Ruggles, Stockton, Stuart, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Wheaton, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Winter—44.

So the bill was ordered to be read a third time.

SATURDAY, March 5.

Mr. KENT, of Maryland, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, made an unfavorable report on the petition of the Justices of the Peace in the counties of Washington and Alexandria; which was read and concurred in.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee of Public Lands, reported a bill, extending relief to certain purchasers of public lands in the Mississippi Territory; which was twice read and committed.

Mr. R. also reported a bill to authorize the subdivision of the quarter-sections of the land of the United States; which was twice read and committed.

Mr. McKEE, of Kentucky, from the same committee, reported the agreement of the committee to the amendment of the Senate, to the bill for the relief of James Crawford; which was concurred in by the House.

The engrossed bill to authorize the President to cause to be built or purchased such vessels as are therein described, (not more than twenty vessels, carrying not less than eight nor more than twenty-two guns,) was read a third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate to authorize the President to cause to be built, equipped, and employed, one or more floating batteries for the defence of the ports and harbors of the United States, was read a third time and passed.

BOUNTY ON PRISONERS.

The bill from the Senate to amend the act for giving an increased bounty on all prisoners brought into port by private armed vessels, was read a third time, as amended, in this House. On the question, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. POST, of New York, opposed the passage of the bill; which came before the House, he said, under unusual circumstances. There was no particular statement from any quarter laid before the House, exhibiting any sort of necessity for passing a bill of this description; without which, he said, he should suppose that gentlemen disposed to be influenced by fair considerations would not sanction the bill by their votes. Although, during a former session, on a representation that some encouragement was necessary to revive the drooping privateering system, additional encouragement had been held out to those who embarked in it, he did not conceive that any impression had been made on the commerce of the enemy proportioned to public expectation, or to the attention which Government had bestowed on it. Even admitting that the promises or expectations of the privateersmen should be realized in respect to the capture of prisoners, he did not believe the object sufficiently important in the prosecution of the war, to justify Congress in enriching the privateersmen out of the public Treasury. But their views could not be realized; and, conceiving that no beneficial consequences could result from the adoption of this measure, he hoped the bill would not pass.

Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, said, unless there were very important reasons for giving away the public money as proposed by this bill, he did not see why it should pass. To encourage manufactures, or any undertaking promising correspondent or greater advantages to the community, Government frequently gave premiums or peculiar privileges; but he could see no reason for giving a bounty in the case now under consideration. If the fruits of the labors of those who adventure in these enterprises against the property of the enemy on the ocean, are not such as to reward them, he saw no reason why the money of the public should be paid to make up the deficiency, and the people be taxed for their benefit.

Mr. BURWELL, of Virginia, made a number of remarks, in reply to Mr. POST and Mr. WARD. These privateers, he said, were fitted out, not to take prisoners, but to take property; and it was much easier, and more to their interest, to set at liberty the prisoners they captured, than to bring them into port. The principle of this bill had been already recognised by law, in the allowance of twenty dollars for every prisoner brought in. But that allowance was by no means sufficient to defray the expense of maintaining the prisoners whilst at sea; and the bill proposed a bounty which it was supposed would indemnify them for bringing in the prisoners, and would afford a cheaper way of obtaining prisoners than any other. This policy had been heretofore adopted by other nations situated as we are, during a period of war, and among others by the Dutch and Spaniards. He did look upon this bill as presenting a question of affording a bounty to privateers, but he viewed it as a national concern, and as a step required by sound policy, to render more easy the acquisition of prisoners of war.

Mr. McKIM, of Maryland, said, that his object in advocating this bill was to get as many prisoners of war as we could, to balance accounts with the enemy, and enable us to redeem our fellow-citizens from captivity. The profit of privateersmen arose from the cargoes they captured, whilst the prisoners they captured were of little value to them when brought into port, but, owing to the amount of provisions and stores they consumed, were rather detrimental than beneficial to the captors. He did not know that there was any official account of the disproportion of prisoners in possession of the two nations, but in a conversation with the Commissary General of Prisoners, he had learned that Great Britain had two thousand more of our prisoners than we had of hers. This balance, according to the agreement of the two nations respectively to support their own people taken prisoners, created a dead expense to our Government, equal to the cost of supporting these 2,000 men. To get rid of this expense, and to relieve our citizens, many of whom were suffering extreme hardship, formed, in his opinion, a strong inducement to bringing in as many prisoners as possible.

Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, observed, that from the statement of the case which had just been made, it appeared that we were in a very hopeful way in the prosecution of this war.

What, between the bounty of $124 for enlistments, and the bounty of $100 a man for men wherewith to redeem our people taken prisoners, this would be an expensive concern. Mr. W. said, that he was as little inclined to permit our citizens to remain in captivity as any one, and as willing to vote any money which should be proved to him necessary to relieve them.

Mr. McKEE, of Kentucky, on the ground that this subject was new to him, and required further consideration, moved that the bill lie on the table. For the motion 56, against it 59.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, of Maryland, then made some observations against the bill, which, owing to his distance from the reporter, were not distinctly heard. He said, however, that this appeared to him to be only a roundabout way to fill the pockets of the privateersmen; and conceived that it would be much better to expend this money in bounties, in procuring men to man the navy which was to fight our battles. He was as willing as any man to relieve our citizens from captivity, but did not believe this would be an advisable or effectual way of doing it. He adverted to the prevalence of a disposition, which he saw with regret, to subvert the interest of the navy—the substantial defence of the country—by enormous bounties to soldiers, and reduced bounties to seamen, which induced almost all the seamen disengaged to enter the land service. He feared, too, it would be a system of warfare which was to be deprecated, destroying all the vessels captured at sea for the sake of getting the prisoners, &c.

Mr. FISK, of Vermont, approved this bill, equally as a measure for annoying the enemy, and as an economical instrument for equalizing the account of prisoners between the two nations, and relieving us from the expense of supporting prisoners. He regretted that no measure could be proposed which would please gentlemen on the other side of the House. A short time ago our seamen were all starving, was the complaint, and now it was made a complaint that the ordinary wages would not tempt them to embark on the ocean. He should be much gratified if any one thing could occur which would gratify these gentlemen.

Mr. McKIM said he would add only one word as to the "hopeful way" we were in. He said, the difference of 2,000 in the account of prisoners was but a small difference in a national point of view; but how did it happen to be even so great as it was? Our seamen impressed on board British ships were, when the war broke out, thrown into British prison ships, and there compelled to remain as prisoners of war. Another reason was, that the British Government was more attentive to the security of its prisoners than we were; confining them in dungeons and prison ships, whilst those taken by us were suffered to go pretty much at large.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, said, when this bill was first read he was as hostile to it as any one could be, but since the fact was disclosed that the balance in the account of prisoners was against us, he was determined to give his vote for any measure which should have a tendency to relieve his suffering fellow-citizens. Will you, said he, permit some of your bravest men—your gallant tars—to remain in captivity, when it may be in your power thus to obtain their relief? If it be the fault of the Government that they are in captivity, I beg gentlemen not to visit the sins of the Government on your suffering seamen.

The question on the passage of the bill was decided in the affirmative—for the bill 83, against it 55, as follows:

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The engrossed bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment for the year 1814, was read a third time.

Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I am against passing the bill on your table. It contemplates appropriating the enormous sum of $20,302,906 to the support of the Military Establishment for the present year. This sum, and three times as much more, as is manifest from the well-founded calculations of military gentlemen, will be expended in the course of this year, if the army is raised which is authorized by the bills which have been lately passed, and the war for the conquest of Canada is prosecuted with the degree of folly and improvidence which have hitherto characterized it in its course.

This appropriation will absorb nearly the whole sum which will be raised by the loan bill recently enacted. The terms upon which this money will be obtained, requires a more profitable application of it. When an individual raises money by sending his paper to market, it is considered a sure indication of impending bankruptcy, and is ever found to be the messenger of truth. When a Government, in behalf of all its citizens, raises money upon the terms which every individual would reject, were he a borrower, as too wasting and extravagant, they ought at least to be able to give a good account of the manner in which it has been expended, and the returns and advantages which are obtained. Bad economy in an individual, is bad economy in the public. But, sir, if this sum, or any larger sum within the resources of the country, was called for to build a navy for the protection of the commerce, and avenging the wrongs of our common country, against the aggression of any and all nations, whether English or French, barbarous or civilized, I should give my vote for it with great promptness and pleasure; but with a view to the conquest of Canada, or in the support of a war which I view not only to be weak, but wicked, I would as soon vote supplies to be expended in the invasion of Canada by land, as the investment of it by sea. We can as conscientiously pay for the shedding human blood on the plains of Abraham, as on the river St. Lawrence. If the character of the contest in which we are engaged, were that which is given to it by the President in his Message, I should be one of the last men in this House to oppose this appropriation; and sure I am that my constituents would expend their last dollar, and shed their best blood, in its support. If, sir, in the language of the President, "it appealed for its support to the pure principles of patriotism and the pride of liberty," in the section of country which I have the honor to represent, the withholding of supplies, the refusing to levy men, or raise money, or any other incident, would not impede its prosecution. If, sir, it appealed to these heaven-born principles for support, the citizens of Massachusetts, never insensible to them, notwithstanding the many dark surmises against them, and the many illiberal, not to say indecent remarks, to which they have been subject in the course of this debate, would be found where they ever have been, and ever will be, when those pure principles call them to action, in the front rank of effort and danger. This is the proud and elevated ground on which the true history of your country has placed them. In the glorious contest which achieved our independence, in which Massachusetts took counsel alone of her courage, her supplies of men and money were greatly beyond that of any other State in the Union, whatever may be their pride or their boasting. In a war in which "the pure principles of patriotism and pride of liberty" beat to arms, the place which has ever known Massachusetts would know her again.

Though the President has said that the war appeals to "the pure principles of patriotism and the pride of liberty for support," he has not condescended to show how, or in what manner, it does so. It rests wholly in assertion. And if he had said directly the reverse, the position would at least have been as well supported. In my mind, its character is the antipode of that which is given it by the President. The prosecution of it, after the revocation of the Orders in Council, was unjust, as it respects our enemy, and pre-eminently so, as it respects our own country. Not believing in the justice, necessity, or expediency of the war, I am against its farther prosecution; and it is my wish to admonish the Administration to effect an armistice, and make a peace by the only means which are left us, by shutting our hand and withholding supplies.

Some gentlemen seem to act under the impression that the minority are faulty in not concurring in the granting of supplies; that the Congress in 1812 having declared war, we are committed and must make the necessary provision for carrying it on. This I do not admit to be sound doctrine. We are as much at liberty to think for ourselves, and act according to our opinions, as our predecessors were. Acts of Legislatures which are in the nature of grants, it is true, are irrevocable, but the declaration of war is not of that character. An after Legislature, with reference to such an act, is not bound to effectuate the purposes of a former one. It is not only their right, but their duty, to rescue their country from destruction. This unjustifiable claim of superiority, on behalf of the last Congress, and of a sort of vassalage to them, on the part of the present, is not to be admitted or endured. Whether or not the war was just at the time when it was declared, is of no importance. To prosecute it without cause, is as unwarrantable as to commence it without justice. After the revocation of the Orders in Council, I contend that we had no cause for prosecuting the war, which was just, even as it respects our enemy. But if it were just, as it respects our enemy, in the situation of our country it was unjust and cruel, as it respects our own country, and against the duty which the Government owes to its citizens. If we had just cause of war, as it respects our enemy and our country, it ought not to have been declared until negotiation had been fully and fairly tried, and the alternative of war or satisfaction had been presented to the enemy. If just cause of war existed, and negotiation had been tried and exhausted, to prosecute it by invading Canada, and carrying misery and destruction to its inhabitants, inasmuch as invading them has no tendency to enforce our rights, which are said to be violated, or to compensate us for the injuries said to be sustained, is wanton and cruel. The mischief done to them is merely gratuitous. To make a war just, as it respects our enemy, it is necessary that they should have done us an injury of such magnitude as to be good cause of war, not accidentally, but intentionally, claiming a right to do it, or in contempt of our rights, and that we should have called for satisfaction, and it should have been denied us. War is a tremendous evil, and ought not to be resorted to for light reasons. It is the last resort, the ultima ratio of man, and the greatest temporal scourge of God. It is with surprise and deep regret that I hear it spoken of with so much insensibility by gentlemen of the majority. The bloody, the wasting work of war, seems to be considered as an amusement, or a trifling game of hazard. Having failed in two campaigns, prosecuted at an amazing expense of blood, treasure, and human happiness, another effort is spoken of with as much sang froid as a second hit in a game of backgammon.

The misfortune of the world is, that they who declare war do not fight the battles and undergo the miseries of the field. Had the Congress which declared war sat on the snow-banks where Hampton's army encamped, their false or mistaken patriotism would have been cooled, their session would have been short, and we should have had no war. Let gentlemen visit the field of battle, view the bodies of the dead, and hear the groans of the dying; let them follow the maimed and the cripples through all the mazes and miseries of their wretched journey through the remainder of life; let them visit the friends of those who have fallen in battle, and witness their agonies and distress, and they will not expect to compensate for the aggregate of human misery in lofty, unmeaning expressions, of what is due to mistaken national honor.

To make a war just as it respects our own citizens, the object contended for ought to be of sufficient magnitude, if obtained, to compensate them for all the losses they sustain, and the miseries they suffer in its prosecution; otherwise more of evil than good will result from it. The expectation of success ought also to be reasonable. These points ought to be so clear that there could be no difference of opinion, among intelligent and honest men. There are cases, it is true, in which a nation ought to take counsel only of its courage. When its existence is threatened and all is at hazard, every effort ought to be made, and if it falls it will fall in triumph. But, sir, in ordinary cases, something is due to national interest and national happiness, as well as to visionary notions of national honor. I am as little in the habit of reckoning everything in dollars and cents, as any gentleman in this House. But the false patriotism of sacrificing important interests and rights to secure pretended ones, deserves severe reprobation; it is against an important article in my political creed.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. NELSON) "rejoiced and rejoiced," almost without ceasing, that the discussion of this and its kindred bills, had taken place in the latitude which has been indulged, inasmuch as it had afforded an opportunity to the minority to show to the world the evidence of their attachment to the English nation, and the effects of British influence. We have been asked, again and again, by gentlemen of the majority, from various quarters of the House, where that spirit of resistance to British aggression has fled, which was manifested by the Federalists of Boston, in their memorials to Congress, in 1806, urging the Government to war with England and pledging their lives and fortunes to prosecute it with vigor; where those feelings now are, which were exhibited by the Federalists at the death of Pierce, who fell by the hand of British violence; and where that national pride is which was called forth at the insult offered to our sovereignty, in the attack upon the Chesapeake. It is said by those gentlemen, who with an air of triumph ask these questions, that, when Pierce was killed the Federalists contended for the honor of burying him, and for the first positions in his funeral train; and that they thirsted for satisfaction for the insult offered to our national honor in the affair of the Chesapeake. This is all true. The same spirit now exists among the same honorable men, and will show itself whenever the purposes of justice and the honor of the nation require it. The gentlemen who alluded to these facts, cannot have attended to their operation, and the evidence which they furnish, that the feelings of the Federalists are truly American. Should the British put forth their hands and touch American interest or insult the honor of our nation, if any want of spirit or power of resistance is discovered in our country, it will be found in the ranks of the majority. When and on what occasion have the gentlemen of the majority exhibited such temper and spirit towards the French, under insults and injuries of the most atrocious nature, as they now bear witness, that the Federalists on these occasions manifested towards the English? On none. I repeat it, sir, on none. On all occasions our Government, for twelve years past, have discovered a truckling, submissive temper to the Government of France, which would disgrace the tamest people. When injured and insulted outrageously, instead of demanding satisfaction and showing manly and proper resentment, such as our national honor required, our Government have condescended to put apologies into their mouths, which they have disdained to offer for themselves. When our ships were burnt by French cruisers by order of the Emperor, against all law moral or national, the complaints of our Government were expressed in the language of meekness. They merely suggested to the French Minister, that if it was necessary to burn our ships to prevent the fleets of their enemy from falling in with them and obtaining information, (which the French had never intimated,) that it was the "most distressing mode in which belligerents exercise might contrary to right." While our Government have been very sensitive and tremblingly alive to every symptom of British indecorum, and by a kind of second sight have seen it where it did not exist; they have licked the dust from the feet of the Emperor of the French. The maxim "the same disposition which makes one insolent to the weak, makes him abject to the powerful," has been abundantly verified in the conduct of our Government towards the two great belligerents.

I have no blind prejudices or partialities for the English nation. My feelings are purely American. Englishmen and Frenchmen when they violate the rights of our country, it is my wish should receive the same measure of resistance. I was educated in Revolutionary principles, and inhaled with my first breath something of prejudice against the people with which we are now at war. It does not enter into my views to show that our enemies are right; it is true I feel a conviction that the Government of our country is wrong, and if this could be shown without seeming to justify our enemy, the task to me would be less unwelcome. This it is impossible to avoid. It is a despotism of principles, from the tyranny of which no one who attempts to perform what I feel to be my duty to do, can escape. It is impossible to show that one party to a controversy is wrong, without apparently showing that the other is right. But justice is justice, and right is right, let them apply against whom they will; and he must be a miserable judge who decides causes according to parties, and not according to their merits.

Although the Orders in Council are out of the question, having been revoked, notice given to our Government and an armistice proposed by our enemy before hostilities were commenced, yet such have been the allusions to them as evidencing a disposition on the part of our enemy, wantonly to invade our commercial rights, and not to be at peace with us, that a few remarks upon them will not be misapplied.

The enemy did not consider those orders as an infraction of our rights, as an independent nation. If they reasoned incorrectly, and their orders were indefensible, there was nothing of contempt or intentional wrong in their conduct; of course nothing to excite the violence of passion, or that heat which arises when injury is coupled with insult. Injuries of this kind we have often received from the French, and tamely submitted.

At the time of the passing of the Berlin decrees, we were at peace with Prussia, Hamburg, and Denmark, and our merchants were carrying on a profitable trade with them, in various commodities, some of which were of the growth and manufacture of Great Britain. The nations then ranked as free and independent nations, and the trade which we then carried on with them was lawful, and one which we had a right to pursue. The Emperor of France or any other Government, except that of the respective countries above-mentioned, had a right to interrupt it. Bonaparte, as a war measure, not as a municipal regulation, resolved upon the destruction of this trade; and by means of a military force compelled the Governments of those countries to discontinue this trade with us, to the injury of our merchants. Had Bonaparte fitted out ships and captured American property on the high seas, on its passage to those countries, if it were originally of British growth or manufacture, no one would have contended that it was not a violation of our neutral rights, and that we ought not to have resented it. Where is the difference between his sending a force upon the seas to capture our property going to a neutral port, and sending an army by land to do the same thing? If the end is wrong the means used to effect it cannot make it right. The property of our citizens captured and condemned, under the Berlin decree, greatly exceeded that seized under the Orders in Council, in any given space of time.

Many months before the Orders in Council were put in execution, we had notice from the British Government, that if France was permitted with impunity to interrupt the trade between neutrals, that she would by way of retaliation interrupt the trade of neutrals with France. However, whether or not the orders were a just retaliation upon France, and could be inflicted through the sides of a neutral, is of no importance, they having been repealed and due notice given to our Government. With reference to the temper discovered by our enemy, I thought it pertinent to make these remarks.

After the Orders in Council were revoked, we had no just cause of war, even against our enemy. The complaints of impressment did not furnish one, when war was declared. That injuries had been done to us in this respect, is not to be denied. But that they are of the magnitude suggested, there is no pretence; an exaggeration without example, has been the effect of the round number calculation, in which gentlemen have indulged. The subject does not admit of precise certainty, as to the number of our seamen taken against their will, or the amount of our injury. But the investigation, which one of my honorable colleagues (Mr. TAGGART) has made, and which is before the public, shows that it is a mere baggabelle, when compared with the representations of gentlemen of the majority: even within the walls of this House, and in the course of this debate egregious errors have been committed. The gentleman, from Pennsylvania (Mr. INGERSOLL) has attempted to ascertain the whole number of impressed American seamen, by comparing the number of American seamen found on board the Guerriere, Java, and Peacock, with the whole number of seamen on board those vessels, and then supposing, that the whole number of impressed American seamen in all the British ships bears the same proportion to the whole number of seamen in the British navy. This rule, if rightly executed, would be uncertain and fallacious. But the gentleman has made a mistake of upwards of nine hundred per cent. in the number found on board the Java. He has assumed that she had eleven, whereas she had but one.

The investigation of this subject which has taken place before the Legislature of Massachusetts, to aid in which men of both political parties have not only been invited, but compelled to give information, shows that the evil is not only small, but diminishing daily.

The British nation claim the services of her subjects in time of war, and the right of visiting neutral merchant ships, and taking those who have withdrawn from her support. This right, on change of circumstances, she admits to exist in our Government, and it is certainly claimed and exercised by other belligerent nations. Her right to impress even her own subjects has been more than doubted by many of the majority. That the power of compelling the subjects and citizens of all countries to contribute their services in time of war exists in some department of their Government cannot be questioned. The chairman of the Military Committee (in the course of this debate) has intimated, that, if enlisting soldiers failed, conscription would be the next resort.

Though it is admitted that this power exists in our country, it is denied that it appertains to the Government of the United States. It belongs to the State governments. As between Great Britain and her subjects, I can see no reason why she, by her naval officers, cannot compel the services of her subjects found on the high seas, as well as we ours, by our military officers found on land. If she has a right to the services of her subjects, they have no right to withhold them. There cannot be right against right. If the subject has no right to withhold his services, withdrawing from his country and entering on board a neutral ship is wrong, and to exempt him from serving his country because he had withdrawn, would be allowing him to take the advantage of his own wrong, which is not admissible. But it is said that they have no right to visit our merchant ships; that a ship at sea is an extension of our territory. This principle is applicable only to national ships. The argument of the honorable Speaker proves too much. If his doctrine is correct, that a neutral merchant ship at sea is an extension of her territory—articles contraband of war—enemy's persons and property may be carried without interruption by neutrals, and the law of nations respecting contraband of war, would be of no effect. It is due to the honor of a neutral nation to suppose that her armed ships, sailing under her authority, will not violate belligerent rights, and supply her enemy with articles contraband, &c. But this is not due to her merchant vessels. The right to visit them for the purpose of searching for articles contraband, for enemy's persons and enemy's goods, is claimed and exercised by all belligerent nations. If this doctrine of the Speaker is correct, it follows, of course, that free ships make free goods—a position which is denied by all writers of respectability on international law. In all cases where free ships make free goods, is the rule between nations, it is the effect of treaties which have changed the common rule, and the making of which shows that the law of nations is otherwise. But it is said that, if they visit our ships, they will take not only their own, but our citizens. That such is the similarity of language, manners, &c., that it is impossible to discriminate; and because they cannot exercise their right without invading ours, they must abandon theirs. Who is it that occasions this confusion of characters and persons? The documents which have been read by gentlemen on the other side, to show the magnitude of the injury and the determination to compel a redress in President Washington's time, show also that from the high wages given, and other lures, British seamen were enticed into our service. No means of prevention were adopted to exclude them from our vessels, and avoid this intermixture of persons, and confusion of rights.

What, sir, is the law in cases analogous? We may reason from small things, to things of greater magnitude, and of a higher nature. My feelings always recoil when I compare men with property. I am in the habit of estimating human flesh and blood quite as highly as the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) I also prefer the person of a man to a bale of goods. I consider him of too high a nature to be placed on a level with property.

If A has an indefinite quantity of any commodity, which has no ear marks or distinguishing features, and B has also an indefinite quantity of the same commodity—and B intermixes his with A's, the consequences are that B incurs a forfeiture of his right. He who creates the confusion of rights forfeits his right. I do not mean to be understood, that as we suffer their men to come on board our ships, and confusion arises, that therefore they have a right to take and hold, not only their subjects but our citizens. But certainly, as we are the cause of the confusion, it does not seem warrantable to conclude that they shall not be permitted to take even their own.

The right to take from American merchantmen native American citizens, or the citizens or subjects of any other country, whether naturalized in America or not, is not claimed by the British, and whenever they are taken by mistake they are discharged as soon as the mistake is discovered; and our Government have been invited, again and again, to furnish information, that justice might be done. In point of principle there is no controversy between us, excepting as to her subjects which have been naturalized in America. A right to their services she claims in virtue of their native allegiance, which she contends they owe her, and cannot throw off without her consent.

Upon this point the British Government and our own are at issue; and upon the ground of reason and authority, in my mind, it is against us. But if it were not, I ask gentlemen of the majority, who seem to be so sensitive on this subject, if there is any justification for involving our country in war, in the state in which we were, for this class of citizens—when the consequences are, that native American citizens, who are bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh, cannot be protected. What is the President's answer to the native American citizens of North Carolina and Maryland, the fathers and mothers, the brothers and sisters, the wives and children, who supplicate protection of our Government for themselves in the houses in which they were born, and on the soil on which they and their ancestors have immemorably inhabited—"we cannot protect you."

Why not give this answer to the new-born citizens of our country, or even to native citizens, who are not content to share in the milk and honey of our land at home, but ask protection on the highway of nations? Would not the answer to the citizens, "we cannot protect you," be emphatically true, more so than the answer to the good people of North Carolina and Maryland; and could not honorable pride more easily submit to give it? Great sensibility is discovered by gentlemen in this debate for the sufferings of our naturalized citizens, and it has often been repeated that Government dare not refuse to protect them. Many lofty high-sounding expressions concerning their rights, and what is due to our national honor, have been repeated again and again. Sir, humiliating as the thought is, in the present state of our navy it is not in the power of the Government to protect our naturalized citizens on the ocean. In attempting it we take the children's bread, and give it to strangers.

This class of citizens have no claim upon our Government for protection on the high seas, against their native country. We took them, subject to her claim of allegiance, and are bound to protect them on the high seas only against others than their own country. By naturalizing them no such duty devolves on our country. As well might a man who had mortgaged his estate, and then conveying it, free of all encumbrances, complain of his grantee for not paying the debt, to secure which it was conveyed in mortgage. The forms of our naturalization law lead to no disclosure of the circumstances under which a citizen, who offers himself for naturalization, leaves his own country; whether or not he is banished, and discharged of all obligations of allegiance, does not appear. The pride of men who say to native citizens we cannot protect you, and with swelling importance rush into a hopeless war for the protection of naturalized ones, is contemptible.

H. OF R.

That allegiance is natural and universal, in my mind, is supported by reason and authority. On this subject the great European nations accord. In our country it has been decided that allegiance is perpetual, by the highest judicial tribunal, and in times when the public mind was less agitated than at present. All the purposes for which a man, by the writers on the law of nations, may emigrate to another country, may be accomplished without his throwing off his allegiance, and, in any event, making war against his own. By emigration, and being domiciled in a new country, a person may place himself in such a situation as to incur double or inconsistent duties; but if he, thus situated, incurs any penalties, he is a subject for mercy, but it does not alter the law.

But, sir, if the British impressing her subjects, who have been naturalized, is a cause of war, can it be just, as it respects our own country, that ten of our native citizens should be sacrificed in trying to defend one of them? We have already lost in a much greater proportion. If an answer could be rightly given in the affirmative, I say, to obtain justice by negotiation had not been fully and fairly tried. I shall not wade through an ocean of documents to show what does not exist, by showing what does. Any person who will take the trouble to read the letter from Lord Grenville to Mr. King, of the 7th of March, 1797, the instructions of Mr. Jefferson to Mr. Monroe, of the 5th of January, 1804, and of Mr. Madison to Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, of May 17th, 1806, and the correspondence between Monroe and Pinkney and the British Commissioners, and examine all the other documents in the Executive Department for twenty years past, will find that a constant effort has been made, on the part of our enemy, to adjust all difficulties respecting impressment, upon terms consistent with her preserving the control of her citizens without distressing ours, and that such terms have never been offered or yielded to them by our Government. Impressment was not a cause of war when it was declared. The mischief existed in a much greater degree during the Administration of Washington. It was considered by him as an evil of a nature not to be remedied by war. Surely no man better knew what was due to the honor or interest of his nation than the Father of his Country, or was more ready to assert her claims. Since the rejection of the treaty made by Monroe and Pinkney, no attempt has been made to effect an arrangement respecting impressment. In the treaty with Mr. Erskine it was not noticed, and in the communication from our Secretary of State to Mr. Adams, after war was declared, it is not mentioned. Is it possible that Government can now seriously declare that a cause of such a nature, which has slept so long, and not even been the subject of negotiation, was a justifiable cause of declaring war when we made the declaration? Surely a Government which, with such an extent of defenceless seacoast; with such an amount of property on the ocean unprotected; with conflicting opinions among its citizens, would declare war against a nation which had the means of annoying us in the highest degree, must have a great avidity for shedding human blood, and must expect the curses and execrations of their suffering country. The blood of thousands cries to Heaven for vengeance against them. No men ever more wanted what the celebrated Valdesso said—"All military men need a time for sober reflection before their death"—than those who involved this once happy country in war.

The feelings which gentlemen of the majority discover, as it respects war, in my mind, do no credit to their hearts. To obtain any object by negotiation, and in a manner which ought to flatter the pride and honor of our country, does not seem to afford them any pleasure. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. INGERSOLL,) when endeavoring to support the position, that taking high ground, as it respected England, was the way to bring her to our feet, referred to the settlement of the affair of the Chesapeake. He spoke of that proud nation as having been brought to humble herself before us, by spirited measures on our part. In another part of the same address to this Committee, instead of rejoicing at this event, he deeply regretted that Congress had not then been in session, that war might have been instantly declared. The habit of our nation was then feverish; her pulse then beat high, and he seemed to think we should then have fought with spirit. Can any gentleman wish to obtain by the sword what can be secured by negotiation? I desire to thank my God that he has not yet suffered such feelings generally to pervade the hearts of my countrymen.

If we had just cause of war, and negotiation had been exhausted, the invasion of Canada is inhuman and barbarous: if successful, it has no tendency to put us in possession of our violated rights, or compensate us for our wrongs. The mischief which is done to the Canadians is merely gratuitous; as much as the destruction of the property of a humble individual. The unoffending Canadians do not stand between us and our rights. Where a Government places its citizens or subjects in that situation, the injured country must cut its way through them to the object to which it has a rightful claim. If the British Government, by means of armed ships, invade our commercial rights, we are justified in destroying them, and the blood of her subjects will be on the heads of those who administer their Government. Their destruction can be justified, because it is necessary to the attainment of a rightful object. This cannot be said as it respects the invasion of Canada. Even misrepresentation has not charged the innocent Canadians with indulging any feelings inimical to us, until acts of outrage were committed against them. All the wrongs which it is pretended we have received, result from the acts of the Government to which they are subject, and in whose councils they have no voice. Foul, indeed, must be the robes of the magistrates of a country, to justify washing them in the blood of its innocent subjects. The invasion of Canada is like storming an infirmary; the vanquished will be a present plague and future expense. Suppose the Canadas should be taken—will it do us any good, or our enemies any hurt? If they are to become a component part of the United States, and be admitted to all the privileges of freemen, we shall then have a motley mixture of citizens, ignorant of their rights and of their duties, added to a population already too heterogeneous. If they are held as a conquered province, and considered as a colony, an armed force must be maintained to keep them in order; at the head of which some future Cæsar, or present Bonaparte, may overturn the government of our country.

The honorable Speaker is impressed, that the pride of England sets a value upon these possessions, and that the brilliant pages of her history will be tarnished by their loss; and that the memory of Wolfe, and his splendid victory over Montcalm, cannot, after these possessions are gone from her, be had in remembrance by the English nation with pleasure. These circumstances may make the purchase dear to us, but give the possession, when obtained, no additional value. If it has an artificial value to our enemy, it will be lost in our hands. Besides, can it be believed that Great Britain would sacrifice her maritime rights, or any principle which enables her to maintain them, to regain the possession of the Canadas, which have ever been an expense to her? Is it in man to believe that she would make a peace and cede the Canadas, and leave us in possession of the fisheries, which were secured to us by the treaty of peace? The fisheries are of more importance to the United States than all the land between the Lakes and the North Pole. The wealth of the deep is inexhaustible. Fishing vessels are the cradles in which our most experienced seamen are rocked. But for them, instead of triumphing in the successes of our naval heroes, and passing resolutions of immortality to their memories, we might now have been mourning at their defeat, and weeping over their faded laurels.

But, sir, is the conquest of Canada to be effected? One honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) has told us, when attempting to show that British power is less now than when struggling for existence and the freedom of the world, that it is not bone, and sinew, and muscle, that nerves the arm and makes powerful, but that it is motive and vigor of feeling which does it. Another honorable gentleman (the SPEAKER) has said, that British pride sets a high value on the Canadas. No honorable gentleman will say that the citizens of the United States, as it respects the conquest of Canada, feel the operations of the motives which, in the opinion of the gentleman, (Mr. CALHOUN,) constitute power, when the States in the neighborhood of the most powerful province will not move a finger to effect it, but reprobate the attempt in others. In this situation, what prospect can even these gentlemen have of obtaining the object of the war—the conquest of Canada?

A gentleman from Vermont presses the prosecution of the war for the conquest of the provinces, because it will be convenient to us to possess them, we now having too extensive a frontier. Is there no such thing, in the estimation of that gentleman, as national morality or national justice? Are the rights of one nation to be measured by the wishes or wants of another? The gentleman's farm may be locked in by the lands of his neighbor, and he may want them, but this will hardly justify him, in foro conscientiæ, in seizing them by force.

Believing, as I do, that the invading of Canada is wrong, I cannot voluntarily aid in the unjust attempt to take it. If I were to give my vote for any measure, the object of which is to effectuate that end, I should offend against the present generation, posterity, my country, and my God. Considering the invasion as immoral, whether or not it has been unskillfully prosecuted will make no difference to me as to voting supplies. If the end is wrong, a skillful application of means to effect it will not make it right.

On the subject of a Navy for the general purposes of the nation, with no reference to the prosecution of the war in which we are engaged, and as to the appropriations which we ought to afford the Administration for the purpose of building a navy, I totally disagree with the honorable gentleman from Rhode Island, (Mr. POTTER.) He seems to be impressed, that the only way to prevent all Governments from engaging in war, is to deny them all the means of building ships, or making any preparation for it. In this, however much I generally value and respect his opinions, I think he is quite erroneous. A Government thus sparingly provided for, could do no more good to the people than a blind man in an empty house.

A naval force is our proper defence. If our liberties are to be preserved, and our commerce and common country defended, we must have one—it is indispensable. With such an extended sea-coast a million of soldiers could not guard us at all points. American valor cannot operate where it is not. A foreign nation, predominant at sea, could apply their force wherever we had none. The remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. GRUNDY,) as to making the war purely defensive on our inland frontier, apply with double force as to our seaboard.

Our navy ought to be of such magnitude, as to make it an item in the accounts and considerations of the maritime Powers of Europe. But to secure us respect on the ocean from all nations, it is not necessary that our naval force should be competent to cope with any one important European Power. Suppose England and France were at war, each having their five hundred, or any other number of ships of war, and the United States with only fifty; if our rights were invaded by England the consequence would be, that our weight would be thrown in the scale of her enemy, and there would be five hundred and fifty against five hundred. If France should trespass against us, our naval power would co-operate with England, and the like inequality would be produced against France. So that, though their several force would greatly exceed ours, yet each belligerent, having a view to the force of their enemy as well as to ours, would find it for their security to respect our rights. But, if our naval force is so contemptible as to make us of no consideration in the estimation of European nations, we shall ever be subject to their rapine and plunder, as often as they are belligerent and we neutral.

"Free trade and sailors' rights" are the order of the day, at Court and in the country; and gentlemen are so delighted with the sound, that they pay little regard to the substance. They seem to have taken for their maxim, as it respects sailors' rights, "all for love and the world well lost."

After the revocation of the Orders in Council, our commerce was under no restrictions from the British, excepting those which the rights of belligerents, by the law of nations, impose upon neutrals. We have been for so long a time at peace, while the European nations have been at war, that we seem to have forgotten that belligerents have any rights. But, however high we may hold our neutral rights, it is to be considered, when they are put in practice, they must admit some temperance and amicable compromise with the rights of others. Should it be our misfortune to continue in war, I think we shall be found to claim and exercise belligerent rights in as high a degree as any nation on earth. Already have our courts gone farther, in condemning property as a prize of war, than any of the decisions of Sir William Scott.

That free ships make free goods, or that the flag covers all which sails under it, is not the doctrine of the law of nations, and, to have it so settled, is not less against our interest than against the principles of international law. If a gentleman who has his home, not on the mountain wave, but on the mountains themselves, had contended that this was, or ought to be, the law of nations, I should not have been much surprised. But that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. INGERSOLL,) who resides in one of the most flourishing commercial cities in the United States, and who every day must behold the abundant fruits of the principle, that free ships do not make free goods, should contend for it, is to me truly astonishing. Situated as we are, a world by ourselves, naturally, and under a wise Administration might be so politically, the mercantile nations of Europe will probably be at war ten years while we shall be but one. If free ships made free goods, the merchants of European belligerent nations would pursue their foreign commerce with their usual profits, only paying freight to a neutral carrier. In the business of carrying, we should have for rivals nations in Europe, who, from the lower wages of their seamen and cheaper subsistence, would underwork us. But if free ships do not make free goods, the consequence is, that the belligerent owner cannot ship his goods on his own account, but is obliged to sell to a neutral, who secures not only the freight but the mercantile profit. In our country a great commercial capital is employed in foreign commerce, while those nations who have been our rivals in the carrying trade, in the existing war between England and France, and probably will be in future wars, have little or none. Our merchants, as purchasers, having annihilated their rivals, have secured not only the mercantile profits but the profit of carrying. Immense wealth in our country is the fruit of the principle, that free ships do not make free goods. And if we must go to war, the interest of our country requires that we should fight in support of this principle, rather than to effect an alteration.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania contends that the laws of nations must be altered; that articles contraband must be diminished, and the right of searching for enemies' goods limited and restrained; and that neither the President of the United States, nor any future President, ought to make peace until these changes are effected. Sir, is it for the interest of our country that these alterations in the laws of nations should take place? In my mind it is not. But if it were, is it in our power to effect them? Can we with our armed ships, so few in number that they cannot with all their heroism and valor defend our own ports, enforce a change in the law of nations, and give a new code to the world? No, sir, there is something in this proposition beyond the dreams of madness.

Sir, I am one of those who never believed the causes alleged, to be the real causes of the war being declared. It is not in man to control his faith. We cannot believe without evidence, nor disbelieve against it. It is not to be believed that war for the protection of commerce and sailors' rights could be enforced upon the nation by those who are not merchants, nor sailors, nor their relations, nor connexions, against the prayers and entreaties of those who are. Nature has not changed, nor fathers and mothers in the Eastern States, "monsters proved." Miracles, or at least something more than the declaration of the gentleman from South Carolina, will be necessary to establish this to be the fact. This gentleman, in the abundance of his candor and decent respect for the inhabitants of the Eastern States, supposes that such outrages have been committed against the rights of sailors, as to furnish just cause of war, and that they are by the operation of party spirit so duped and blinded as to be insensible to the feelings of humanity, and the sufferings of their brethren and kindred. This gentleman would do well to pause and consider how far party feelings have affected himself.

They respect human flesh and blood, and the rights and liberties of men, as highly as any member in this House, and they will not condescend to take lessons in humanity from the people of any State in the Union.

The people of Massachusetts are not the inferiors of those of the State which the gentleman has the honor to represent, in the public or private virtues; nor in the knowledge of the true interest of their country, foreign or domestic; nor in the proofs they have given of zeal and industry in its service; nor in any particular which calls for and obtains the just considerations of the humane and enlightened.

MARCH, 1814.

There are but three propositions upon which I can account for war being declared by our Government against England at the time when it took place; each of which carry terror to our country, according to the views which I have of its interests.

1st. That the Emperor of France had an ascendancy in the councils of our nation from the fears which he excited, or the hopes he inspired.

2d. That the views and designs of the Administration were to destroy the commerce of the country, and make us purely an agricultural and manufacturing people.

3d. That it was intended by the Administration to change the form of our Government.

In adducing the facts and evidence which operate on my mind, in favor of each supposition, I shall endeavor to avoid repeating that which has been laid before the Committee, and remarked upon by those who have preceded me in this debate, and shall advert to such auxiliary proofs only as have occurred to me, and not been noticed by others.

The honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, in the remarks which he submitted to the Committee, made frequent allusions to the late President, Mr. Jefferson, and to his actions and opinions, and those of others, concerning him. It cannot therefore be amiss if I avail myself of his example.

I have long considered that gentleman as the champion of anti-Federalism and Democracy, as the mainspring and soul of the party which now direct the destinies of our country. It is a fact well known, that he long since predicted the predominance of French power, and the overthrow of England. England, it has been thought, could do little more than "gather up her garments, that she might fall with decency."

With such impressions the hope might have been indulged, though I think it would have proved vain, that French favors might be secured by subserviency to French power. To me, sir, the effects of French influence have been as visible in the measures of our Government, since the commencement of Mr. Jefferson's Presidency, as though they were written in sunbeams. A few facts in addition to those which have been mentioned by other gentlemen, as evidence of French influence, will be suggested without much amplification or comment. After the commencement of the French Revolution, the Government of France proclaimed the right of self-government to exist in the people of all countries; and the inhabitants of St. Domingo were declared to be free. In 1806, the merchants of our country carried on a profitable commerce with that island, as they might lawfully do. Bonaparte then wanted "ships, colonies, and commerce," and declared that a rebellion existed, because they refused to submit to his power. Our Administration, finding the people of St. Domingo in full possession and exercise of the powers of government, had a right to carry on commerce with them without asking permission of the Emperor of France, or any other Power.

A rap from the French Minister procured the passing of an act prohibiting this commerce, as promptly as a rap on your table calls this House to order. In 1801-'2, when the Spaniards were in alliance with the Emperor of France, the dupes of his artifices and the instruments of his power, New Orleans, to which as a place of deposit we had a right by treaty, was occluded by them, and we were deprived of this right to our great injury. Spoliations upon our commerce to a great amount, previously to this time, had been committed by the Spaniards, and compensation had been demanded and refused. It is a fact which has frequently been alluded to by the majority in our debates, and not denied by me to be true, that gentlemen prominent in the Federal party were for doing our country forcible justice. They were for seizing New Orleans, and repossessing themselves of rights of which, in violation of good faith, they had been deprived. Upon this occasion the Demosthenean eloquence of a Morris was exerted with great force, in the first branch of our Legislature, to excite them to vindicate and enforce our rights, but without effect. We were then told that it was anti-Republican, and against the genius of our Government, to go to war for foreign conquest; that no consideration ought to induce the United States to go to war for fifty years. The voice of complaint from our injured citizens was heard by our Government, but not regarded. The Spaniards were then the allies of the French; Spanish insults and injuries were submitted to with tameness. Since the Spaniards commenced their struggle to rescue their country from the French bondage, what has been the conduct of our Government? It has been reversed. Instead of manifesting that sympathy which ought to have been excited for a people who were among the first to acknowledge our independence, and who were struggling for their own, our Government assumed a hostile attitude. The Minister of Spain, Mr. Onis, was not accredited.

The policy of our Government towards Spain, as it respects her American possessions, let the members of the twelfth Congress explain what the world does not already know. In a contest like that between France and Spain, every man of sentiment must be a party with the latter. To me it is not a subject of indifference whether Spain is governed by the monarch of her choice, or by a mere puppet of a King, who will always act in conformity to the views of the tyrant of Europe, the chief juggler behind the curtain. The sentiments of the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. FORSYTH) upon this subject, in my mind, are not only very incorrect, but highly reprehensible.

The coincidence of the measures of our Government and those of France, for many years past, must have been the effect of design and not of accident. Our embargo and non-intercourse laws have comported exactly with the French Continental system. Whatever has been prophesied in France has come to pass here. The footsteps of Bonaparte have been visible in all the paths of our Government. The acts of insolence on the part of France, and submission on the part of our Administration, are without number.

The Emperor of the French assumed the right of interfering in our municipal regulations, and in the details of acts passed by the Legislature of our nation. Mr. Barlow, in his letter to Mr. Monroe, of the 16th of March, 1812, says:

"The Emperor did not like the bill we have seen before Congress, for admitting English goods contracted for before the non-importation law went into operation. I was questioned by the Duke of Bassano on the bill, with a good deal of point, when it first appeared; and I gave such clear and decided explanations as I thought, at that time, would remove all uneasiness. But I have since heard that the Emperor is not well pleased. If Congress had applied its relieving hand to individual cases only, and on personal petitions, it would have excited no suspicions."

The conduct of Mr. Barlow, while Minister in France, was warmly approved by the President. Is there nothing of French influence manifested in this transaction? Could anything show it more clearly? Are the Legislature of our country, in the Hall of Liberty, which we hear so often mentioned, to inquire whether "the Emperor likes a bill" before they pass it? Many of our meritorious citizens who were entitled to the consideration of our Government would have been ruined had they not been permitted to import goods contracted for before the passing of the non-importation act. Not to have a general provision, but to have driven them to a personal petition, would have been unjust and cruel to them, as well as base and servile in our Government. Our Minister submits to be "questioned with a good deal of point," to make "explanations," tries to remove "uneasiness" on the part of the Emperor, but after all this, he, the Emperor, "was not well satisfied." Had Champagny then told us that, with reference to France, "we were less free" than the colony of Jamaica were, as it respects England, it would have been too true; and he might have added the other epithets which he applied to us on another occasion, that we were "without honor and without energy."

As it respects the Berlin and Milan decrees, our Government submitted to take the lead in changing the state of things between the two countries, when, by a solemn act of legislation, we had committed ourselves on the subject of France being in the wrong, and bound to take the first step. Insults to our national honor and injuries to our national interest have been submitted to patiently, when France has been the aggressor. But thank God we have reason to hope there is an end of the excess of French power, and that French influence in our councils will cease with it.

2d. That the views and designs of the Government were to destroy the commerce of the country, much internal evidence arises from the measures which they adopted. The embargo was a perpetual law. Against the will of the President, and little more than one-third of the Senate, it could not be repealed, and commerce revived. War was declared without such indications to our commercial citizens as would induce them to bring home their property from abroad. The non-intercourse law was continued, which put it out of their power to withdraw their funds from the enemy's country. Everything which was done or omitted was calculated to destroy our merchants and commercial capital. The gentleman to whom I have alluded, as the leader of the dominant party, is the enemy of commerce; considers great cities, the concomitant of commerce, as "great sores" on the body politic, and the tillers of the earth as God's chosen people. He wishes to see the agriculturist and the mechanic by the side of each other, and that the place which now knows merchants should know them no more.

3d. That it was intended by the Administration to change the form of Government.

In the letter of Mr. Jefferson to Mazzei, the ties of our Government were spoken of as Lilliputian, and inadequate to the exigencies of our country. I believe this impression prevails with many gentlemen high in the consideration of that class of the people who now constitute the majority. If they believe that our Government is too feeble, that its ties are Lilliputian, would it not be of course that they would attempt to make them stronger? If this were their design, what course could have been taken more apt than the one pursued? If I were one of the Administration, and this end was in view, no means better adapted to that end could present themselves. A military force would be indispensable. A naval one would not answer. A hundred thousand seamen would not endanger the liberties of this country, or assist in overturning the Government, in as great a degree as one half the army would, which this appropriation is designed to raise and supply. To raise an armed force has ever been the favorite measure of those who have meditated a revolution in their country. When I see a man, or a party of men, treading in the footsteps of those who have gone before them, I conclude that they aim at, and will arrive at, the same end. What better pretext could be furnished for raising an army, than a war with England and an invasion of Canada? When the idea prevailed that the conquest of Canada was to be the work of but a few short days, it was generally said by the friends of Administration, and often by men holding high rank in the Army, that from the conquest of Canada they would return and put down Federal opposition. All opposition could easily be called by this name, and be subjected to the same fate. If the object of the war was free trade and sailors' rights, the seat of it would be on the ocean, where they are violated. Instead of expending millions upon the land to no purpose, we should have employed our funds in building ships to meet our enemy on the ocean, where she alone can be met to any effect. Can any measure be more preposterous than attempting to enforce your rights on the ocean by attacking a detached, unimportant territory, which, if taken, would not distress your enemy, or compel her to do justice? No man can believe that if Canada was taken, our enemy would abandon the principle for which she contends. We must then, in order to enforce what is considered the rights of naturalized seamen, resort to the ocean at last. A war must be waged which would be interminable, or end possibly in our defeat and disgrace; our seacoasts be laid waste; thousands of our citizens slain, and tens of thousands reduced to poverty and wretchedness. No Administration would subject our country to all the miseries of this war, for no other purpose than the vindication of the rights of naturalized seamen, when out of the jurisdiction of the Government of our country. Some other object must have been in view.

These apprehensions may be viewed as the vagaries or wanderings of a jealous, perhaps, dis-tempered mind. But to them who think there is no danger, it may be observed, that the moment of security is the most fatal. All the Republics which have gone before us have lost their liberties, and the people, ever honest, and believing their deceivers to be so, have prepared the shackles for themselves. I fear we, like them, shall not see our danger until it is too late to avert it. May we learn wisdom from what they have suffered. From the declaration of this war, unless peace is the fruit of the pending negotiation, I fear the downfall of American liberty may be dated. I do not, sir, believe that the majority apprehend that they are ministering to such an end. But I ask gentlemen to consider what has taken place in our time, and what they have read in the history of other times. We have seen the Legislature of France turned out of the Hall of Liberty by a military force, which it had nurtured and established. We have read in history that the same was done in England in the days of Cromwell. However secure gentlemen may feel in their seats, it is not impossible they may witness the reaction of the same scenes here, and that the military force, which they now vote to raise, without being able to render any reason, may ere long put an end to their existence as legislators. Executive patronage and Executive influence are truly alarming. Important military bills, and other bills deeply affecting the rights of persons, are passed into laws, without amendment or alteration, against unanswerable reasons why they ought not to pass, merely because the Executive or the head of a department has suggested that they were necessary, without assigning any reason why they are so.

I have been not a little amused at the inconsistency of the grounds taken, and the remarks made, by different gentlemen of the majority, who have taken a part in the debate on this and its kindred bills. The gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. NELSON,) in speaking of the British Orders in Council, remarked, that under them our commerce had been swept from the ocean; and one would have supposed from his suggestions that of our many ships which went to sea, but few escaped. No vessels were the subject of the operation of these orders excepting those which were bound to France. Another gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. LOWNDES) has undertaken to show that the British Ministry do not properly appreciate the right of impressment, and that the exercise of it on the high seas is of no importance to them; that almost the whole commerce of this country is directly with England, and that, of course, taking her seamen in her own ports, and in the narrow seas, furnishes her with all the chance to repossess herself of them, which she would have if she exercised the right of taking them on the high seas, and thereby exposed our ships to great and unnecessary risk. I shall leave these gentlemen to settle which is wrong, or to show, if they can, that both are right. How the whole, or almost the whole, commerce of our country has been swept from the ocean on its way to France, when it is not destined to go there, but almost exclusively to England, it is difficult for me to conceive!

Much has been said upon the subject of opposition, on the part of the minority, to the will and the measures of the majority; and we have been admonished to pause and consider the dangerous consequences which must result. Sir, an opposition to wrong measures is always right, and it ought to be continued while those measures are persevered in. Some gentlemen, apparently wishing for a union of parties, have invited the minority to coalesce. Sir, no man more cordially wishes an end of party distinctions than I do. There is something in the pride and obstinacy of party spirit which wars against the public good. It is my wish that it was annihilated. When Mr. Jefferson's inaugural speech appeared, I was delighted. I had the pleasing impression, that although he got into power by bringing into disrepute men whom I esteemed more highly than himself, yet, now he was in place, he would administer the Government as his speech indicated, and ought to have support. Would to God it had been so! If gentlemen of the majority wish for a coalition, I ask them to consider that we differ no more from them than they do from us; that it is easier to pass from wrong to right, and from error to truth, than the reverse. Are gentlemen of the majority sure they are right? Have the minority no claims to their consideration? By their fruits all men and all parties are known. Let Federal and what is called Republican measures be tested by this—the fairest of all rules. During the Presidency of WASHINGTON, the administration of the government of our country was attended with embarrassments and difficulties, greater than have been known at any period of her history. He had to steer our ship on the margin of whirlpools. Let any man look into his own circumstances and prospects, and those of his neighbors then and at this time, and what a deterioration he will find has taken place! Let him look into the affairs of our country, and what an awful reverse! From a proud eminence he will find we have been strangely precipitated, without necessity or apology, into the depths of poverty and disgrace. When I reflect what my country might have been had she availed herself of her advantages and resources and applied them properly; and when I consider what she now is, my patience is exhausted—my indignation cannot be restrained.

It is supposed by gentlemen that the object of the Opposition is to oust the present incumbents from power, and get into place themselves. Whatever intemperate expressions may have been uttered by ardent men, tending to excite such a belief, I can say with great sincerity, with the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. SHEFFEY,) I have no such views nor warm wishes; nor do I believe that it enters into "the scope of the policy" of those whom I have the honor immediately to represent. Let us have a Government purely American—a Government by which the power of the whole will be exerted to preserve the rights and protect the interest of all the parts—and we care not what Americans administer it. When this is not the case, a Government is the worst of factions. In the Eastern States we have too much reason to say "such things are." In the course of debate many unfounded charges of propensity to rebellion have been made against the citizens of Massachusetts. But, with all the examples of rebellion which she has had set her, resistance does not enter into her policy; though a temperate, manly, determined spirit, will not on any occasion be wanting. Nothing but the extreme of suffering, and a thorough conviction that the purposes for which Government is instituted cannot be obtained, will drive her to resistance. They have been charged with a design to sever the Union, and insinuations of this description have issued from a quarter whence they were little to have been expected. Sir, let suggestions and intimations of this kind be propagated by whom they will, in what manner they may be, and for whatever purpose, I feel it my duty to repel them as unjust and unfounded. Such are not the views of the Federalists of Massachusetts. They cling to the Union as the rock of their salvation, and will die in defence of it, provided they have an equality of benefits. But everything has its "hitherto." There is a point, beyond which submission would be a crime. God grant that we may never arrive at this point.

Allusions have often been had in the course of this debate to the temper and feeling of the people, and state of party in Massachusetts, and gentlemen have, with much composure and philosophy, viewed and compared their strength, and inferences have been drawn against the success of those who have been driven almost to resistance. The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. FORSYTH) seems to suppose that the people of the Southern States, in the event of an explosion in the Eastern, would have nothing to do but stand by with composure and witness the destruction of that party who are the opposers of the prosecution of the war. Instead of contemplating this subject with the coldness of the gentleman, I turn from it with horror. A contest once begun, God only can tell how or when it would end. All parts of the United States will be involved in one common fate; and it deserves some consideration from that gentleman, that victory, in the history of the world, has never travelled to the North. If the gentleman properly appreciated the effects of such remarks—if he regards the peace and prosperity of the country—he would suppress them. When a pile is prepared and a train laid, it requires but little to kindle it and cause an explosion. Such are the character of the laws which have been enacted, and the temper and spirit with which they have been passed, as to create great excitement. Statutes, which consign to poverty and ruin thousands of people, are enacted, apparently, without remorse or regret. Insult added to injury will not long be endured.

The disappointments and the suffering of the citizens of Massachusetts have been great, and they have been borne with a patience without example in the United States. No opposition is so heavy as that which is inflicted by the perversion or exorbitancy of legal authority. They who pretend to no right, but rely on force, by force may be repelled and punished. But when plunder bears the name of legal seizure, and robbery is perpetrated by judicial sentence, though virtue and patriotism may shrink from an alliance with rebellion, for a time, yet the oppressor will not always be secure in the robes of the magistrate. The natural consequence of injury is resentment, and a disregard of right often produces a resistance to right itself.

Two of my colleagues, who have preceded me in this debate, having noticed the obnoxious allusions to my worthy predecessor, I shall content myself with remarking, that his integrity, his domestic and private virtues, and his patriotism and public character are such, as to place him beyond the reach of slander, or the need of praise; and I shall leave the public to judge, whether he, or the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. FORSYTH,) who made an attack upon him in his absence, best merit the epithet, "recreant spirit," which he applied.*

When W^r. WARD had concluded—

Mr. MACON, of North Carolina, made a speech of great length, replying to gentlemen in opposition, particularly two of his colleagues, on topics introduced into the recent debate.

At a late hour the bill was passed by the following vote—for the bill 82, against it 33, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Archer, Bard, Barnett, Beall, Bowen, Brown, Burwell, Butler, Caldwell, Calhoun, Chappel, Clark, Comstock, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Cuthbert, Denoyelles, Desha, Duvall, Eppes, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Grundy, Hall, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hungerford, Ingham, Irving, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Virginia, Kennedy, Kerr, Kershaw, King of North Carolina, Leferts, Lowndes, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKee, McKim, McLean, Moore,

* Mr. Forsyth, in his speech, used the term "recreant spirit," which it was understood, by many gentlemen, he meant to apply to Mr. Quincy. Mr. Forsyth, in his explanation, said he made no such application.

Nelson, Newton, Parker, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Ringgold, Roane, Robertson, Sage, Seybert, Skinner, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Ward of New Jersey, Whitchill, Williams, Wood, and Yancey.

YAYS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brigham, Champion, Cilley, Cox, Culpeper, Ely, Geddes, Goldsborough, Grosvenor, Hale, Hopkins of New York, King of Massachusetts, Lewis, Lovett, Markell, Miller, Moffitt, Moseley, Oakley, Pearson, Post, John Reed, Sheffey, Sherwood, Stanford, Sturges, Taggart, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Wheaton, White, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Winter.

MONDAY, March 7.

Another member to wit: from Kentucky, RICHARD M. JOHNSON, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

MR. HEMPSOLL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill prescribing the mode of commencing, prosecuting, and deciding, controversies between two or more States; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of Joshua Sands, late collector of the customs for the port of New York. The bill passed through without objection, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

The annual appropriation bill for the support of Government, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and the blanks having been filled with the various appropriations for the civil list, &c., was reported to the House. The question on one of the items of appropriation was, on motion of MR. BIGELOW, taken by yeas and nays, viz: on the appropriation of $50,000 for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse. On concurrence with the Committee of the Whole on this article of the bill, the votes stood—for concurrence 69, against it 52, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alston, Archer, Avery, Barnett, Brown, Caldwell, Chappell, Constock, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Cuthbert, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Duvall, Earle, Eppes, Evans, Farrow, Findley, Franklin, Gholson, Goodwyn, Griffin, Grundy, Hall, Harris, Hawes, Hungerford, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irving, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kerr, Kershaw, Lowndes, Lyle, McCoy, McKee, McKim, Murfree, Newton, Ormsby, Pickens, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Richardson, Roane, Robertson, Sage, Skinner, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Troup, Udree, Ward of New Jersey, Whitehill, Williams, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wright, and Yancey.

NAYS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Brigham, Cilley, Cooper, Cox, Culpeper, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Dewey, Ely, Forney, Gaston, Geddes, Goldsborough, Hale, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lovett, Markell, Moffitt, Montgomery, Moseley, Oakley, Pearson, Pitkin, Post, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Ridgely, Ruggles, Sheffey, Sherwood, Smith of New York, Stanford, Stuart, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Webster, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, and Winter.

The other appropriations were permitted to pass without opposition; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

LAND TITLES IN LOUISIANA.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments reported by the Committee of the whole House to the bill for the final adjustment of land titles in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri; and the said amendments being again read, they were amended, on motion of MR. HEMPSTEAD, by striking out the words "two thousand acres," and inserting, after the word "than," the words, "the quantity of acres contained in one league square."

In proposing this amendment, MR. HEMPSTEAD addressed the Chair as follows:

MR. SPEAKER, I ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments on the motion just made. It is seldom, sir, that I intrude any remarks on any subject; never, except on what immediately relates to the affairs of the Territory I represent. The bill now under consideration, was reported in pursuance of resolutions submitted by me: and it may therefore be necessary, at this time, to take a general view of the situation of land titles in that Territory. The detail may be uninteresting to the House, but, as it is of the first importance to my constituents, I trust I shall be pardoned for detaining you. I have given the subject a careful examination, and shall now proceed to state the manner in which it presents itself to my mind. First, whether the cession of a country, by one Power to another, ought so to operate as to annul or destroy the title of an individual to his lands, whether that title be absolute or imperfect. Second, whether the laws of the United States, in relation to land claims, have operated to annul or confirm the titles in Missouri Territory; and, thirdly, whether the present bill will do full and complete justice to the claimants.

MR. SPEAKER, on the first point, permit me to observe, that even in a conquered country, individual property is usually held sacred. The conquest would not operate to annul or destroy the title of an individual. The conqueror acquires only the same right as belonged to the former sovereign, with all its limitations and modifications. He lays his hands on the possessions of the State, on what belongs to the public, while private persons are permitted to retain theirs. They suffer but indirectly, even by war; and to them the result is, that they only change masters. This, sir, is the doctrine of eminent writers on national law, and will apply with more reason and greater force to a ceded country.

Let us now examine the treaty by which Louisiana was ceded to the United States. By the first article of that treaty, it is declared that France "has an incontestable right to the domain." And, in the second article, among other public property, the "vacant lands," not the lands of individuals, are ceded. The third article guarantees to the inhabitants "the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess." Here it is seen, that the national faith is pledged to the performance of certain conditions. The words are positive, the promise unequivocal. No room is left for interpretation; and, if there were, any interpretation whatever, tending to change the nature of things, (to the prejudice of individuals,) is odious. Penalties are of this description; and it is less contrary to equity not to give to a proprietor what he has lost by his negligence, than to strip the just possessor of what lawfully belonged to him. What, therefore, the Spanish Government would have done in this respect, had no change taken place, the United States ought now to do. What they promised to do, we ought to see done. The change, otherwise, would be for the worse, and the stipulations in the treaty would be unavailing.

MARCH, 1814.

Land Titles in Louisiana.

I ask, then, Mr. Speaker, whether the Spanish Government would have sanctioned the grants made by its officers? If so, they ought now to be sanctioned. Indeed, sir, without the solemn stipulations of a treaty to enforce it, policy alone would dictate such a course. Liberality will secure the affections of those you have made a part of your family; it will root old attachments; while a more rigid plan will occasion distrust and dissatisfaction, and the change will be regretted as injurious. No national benefit can result from this rigor; a few acres of land to the United States are nothing—but taken away from an individual, may cause distress and ruin. Many of them are strangers to your language, and unacquainted with your laws; their affections ought not to be estranged, when extending justice to them will secure their confidence. Congress have been liberal to the inhabitants of a conquered country, (I refer to the grants of land made to the heads of families in Illinois in 1783,) and no good reason can be given why the same liberality should not be manifested to the inhabitants of a country peaceably acquired.

On the first point, then, I think it is not to be controverted, that the cession of a country by one Power to another, ought not so to operate as to annul or destroy the title of an individual to his lands, whether that title be absolute or imperfect.

Sir, before I proceed to examine whether the laws of the United States in relation to land claims have operated to destroy or to confirm titles in the Missouri Territory, permit me to recur for a moment to the situation of Upper Louisiana while Spain possessed it. In the year 1780, with a feeble, thin, and scattered population, the country, at all times exposed to the inroads and insults of the savages, was threatened with an attack from their more civilized neighbors. To strengthen this remote frontier, emigration was invited. Lands were of no value to the Crown, and liberal donations were offered. They had the greatest abundance to bestow; they sometimes bestowed abundantly. Other inducements were held out. No taxes were imposed. These inducements did increase the population, and many, who had suffered from conflicting titles in the Western States, emigrated. After being impoverished, by contesting their claims with individuals, they have now the sad prospect of a more unequal contest with their Government, for what they consider their own property.

Mr. Speaker, it may be here necessary to advert to a few facts, respecting the cession of that country. Spain ceded it to France on the first day of October 1800. France, without taking possession of it, and leaving the Spanish Government in the full exercise of the sovereignty, cedes it on the 30th of April, 1803, to the United States. This treaty was ratified on the 21st day of October, 1803, and the United States took possession of New Orleans the 20th of December, in the same year, and of Upper Louisiana the 10th day of March, 1804. The Spanish officers continued to discharge their official duties until the times last mentioned. Then, sir, the operation of Spanish laws on the grants before made, was arrested by the transfer of the country, and the taking possession of it by the United States. Then the people were congratulated in proclamations on being united to a free people, and in being secure in their property. Then the change was predicted as advantageous; and then what the Spanish Government had promised, the United States were to perform. Such, no doubt, was the intention, such the earnest wish of the Government. Sir, let us see what measures were taken to effect this desirable object. It was important for the welfare and prosperity of the people, for the honor and engagements of the nation, to begin on just and equitable principles; because, if the first act was erroneous, the difficulties would be increased. With nations, as with individuals, the first step being wrong, it is afterwards hard to get right. The first law declares, "that all grants for lands, or any act or proceeding towards the same, after the 1st day of October, 1800, to be, and to have been from the beginning, null and void, and of no effect in law or equity." This law, in my humble opinion, was a violation of every principle, either of law or equity. It declared that which had been legally commenced under another Government, to be null and void. It made void the lawful proceedings of a Power in the just exercise of the sovereignty. Instances have often occurred, where what had been lawfully begun, but not completed, has been sanctioned and acknowledged, especially when it depended on the performance of conditions which subsequent events had made it impossible to perform; but never could a lawful act be made unlawful. A right once vested could not, without any fault of the claimant, be either at law or in equity divested. Such a principle changed the nature of things, and was therefore odious.

The second law pursued the same error; it imposed new restrictions, and it required new conditions. Sir, the most meritorious claimants were the most rigidly dealt with. One of the conditions requisite to obtain a grant, was cultivation of lands in the cold winter month of December. The laws might, with as much reason, have required that no confirmation should be made to a Frenchman, unless, on the 1st day of October, 1800, he could have spoken the English language, as to have affixed American conditions to Spanish grants.

In the same law, another new, and, in my humble opinion, illegal principle was introduced, that the date of a grant should not be conclusive. Mr. Speaker the acts of foreign Governments prove themselves. Even the decisions of foreign courts are conclusive in all parts of the world. It is always presumed the public officers act with integrity, and do their duty, unless the contrary appears. The date of an official act of the President might as well be questioned. Besides, in what manner is it to be established? The Spanish officers have left the country; and, if you do not give faith to their official acts, will you believe their inofficial declarations? Will you call a witness to prove the signature of the officer? Sir, it cannot be pretended.

Your laws were rigid; they required impossibilities. But rigid laws were enforced by still more rigid instructions. On the 26th of March, 1806, the persons appointed to investigate these claims are instructed that "a strict adherence on their part to the letter of the law, leaving to Congress such further and more liberal provisions as they may think proper, is the best means of preventing the dissatisfaction which disappointed expectations would otherwise necessarily produce." Again, on the 7th day of May, 1806, the instruction is repeated, "that they must adhere to the letter of the law, and not confirm any claim not strictly embraced by its provisions." Mr. Speaker, it was an almost impossible task to retrace former misshapen steps, so as to remedy the inconveniences which had resulted; and a fifth act, with more liberal provisions in favor of the claimants, was passed. The commissioners were authorized to confirm "not exceeding one league square." With general laws, applied to particular cases, with rigid instructions to govern them, justice could not be done. The same law, and the same facts, ought to have produced the same decision in every part of Louisiana; justice to one could not be injustice to another in the same situation. Yet your laws have been so amended and altered by ten or eleven several statutes, that the difficulties, instead of being diminished, are increased, the confidence of the people is weakened, and the "further and more liberal provisions" before hinted at are most imperiously called for.

The fact cannot be denied, that the people of the Territory from which I come are in a worse situation in this respect than others. The gentleman on my right (Mr. ROBERTSON) has been a land commissioner in Louisiana, and I can safely appeal to him for the correctness of this statement. The simple fact, that there are a greater number of land claims in the late Territory of Orleans than in Missouri—and there only six hundred and eight claims have been rejected in the first, and two thousand one hundred in the last—will, I presume, satisfy the House that full and impartial justice has not been done. A distinct and separate examination of these claims, by Congress, would occupy a whole session, and that would ultimately be done which is now proposed. If other proof is wanting to establish the point, that the laws of the United States have not operated to confirm the titles, it is found in the resolutions, of the General Assembly of that Territory, now before me.

It now only remains for me, Mr. Speaker, to consider very briefly whether the present bill will do full and complete justice to the claimants. During the ten years of scrutiny and investigation, few have made improvements. Many families, despairing of obtaining their equitable claims, and tired of the uncertainty attending their titles, have abandoned a country which cannot prosper without the fostering aid of the Government. And if the delay of justice has not, in all cases, been equal in its consequences to an absolute denial of it, still it has caused much distress and injury. The present bill will quiet the apprehensions of most of the claimants; and, although it will neither satisfy nor do justice to all, yet it will restore that confidence which has been much impaired, and will do what the national faith is pledged to do. These, sir, are a few of the reasons which induce me to hope the motion may prevail.

The said amendments were then concurred in by the House, and the bill being further amended, it was ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The bill from the Senate, "providing for the indemnification of certain claimants of public lands in the Mississippi Territory," was read the first time; and the question was stated, that the said bill be read the second time, on which the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 8.

Mr. FISK, from the Committee of Elections, made a report on the credentials of members claiming seats in the House; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill to incorporate the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TROUP, of Georgia, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was committed the bill from the Senate for the better supply and organization of the Army, reported the same with sundry amendments, which were read and referred to a Committee of the whole House.

FOREIGN ARMED VESSELS.

Mr. GRUNDY, of Tennessee, from the Committee of Foreign Relations, to whom was referred so much of the President's Message at the commencement of the session, as relates to these matters, reported the following bill:

MARCH, 1814.

Post Office Establishment—Yazoo Claims.

H. OF R.

A bill concerning the use of the ports and harbors of the United States by foreign vessels of war.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States may allow to any foreign Power or Powers, or their subjects, as the case may be, in amity with the United States, to fit out, arm and equip for war, public and private ships, to dispose of their prizes, and procure supplies in the ports and harbors of the United States, so far as will be consistent with the obligations of the United States to other Powers in amity with the United States: Provided, however, That no privilege allowed in any such case shall be continued after it shall be known that a like privilege is not allowed to American armed ships, public and private, in the ports and markets of the foreign Power to which, or the subjects of which, the privilege aforesaid may be allowed in the American ports and harbors.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to take adequate bonds with sufficient sureties of owners of such privateers, and to adopt such other regulations to secure the due performance of the foregoing provision, whenever in his judgment circumstances may require it.

The bill was twice read and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

POST OFFICE ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. INGERSOLL, of Pennsylvania, from the select committee to whom was committed the inquiry into the practicability of a reform in the Post Office Department, reported the following bill.

A bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act regulating the Post Office Establishment."

Be it enacted, &c., That all postmasters in the distributing post offices, and in all incorporated cities within the United States, shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and that, from and after the first day of May next, no person shall act as such postmaster within the United States, who shall not have been thus first nominated and appointed.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That every postmaster shall return and exhibit quarter-yearly to the Postmaster General, together with a general account of the receipts and expenditures of his office, a particular account showing the number of clerks employed in his office, their names and respective compensations, which said accounts shall be certified by the oath or affirmation of the said deputy postmaster respectively, and returned by the Postmaster General, together with his quarter-yearly accounts, into the office of the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 3 And be it further enacted, That no contingent fund whatever shall be left in the disposition of the Postmaster General, or of any assistant or deputy postmaster; but, instead thereof, a regular quarter-yearly account shall be kept by each office of all their expenses, for rent, fuel, stationery, clerk hire, and the same and every other charge allowed quarter-yearly out of the funds in their hands, accounts thereof distinguishing each item, certified by oath or affirmation, being returned by each deputy postmaster as aforesaid to the Postmaster General, and by him into the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, together with his own accounts quarter-yearly.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That no assistant or deputy postmaster shall enjoy the privilege of franking; but instead thereof shall be allowed to pay out of the public fund in his hands, and charge for all letters he may send on the business of the Post Office Establishment: Provided always, That the amount thus expended be returned quarter-yearly, together with his general account, and as a part of the same, verified by oath or affirmation to the Postmaster General.

The bill was twice read and committed.

YAZOO CLAIMS.

The bill from the Senate for compensating certain claimants to lands in the Mississippi Territory, was taken up, and, having been once read, the question was stated, Shall the bill be read a second time?

A motion was made to lay the same on the table, but, at the earnest suggestion of Mr. FISK of Vermont, and Mr. LATTIMORE of Mississippi, was withdrawn.

Mr. TROUP, of Georgia, said he rose with great reluctance to move to reject the bill. There were only two considerations which could induce him to depart from the respect due to another branch of the Legislature; either that a measure emanating from it was unconstitutional or corrupt. It was because this measure had its origin in corruption he moved to reject the bill. When I say, sir, that this measure has its origin in corruption, I do not mean to be understood as charging corruption on the Senate—all I mean to be understood as saying, is, that this measure flows from corruption, as a stream flows from its source; it flows from the corrupt act of the Legislature of Georgia, of 1795. The bill proposes to give five millions of dollars to the Yazoo claimants. The Yazoo Legislature sold for five hundred thousand dollars—Georgia sold to the United States for one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars only, and you now propose to give five millions to the claimants to compromise their claim. How will we be able to account for this? How will posterity be able to account for it? Posterity will say that these claimants, like the gods of Milton, carried the mountains in their hands, and wielding the fifty millions of acres under the decision of the Supreme Court, have carried everything before them.

You know the history of this transaction, sir. On the 7th of January, 1795, the Legislature of Georgia sold to certain individuals, called the original grantees, fifty millions of acres of land for five hundred thousand dollars—every member who voted for the law, except one, whose name does not appear, was bribed and corrupted, that is to say, was interested in, and the party to the purchase. On the 13th of February, 1796, the subsequent Legislature declared the corrupt act null and void; ordered the record to be burnt, and authorized the grantees to withdraw the purchase money. The convention of the whole people soon after confirmed the rescinding act. On the same day, that is to say on the 13th of February, 1796, the Yazoo claimants purchased from the original grantees. The claimants say that they are innocent purchasers, without notice of the corruption—that an estate vested notwithstanding the corruption, and that they have a good title against you. It may be well to observe here that the claimants have constantly shifted their ground. At first they insisted that the Yazoo act of 1795, was a fair and honest act of legislation. As soon, however, as the report of your Commissioners, which exhibited the fraud in its nakedness, drove them from this ground—they insisted on the innocence of their purchase. Driven from this ground, they throw themselves on your mercy. Do not believe, sir, that the corruption in which this transaction was engendered was a corruption of any ordinary character; it was a corruption without example in history; may it never find a parallel! Not merely were the corrupted corrupted by the corrupters—the corrupters cheated the corrupted—the corrupters cheated one another, and the corrupters, as they say, cheated these claimants. The members of the Legislature were bribed with land and money: in some instances the member gave his vote, and the corrupter withheld the bribe; the member went home—he had lost his character—he had lost his bribe, and he died broken hearted in the bosom of his family. When the rescinding Legislature, in a spirit of liberality which became them, decreed that the original grantees might withdraw the purchase money, on producing certain evidence of their having made the deposit—such a scene of fraud, iniquity and depravity was exhibited, that the Governor, familiar as he had been with such scenes but a short time before, blushed and shut the doors of the treasury against them. Men concerned in this transaction, but who had not deposited one dollar, by perjury, forgery, or some other crime, drew thousands from the treasury; those of the speculators who had actually paid the money, were then defrauded by their brethren. On the other hand, some of the original grantees allege that they were cheated by these claimants—that the claimants gave them paper for their land, which paper turned out good for nothing. Thus, sir, you see this Yazoo transaction is a circle of fraud. It no doubt had a beginning, but it is certainly without end, unless you consummate it by this measure.

As good fortune will have it, Mr. Speaker, this is one of the plainest cases that can be presented to the understanding. The claimants either have a claim, or they have not. If they have a claim you may compromise a claim; if they have no claim, you cannot compromise no claim. If they have a claim, it is a claim to fifty millions of acres of land, and you ought to give it to them, and say no more about it. Could you entertain a thought for one moment to avail yourself of your power to do wrong and injustice to these impotent individuals? Surely no man will have the hardihood to say that the magnitude of the claim ought to weigh one tittle in the scale of justice. The claimants either have a title of fifty millions of acres, or they have not a title to a square foot. How do they derive the title? From the original grantees. How do the original grantees derive title? From the Yazoo Legislature of '95. Their title, therefore, must depend on the validity or invalidity of the Yazoo act of the Legislature of Georgia—it can depend on nothing else. If the Yazoo act was a good and valid act, an estate vested in the original grantees; the grantees passed the estate to these claimants, and the claimants have a good title against you. If the Yazoo act was a null and void act, no estate vested in the original grantees; if no estate vested in the original grantees, they could pass none to these claimants, and if no estate passed to these claimants, on what pretence can they set up the title against you? Are the Congress of the United States prepared to say that the Yazoo act, notwithstanding the corruption of the Representatives of the people, was a good and valid act? That it divested the public property out of the people and vested it in the grantees? Are the Congress of the United States prepared to say, that the Representatives of a free and virtuous people may fraudulently and corruptly betray that people, and barter their rights, and that the people are without remedy. That an estate did vest by the Yazoo act, which could not be divested by any subsequent act! Sir, it is impossible. This doctrine is too monstrous to be entertained by a moral people, who love liberty—it strikes at all virtue, at all morality—it overturns Republican Government. You cannot, you dare not, sanctify this doctrine. If you dare, one or two things must happen; the people are ready to approve it, or they are not—if they are, they have lost their virtue, and we must seek shelter under despotism; if they are not, you will go out and other men will come in. Not the gentlemen on the other side of the House—they never can come in—men will come in who will discountenance corruption, cherish virtue, and preserve the principles of the Government, pure and uncorrupted. I address myself to the Republican party; let them remember how they came into power. The Federalists had been charged with monarchical attachments; with cherishing corrupt principles of Government. The people believed it. They said the Government was not safe in such hands—they turned them out. You succeeded. The people said to you—take this sacred trust. Do your duty faithfully; preserve the principles of this happy Government pure and uncorrupted, and be ready to hand it over to your successors whenever you shall be required, more pure and uncorrupted than when you received it. Will you do so when you have decreed that the Representatives of the people may corruptly divest the estate of the people, and that they are without remedy? Yet, sir, this you must do the moment you decide to compromise this claim. But you have no reason, no motive, no apology, for thus deciding. I will take away from every unprejudiced man in the country every pretext, every apology for compromising this claim. I insist that the Yazoo Legislature had no Constitutional power to sell the land.

1st. I contend that the Legislature had no Constitutional power to sell.

2d. That if they had Constitutional power to Yazoo Claims.

H. OF R.

sell, they could not sell fraudulently and corruptly.

3d. That if, notwithstanding the fraud and corruption, an estate did vest in the original grantees, according to the decision of the Supreme Court, these claimants having notice of the fraud, are parties to it, and without title in law or equity.

There is no power given in the Constitution of Georgia, and without an express grant of power the Legislature cannot possess it. This is the doctrine distinctly, clearly, and unanimously maintained by the writers on public law. The reasons on which it is founded are as distinctly given. The people are seized, collectively and individually, of the public territory—it cannot be taken from them without their consent—it cannot be taken from them without their express consent—consent shall not be implied. 1st, because the power to sell the public domain is not a power incidental or necessary to the power of legislation. 2dly, because it is too important a power to be derived by implication or construction. Not only is this the universal doctrine of the publicists, of Grotius, Puffendorf, Vattel, Burlamaqui, and others, but it is the doctrine to which all our political institutions have conformed. In the Constitution of the United States, as well as the constitutions of the States, you see the doctrine clearly recognised. In the Constitution of the United States it is said “Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations concerning the public property.”—Why was this power expressly granted? Because the Convention knew that if not expressly granted it could not be derived by implication or construction. So, in the State constitutions, the doctrine is recognised: “the power to dispose of the public domain being in the people, cannot be taken from them without their consent.” I know it may be said that there is a difference between the United States and State constitutions, in the character of their powers—that in the United States Constitution all powers not delegated are reserved—that in the State constitutions all powers are delegated but those which are reserved. This is true, but by all powers is meant only all ordinary powers, all powers that are essential and necessary or incidental to the general power of legislation; extraordinary powers, powers not essential to the general power of legislation, are, even in the States, retained by the people, and cannot be divested out of them without their express consent. This power to dispose of the public domain is an extraordinary power; for, say the publicists one and all, this power is so essentially in the people, that even under the violent Governments of Europe, the despot has no power to dispose of the public domain without the express consent of the people. I know too it will be said that the State Legislatures have in some instances disposed of the public property without an express grant of power to warrant it. I answer that in every such instance the Legislature was guilty of usurpation, and the people not bound—that if the people pleased to yield a tacit acquiescence, well and good—they did so because their attention had not been called to the usurpation by a flagrant and palpable corruption—but will you believe that if in any such instance the usurpation had been coupled with a notorious corruption of their Representatives, they would not have resisted—that they would not have risen in mass, as did the people of Georgia, to put down the corruption and the corrupted?—a people who would not, must have lost their virtue and been ready for a tyrant. I say, therefore, the Yazoo Legislature of Georgia had no power to sell the public property.

But if the Legislature had Constitutional power to sell, it could not sell fraudulently and corruptly. Do you ask proof of this?—fraud and corruption vitiate every act, render it null and void ab initio; no contract, no obligation, can grow out of it. The powers granted by the people to their Legislatures, are granted in confidence that they will be fairly and honestly exercised. What would you think of the declaration of a constitution, “the powers herein granted shall be honestly exercised?” would you not consider such a declaration ridiculous, and ridiculous because superfluous? Is not the implication as strong as any expression could be, that every fraudulent act of legislation is merely void? Suppose it were written in any constitution, “the Legislature shall have no power fraudulently and corruptly to betray the people,” would you not too consider this ridiculous, and ridiculous because superfluous? Suppose it were written in any constitution, “the Legislature shall have power fraudulently and corruptly to sell the public property,” would not such a grant of power be merely void, though proceeding from the highest human authority, the people themselves? And why void? Because repugnant to the laws of God and nature; nay, sir, I go farther, I say the great God of Heaven himself could confer no such power—if the great God of Heaven were to decree “the Legislature shall have power fraudulently and corruptly to sell the public property,” the decree would be merely void, because inconsistent with his holy attributes. And yet, sir, the Senate require of us to do that which the God of Heaven himself cannot do—legalize fraud and corruption—they require us to declare that, notwithstanding the fraud and corruption of the Georgia Legislature, an estate did vest in the original grantees which it was competent to the grantees to transfer to the claimants; that the claimants have a title against you, and that to relinquish that title we must give them five millions of dollars. This is making war upon the people with a vengeance. To talk of the rights of the people after this is insult and mockery. But why is it that the corrupt act of the Representative is not binding on the people? For this plain reason, the corruption of the Representative must precede the corrupt act; the moment the Representative is corrupted, the moment he has betrayed his constituents, all ties and connexion between them are dissolved, and he is no more capable of binding them than the merest stranger. Any other doctrine makes Republican government a farce—makes morality and religion idle sound. If corruption can divest the estate of the people, it can do any other act—it can legalize murder, robbery, treason—it can give universal license to crime. I say, therefore, that if the Legislature of Georgia had Constitutional power to sell, it could not sell fraudulently and corruptly. The Yazoo act was merely void, and the rescinding act which declared it so was only form, the people were in possession, continued in possession, and were not divested by it.

3dly. If, notwithstanding the fraud and corruption, an estate did vest in the grantees, yet the claimants having notice of the fraud, are, according to the decision of the Supreme Court itself, guilty purchasers, without claim or shadow of claim. I say, sir, the claimants had notice. Let it be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that our Government differs from all other governments in this singular but valuable characteristic—it is limited by written constitutions. In other countries it is said the acts or the grants of the Government speak for themselves—nothing shall be admitted to contradict them. Not so in our country; every act or grant of the Government must be consistent with the written Constitution. Every man is presumed to carry the Constitution in his head or in his pocket, that he may at all times be ready to compare the acts of Government with the Constitution. If the claimants had done this, if they had compared the Yazoo act with the constitution of Georgia, they would have found no power in the constitution authorizing the Legislature to sell, and this circumstance alone would have put them upon their guard—at least this would have been the effect on all rational and prudent men.

But there was cause of suspicion on the very face of the act itself. The Legislature sold fifty millions of acres of as fine a country as any on the globe for five hundred thousand dollars. Would not prudent men looking at this single fact, have inquired how comes this? Would not prudent men about to embark in a speculation so enormous have thought it worth their while to send an agent from Boston to Georgia, to scrutinize and investigate the merits of this transaction? But, sir, these are circumstances to excite suspicion only. The people of Georgia themselves gave to the claimants the most prompt, direct, and unexceptionable notice. Remember that more than a year elapsed between the passage of the Yazoo act and the purchase by the claimants. The events which followed the passage of the Yazoo act portended a revolution in Georgia, as terrible and as bloody as the revolution of Paris or of La Vendée. If the claimants had lived in the farther India; if they had lived in the islands of the Pacific Ocean, they would have received notice long before they purchased. Scarce had the Yazoo act passed the Legislature when the whole country was in a ferment. The great body of the people, who, unlike their Representatives, remained uncorrupted and faithful to themselves, were everywhere in motion to counteract the projects of the traitors. Their grand juries and committees everywhere denounced the act an usurpation, called upon the country to assert its rights and to put down the corruption and the corrupted. General Jackson—Sir, I cannot think of General Jackson without speaking of him as a man of rare patriotism and integrity—a man who, if he had lived in the days of Rome's greatness, or rather of Rome's virtue, would have had his bust in the Capitol—I speak of him thus, because his memory is intimately connected with this transaction; he was the only man I ever did know who was at all times ready to lay down his life, to sacrifice his wife and children and his fortune to his country. General Jackson was at that time a Senator in Congress at Philadelphia; he was called by the people of Georgia, publicly called from his seat in Congress to aid in rescinding the usurped act—he obeyed. The address of the people and his answer were published in all the newspapers of the day. A man by the name of Thomas, one of the corrupted Senators, was murdered in his own house, that he together with his testimony (for he bore witness to the corruption and threatened to confess) might be consigned to oblivion. By some it was said the speculators had murdered him, by others that his indignant constituents had done the deed. The truth is, that the greatest efforts were necessary to restrain the people from acts of violence. Now, sir, all these things were done, not in secret to deceive the innocent purchasers of New England; they were done publicly and in the face of day; they were published in all the newspapers of the time, from Boston to Savannah; and yet these things were to the innocent purchasers of New England, as if they had never been. Yes, sir, if you believe the claimants they were as ignorant of them as the people of Crim Tartary. They tell you they never read newspapers. The mail running weekly between Boston and Savannah—the coasting trade open—and yet the claimants are innocent purchasers; for one whole year they heard not a word of what was passing in Georgia. If the mails had been stopped, if the coasting trade had been interrupted, if all communication had been cut off, this plea of ignorance might have been set up. In the then state of intercourse of the civilized world, if the claimants had lived in Batavia they would have had notice long before they purchased.

But there is other evidence of notice still more conclusive. On the 17th of February, 1795, that is to say six weeks after the passage of the Yazoo act, General Washington sent to Congress a public message to the following effect: "I have received copies of two acts of the Legislature of Georgia, one passed on the 28th of December, the other on the 7th January last, for appropriating and selling the Indian lands within the territorial limits claimed by that State. These copies, though not officially certified, have been transmitted to me in such a manner as to leave no room to doubt their authenticity. These acts embrace an object of such magnitude, and in their consequences may so deeply affect the peace and welfare of the United States, that I

'have thought it necessary now to lay them before Congress.'

Here then was notice to all the world, notice at least that something was wrong. General Washington, from the elevation of his high office, standing as it were on the top of Mount Sinai, with an angel voice, reaching the extremities of the earth, proclaimed, beware! A more distinct, audible, universal notice could not have been given to all mankind. The claimants heeded no more the warning of General Washington than they did the barking of a foist. Congress referred the message to a committee. The committee reported a resolution and bill authorizing the Executive to extinguish the title of Georgia to the country in question. With the Yazoo act before them, the committee did not deign to speak of the sale to the claimants, but, treating the Yazoo act as null and void, proceeded to treat with Georgia for the extinguishment of her title. The claimants say they never heard of the proclamation of General Washington. They never read newspapers.

But this is not all—the claimants stand convicted under their own hands and seals; they are guilty purchasers on the face of their own title deed. Not only did their title deed not contain a general warranty in their favor, it contained an express stipulation, that in no event would they, the claimants, go back upon the grantees from whom they purchased, for even the consideration money, on account of any defect in their title. Under their own hands and seals did the claimants covenant and agree that the grantees of whom they bought should not be liable to refund the purchase money, if their title turned out to be defective. Sir, this is a fact so extraordinary and incredible, that if it were not recorded on the title deed itself, I would hesitate to declare it. It is without example in transactions between man and man. Do you not see, but for this, the claimants would have resorted to the original grantees for their purchase money, with interest and damages; that is to say, they would have resorted to the same remedy as all other men do under like circumstances in every country; they would have recovered their purchase money paid for a consideration which had failed, for a title which had proven defective, with interest and damages—they would, in fact, have had all the remedy to which innocent purchasers, without notice, are entitled by the laws of any country. But they precluded themselves by their own act and deed, and because they have done so, are we bound to indemnify them? They have as much right to apply for indemnity to the Emperor of China. But there is another fact; the rescinding Legislature met in the beginning of January, '96—the claimants purchased on the 13th of February, '96—on the opening of the Legislature the preparatory motion was made to rescind the usurped act; the claimants, therefore, had six weeks to inform themselves of what was doing and what was about to be done in the Georgia Legislature, before they purchased. But there is another fact, which ought to be conclusive on this point—a gentleman from Massachusetts, many years a member of this House, resident in the neighborhood of Boston, uniformly declared they had notice; that gentleman, respectable for his good sense and integrity, intimately acquainted with the parties, constantly passing in and from Boston, perfectly familiar with the circumstances of the purchase, constantly affirmed that he was himself knowing to the corruption of the Georgia Legislature at the date of the purchase, and that the claimants were as knowing to it as himself. Here, then, is the testimony of a disinterested man. You oppose to it the declarations of the interested claimants. The truth is, the claimants had knowledge of the fraud. Like other speculators, they bought to sell again; all they wanted, was the wax and the parchment. They cared not a straw for anything else; for fraud or corruption, or defect of title, if it answered the purpose of the grantees, it would answer the purpose of the claimants; the claimants took the title deed for better for worse, and if they had not known that Congress might be teased and worried out of anything, they never would have had the effrontery to set up a claim against you.

But, it is said the commissioners reported in favor of a compromise. What does this amount to? No more than a report of a committee of the House, which you respect only as its merits may entitle it to respect. The commissioners investigated the claims; laid before you in all its nakedness the fraud and corruption, from beginning to end, and came to the conclusion which no man of common sense could avoid, that the claimants had no title whatsoever. Here, sir, the commissioners ought to have stopped; but, strange to say, they suggested to Congress the expediency of a compromise. What! you ask, is it possible that such men as Mr. Madison, Mr. Gallatin, and Mr. Lincoln, should have followed up such a conclusion by such a suggestion? No title, and yet recommend the compromise of a title! Never were two propositions more inconsistent. You will say there must have been some reason for this. I will tell you the reason: it was the same reason that operated on the 10th Congress to surrender the embargo—the clamor of a formidable party. The commissioners were surrounded by a host of claimants, as we are now; they found them a troublesome set, growing every day stronger and stronger. They yielded—they said, though they have no title, yet you had better give them money and send them about their business. This is all that can be said now.

But, it has been alleged, that the United States have engaged to compromise. Not so. The United States are as free to compromise, or not to compromise, as if nothing had been said or done on the subject. It is said that the United States are bound to compromise, because five millions were set apart by the articles of agreement and cession, for the indemnification of these and other claims. True! But on condition only, that Congress should, upon an investigation of the merits of the claims, believe that in right and justice, they ought to be compensated. The history of this part of the business is simply this: When the commissioners of the United States and of Georgia were negotiating the terms of purchase of the Mississippi Territory, the claimants got about them and harassed them with incessant importunity. The commissioners of the United States said to the commissioners on the part of Georgia, you see how we are embarrassed by these claimants; will it not be better to quiet them, by making a reservation in their favor? Never! indignantly answered the Georgia commissioners; we will never consent to compromise the infamous corruption. But, said the commissioners of the United States, will you not agree to make a conditional reservation, leaving it to the United States to make them compensation, or not, upon an investigation of the merits of their claim? To this the commissioners of Georgia could have no objection; it was a matter for the United States. They did object, however, to give any pledge whatsoever to compromise the claim. Nay, more; they insisted that if Congress did not within a year set apart the five millions of acres, it should never be in the power of Congress to compensate them at all, under any circumstances. The commissioners on the part of Georgia said to the commissioners of the United States: If the United States choose, at any time, to compromise this corruption, we cannot help it; but we will never give our sanction or countenance to it, because we believe the claim unfounded in right, justice, or morality; if you upon investigation think otherwise, here are the five millions of acres set apart, out of which you may compensate; if you can, even in foro conscientie, consent to compromise this corruption, be the shame and scandal of it upon you. The United States did accordingly within one year set apart the five millions of acres to compensate this and other claims, but upon the same condition and in the same words as the articles of agreement and cession; that is to say, upon condition that the United States upon an investigation of the merits of the claims, should determine they were founded in right and justice. The question is now as it has always been, are the claims founded in right and justice?

But to remove every impression that the United States are pledged in the remotest degree, I refer you to Mr. Gallatin himself, and to the report of a committee of the House, at the last session. Mr. Gallatin, in his letter addressed to Mr. Dana, the chairman of the Yazoo committee, dated 9th January, 1805, says, (speaking of the object of the reservation of the five millions,) "to leave it in their power to compromise with that description of claimants, by allowing so much of the surplus of five millions of acres as they might think proper, without, at the same time, pledging Government to enter into a compromise, if upon a full view of all the circumstances of the case, a different course was thought more eligible." Thus, you see, according to Mr. Gallatin, the United States are at perfect liberty to compromise or not, at their discretion, as if no articles of agreement and cession had ever been entered into; as if no law had ever been passed setting apart the five millions of acres. Your committee appointed on this subject at the last session of the last Congress, say the same thing. Their language is, "Congress is not bound to compromise, if, upon an investigation of the merits of the claims, they shall be found unsupported by right and justice." The assertion, therefore, that the Government is pledged, is a mere pretext, as is every other reason assigned for the compromise.

But it is contended that the Supreme Court have decided in favor of the claimants and against the United States; that it is better to give up a part than to lose the whole. Sir, there is no danger of our losing the whole or a part, if we will do our duty to ourselves and to the country. The Supreme Court cannot decide the rights of the United States in a case to which the United States not only were not a party, but to which they cannot, by any Constitutional possibility, be a party without their consent. The case of Fletcher and Peck was a decision of a feigned issue, made up between two speculators, to decide certain points, in the decision of which they were interested. Will any man, in his senses, say that the right of the United States to the public property could be affected by such decision? This doctrine is almost as shocking as the other doctrine set up in support of the compromise. The representatives of the people may betray the people, and the people are without remedy. I trust, sir, that neither the one or the other will be countenanced by you; but that you will, without hesitation, reject the bill. Whenever it is conceded that it is competent to the Supreme Court, in a case between A and B, to take from the United States fifty millions of acres of land, it will be time for the Government to make a voluntary surrender of the public property to whosoever will have it. The public property would be nothing but an expense, an encumbrance, which it would be profitable to shake off with as little delay as possible. No, sir; the Government is the guardian, the trustee of the public property. Like all Governments, they must of necessity determine their own rights of property; and if they remain faithful to those rights, all the decisions of all the judicial tribunals under Heaven cannot deprive you of a square acre of the public land. But, sir, I am tired and disgusted with this subject. I hope the bill will be rejected.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, took the floor in reply to Mr. TROUP, and commenced by a brief statement of the case, nearly as follows. The Legislature of Georgia, in the year 1795, by an act, (the title of which he recited,) sold the lands now in controversy, and received into the Treasury of Georgia the whole purchase money, or so much as the act required, and received in return an act duly authenticated of the State of Georgia, conveying the land, from the Governor of that State. In December of the same year, the Legislature of the same State declared that act to be null and void. The first act, indeed, contrary to the opinion of the gentleman who has just sat down, had been considered to be authorized by the Constitution of Georgia, for the Legislature not only repealed it, but a convention was called, and the Constitution changed so as to wrest from the Legislature a power they had corruptly exercised. By these acts the Legislature recognised the Constitutional power of the former Legislature to sell the land, and the validity of the act itself. By the Constitution of the United States, full faith and credit were required to be given to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of each State. Now a statute was a record of the first order, and to it full faith and credit must be given, unless they meant to tear this leaf out of the Constitution. The act of Georgia was formal and precise, conveying land for a certain consideration, and in virtue thereof the land was conveyed. Could a lawyer be found on earth, on the production of this evidence, who would go into the inquiry whether the body which passed that act had been corrupt or not? The sovereignty of a State resided in the Legislature. The acts done under any law passed by a Legislature must be valid, and though it may be repealed in future, those proceedings cannot be invalidated. If a compromise of claims thus valid could be effected, he felt it to be his duty to make it, and he believed the interests of the country imperiously to require it. Though the ways of justice may be slow, they will be sure, and if a compromise be not effected, the claimants will obtain the whole of their demand. But the gentleman from Georgia had, in conclusion, remarked that the courts had surreptitiously decided this case. The parties might have brought it surreptitiously before the court, but the court had no share in it, for their wish was to decrease rather than to increase the business of the court. But the case had been decided on a suit, the investigation of which brought before the court all the circumstances, and the court had decided that payment of a bond given for the purchase of a part of this claim could not be withheld on the ground that the claim was not fairly acquired. It had been alleged, and it was no doubt true, that the first purchase was corrupt and fraudulent; but the claim did not. Mr. W. contended, now rest on its original merits; if it did, he should be as decidedly opposed to it as any one. Mr. W. then quoted the act reserving five millions of acres of the land ceded by Georgia to the United States, for the purpose of covering such claims, evidently intending the claims contemplated by this act, as should be brought forward hereafter, and entered into an investigation of its object, and the motives of those who advocated it. He adverted to the clamor by which this subject had been confused heretofore, and to the typographical denunciations which condemned many a man unjustly, without meeting him fairly on his motives. He said he should not go back to consider the original question of the validity of this claim, which, however, had been established by the decision of the Supreme Court, because the commissioners had determined that if these persons would accept of five millions of acres in lieu of their claim, they should have it. The claim, however, was one which every judiciary in the world would declare perfect; and would not any one be deemed a madman, after a decision of the Supreme Court against him, who would refuse to receive a relinquishment of the claim adjudged against him, when he could obtain it for a tenth part of its amount? The former rejection of a bill of the same nature as this, Mr. W. said, was owing to out-of-door clamor, and the denunciations he had before referred to, which had caused it to be rejected without a consideration of the merits of the question. The geographical position of the claimants of this land, he further said, ought to induce the House not now to reject it again without due consideration. There never was a case so surrounded with authority as was the compromise embraced in the bill now before the House. A Secretary of State, (now President,) a Secretary of the Treasury, and an Attorney General, on behalf of the General Government, and three Representatives from Georgia, on behalf of that State, had combined to recommend it. He again adverted to the advantages this mode of settlement offered to the Government, and dwelt on it at some length, as well as on the sanctity of the title of the present claimants under the decision of the Supreme Court, against whose awards he hoped never to see the bayonet employed. He feared not to advocate this bill on account of the clamor against it. Let justice be done though the heavens fall. With the views of the case he had taken, Mr. W. said he was prepared to let the bill take the usual course of all bills in this House, and therefore, was against rejection.

After the interchange of a few further remarks, in a low tone of voice, between Mr. TROUP and Mr. WRIGHT—

Mr. FARROW, of South Carolina, spoke at considerable length against the bill. We shall only attempt a recapitulation of the principal points of his speech. He stated briefly the facts of the case. If the first act of Georgia was lawful and proper, no subsequent act of repeal could rescind or impair contracts under it. But the original act was void, on the principle that any deed or grant obtained by fraud is null; and on the other hand, though the repealing act was nugatory, the honest intention of the Legislature who passed it was shown by the idea it held out that any money paid under the former act should be refunded to the claimants. After some general remarks on the nature of contracts and conveyances, he remarked, that if you constitute an agent you are bound by his acts performed under authority; but if he openly and wickedly engage in a fraudulent transaction to injure you, he is no longer in the eye of the law your agent; you are no longer responsible for his acts. That there was fraud in this case was beyond question, as was proved by abundant evidence, some of which Mr. F. quoted. It had been said, also, that the present claimants were purchasers without notice, and therefore guiltless of the fraud, and entitled to their claim. Mr. F. denied that they were purchasers without notice, and cited dates, circumstances, and documents to show that they were not. But it had been said the Government was pledged on this head. If that were a fact, Mr. F. said it was a stubborn one, and would decide his vote. But the Government was not pledged. He had in vain looked for any act pledging them, and defied gentlemen to point it out to him. Neither the compact with Georgia nor the subsequent acts of Congress contained any such pledge. As to this compromise proposed, how did Congress know the claimants would accept it? Would it not be binding on the United States without being at all obligatory on the claimants? He believed it would; and being therefore opposed to the bill in every point of view, should vote to reject it.

H. of R.

Yazoo Claims.

MARCH, 1854.

Mr. LATTIMORE, of Mississippi, expressed his admiration of the zeal of the gentleman from Georgia, but could not think it correctly applied. What would be the consequence of the defeat of this compromise? Did gentlemen mean to publish those who were guilty for the fraud committed in this transaction? If they did, they would miss their aim. They had almost universally sold out their claims to second persons. The original purchasers were generally persons who had sustained a good reputation and all that distinction in life which wealth is calculated to excite. Even if they desired to punish second purchasers, they would miss their aim; for they were also secure. The Supreme Court, from which there is no appeal, had decided the principle in favor of them. What then would be the consequence of refusing to compromise these claims? The people of Mississippi Territory, who live on the land embraced by these claims, will suffer; the blow will fall on the devoted heads of those who have acquired rights under Spanish and American grants, and for whom no reparation is provided. I have been asked, said he, what part of the Mississippi Territory is embraced in the claim, and I have endeavored to inform myself. It embraces two-thirds of a territory four hundred miles square. What settlements are put in danger? A strip of territory extending from Tombigbee to the Mississippi is not embraced; every other settlement, plantation, and house, in the Mississippi Territory is involved and in danger. The gentleman from Georgia says, if their claim be good, give the claimants the whole fifty millions of acres, and say no more about it. Say no more about it! Are the people of Mississippi to be turned from their homes, to sustain all the consequences, and no reparation to be made them? As to this project of a compromise, Mr. L. said, he was not particularly partial to it, though he had reason to think favorably of it, because of the source whence it had emanated, and because it was the only one that had ever been proposed. What would be the course, he asked, these claims would take, if no compromise took place? So soon as there should be a court in that Territory with federal jurisdiction, an action of ejectment would be brought. He had himself, he said, before now, seen the bloody consequences of an action of ejectment in individual cases; and what would they be when a whole community of twenty thousand persons were to be ejected, evicted, driven from possession? He did not speak of things as he wished, but as he apprehended; and he called upon the House to protect that people from consequences which he was fearful would be realized. The other branch of the Legislature had performed a solemn duty in passing this bill, and it now rested with this House to preserve the rights and peace of the people of the Territory he represented, to preserve them from litigation and vexation, from distress, from blood.

Mr. HALL, of Georgia, produced a record of the date of purchases of the present claimants to show that they had notice of this most fraudulent transaction that ever disgraced this nation. He denied the power of the Legislature of Georgia in any way to have sold the land in question, and called on gentlemen to point it out.

Mr. FISK, of Vermont, spoke decidedly against rejection. He acknowledged the atrocity of the fraud of the transaction; but claims had arisen under it, on which some decision, ought to be speedily made, as well to settle the course of proceeding, as to put an end to the feelings it created in this House. Even our laws on general subjects had features in them, he said, produced by the agitation of this question, which posterity would always regret. Another reason for deciding at once, and solemnly this question was, that the very evidence of the fraud, which no pains had been taken legally to perpetuate, was decaying and wearing out of existence, and in a few years even that could not be introduced against their claims in a court of justice. The propriety of quieting the minds of settlers, indeed every consideration, concurred to require an immediate decision, &c.

Mr. INGERSOLL, of Pennsylvania, professing himself unprepared to decide understandingly on this very interesting question, moved to lay the further consideration of the bill on the table. For the motion 60, against it 81.

This motion being lost, Mr. I. moved to adjourn, which motion was also lost—yeas 61.

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, stated that he should vote against rejection, because it was an unusual course; without deciding at present how he should finally vote on the bill.

Mr. FISK, of New York, made nearly the same avowal; adding that he thought a rejection of the bill would not be respectful to the other branch of the Legislature.

Mr. INGERSOLL, of Pennsylvania, said he was placed in such a situation now that he must vote against the bill; for doing which he would assign but one reason—that whatever were the merits of the controversy in relation to these claims, this bill was not calculated to settle it.

The question was about to be taken by yeas and nays; and

Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, rose, and was proceeding to explain at length the reason why he should vote against the rejection; when, on motion of Mr. WRIGHT, and with consent of Mr. O. to the motion, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 9.

The engrossed bill for the relief of Joshua Sands; the engrossed bill for the adjustment of the land titles in the State of Louisiana and the Missouri Territory; and the engrossed bill making appropriations for the support of Government during the year 1814, were severally read a third time and passed.

YAZOO CLAIMS.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business, being a motion to reject the bill for indemnifying certain claimants to land in the Mississippi Territory.

Mr. OAKLEY rose and observed that he had yesterday remarked to the House that it was with reluctance that he should enter into an examination of the subject at the present stage of the discussion, and he was still of the same opinion. He did not flatter himself that he could make an impression on the mind of any gentleman in the House; and feeling satisfied that a majority of the House would not be disposed to reject the bill at once, which had the sanction of a very large majority of the other branch of the Legislature, and feeling no disposition to interfere with the passage of other bills, particularly the appropriation bill which was on the table, he felt a disposition on his part to let the question be taken without delay. He would merely remark in reply to those who objected to the bill, on the ground that it did not settle the controversy, that that was no reason for its rejection, because the bill might be amended, either in a Committee of the Whole, or by a reference to a select committee. He hoped that gentlemen who were in favor of the principle, but who objected to the details of the bill, would let it go to a committee, where amendments might be made. In relation to one important fact relied on by the gentlemen from Georgia and South Carolina, (Messrs. TROUP and FARROW,) with respect to the claimants having notice of the fraud, he would say a few words. It was said that General WASHINGTON's Message to Congress, or as it has been called, his proclamation, gave them notice; by a recurrence to the Message, it will be seen that it is inapplicable. In the first place it does not appear that it was made public, but even had it been, it was known that the United States did not admit the right of the land to be in the State of Georgia; it was known that a controversy existed on the subject. What says the Message itself? "That the lands sold were within the territorial limits claimed by the State of Georgia." General WASHINGTON having received those acts of the Legislature of Georgia, by which the lands in controversy were sold to individuals, very properly communicated them to Congress. He would ask if any human being who was acquainted with these circumstances could have believed at the time that General WASHINGTON meant to give notice of the fraud practised in the sale. But the gentleman from Georgia, on the subject of notice, observed, that although this was conclusive, yet there was another circumstance still more conclusive, and that was the deeds themselves, which stipulated that the grantors should not, if the State of Georgia had no title, be obliged to refund the purchase money. If the gentleman would recur to the historical facts, he would recollect that the Spanish Government at that time was in possession of a large part of the land, and that the United States had a claim to it; the purchasers were willing to purchase the title of the State of Georgia, and to run the risk of other claimants. It was purchased by the original grantors on speculation, and sold in the same manner; of course they would not warrant the title; if they warranted the title there could be no inducement for them to sell it at less than the real value. The clause stating that in the event of the State of Georgia having no title, the sellers would not refund, was only inserted by way of greater caution; it was in order to avoid any dispute. He had intimated his determination, at this time, to let the question be taken, but he flattered himself that if the House would hereafter give him an opportunity to discuss the merits of the bill he would show that the claimants had a legal right to the lands; and, admitting that they had not, that there were many considerations of the most imperious nature which would justify a compromise with them.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, made a few observations on the great importance of this subject, and the imposing authorities by which the recommendation of a compromise is surrounded. Under such circumstances, and the pledge which he contended had been given by the Government to compromise the claim as now proposed, he hoped the bill would not be rejected, &c.

Mr. TROUP, of Georgia, replied to the latter argument, and denied that any pledge in this respect had been given by the Government.

Mr. PITKIN, of Connecticut, rose to remark only upon one argument which had been used in the discussion upon this question—that the present claimants had notice before purchase of the fraud. He said the subject had come before the judicial tribunals in Connecticut, where many of the purchasers resided, and it had been incontrovertibly proved that the first purchasers under the act were totally ignorant of the fraud. The purchase, he said, was divided into shares, called scrip, like bank stock, and passed by delivery, entitling the holder to such quantities of land as were therein named. He well knew some of the original grantees who were there selling the scrip or stock, and it was represented that no fraud had taken place.

Mr. MURFREE, of North Carolina, observed that this subject was acknowledged to be of great importance, affecting the claims of a large body of settlers on the public lands, and he therefore trusted it would not be hastily decided. He was not certain, he said, that he should vote for the compromise at all, because, in the first place, he did not know that the agents of the company were authorized to accept it; and secondly, because he believed the United States could make a better bargain with them. But for the purpose of examining these points, and of further investigation, he trusted the bill would not be rejected, but suffered to take the usual course. As the bill at present stood, he said he should vote against its passage, but he was not willing to preclude discussion and amendment by premature rejection.

The question on the motion to reject the bill, was decided in the negative by the following vote :

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Bard, Barnett, Beall, Bowen, Brown, Burwell, Caldwell, Calhoun, Conard, Crawford, Cuthbert, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Earle, Eppes, Evans, Farrow, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Grundy, Hall, Hawes, Hungerford, Ingersoll, Ingham, Johnson of Virginia, Kennedy, Kerr, Lefferts, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKim, McLean, Moore, Nelson, Newton, Ormsby, Piper, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Roane, Smith of Pennsylvania, Stanford, Tannehill, Telfair, Troup, Udree, and Whitehill—56.

NAYS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bayly of Virginia, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brigham, Caperton, Champion, Cilley, Clark, Comstock, Cooper, Cox, Creighton, Culpeper, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Dewey, Ely, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forney, Gaston, Geddes, Grosvenor, Hale, Harris, Hufty, Irving, Jackson of Rhode Island, Jackson of Virginia, Kent of New York, Kent of Maryland, Kilbourn, King of Massachusetts, King of North Carolina, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Lowndes, Markell, McKee, Miller, Moffitt, Montgomery, Moseley, Murfree, Oakley, Parker, Pickering, Pickens, Pitkin, Post, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Rich, Richardson, Ridgely, Robertson, Rugles, Seybert, Sherwood, Shipperd, Skinner, Smith of New Hampshire, Smith of New York, Smith of Virginia, Stockton, Stuart, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Taylor, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Webster, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Williams, Wilson of Massachusetts, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Winter, Wood, Wright, and Yancey—92.

The bill was then read a second time by its title.

Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, moved to refer the bill to a select committee.

This motion gave rise to a desultory conversation between Messrs. INGERSOLL of Pennsylvania, MACON of North Carolina, LATTIMORE of Mississippi, STANFORD of North Carolina, MCKEE of Kentucky, TROUP of Georgia, and YANCEY of North Carolina, as to the propriety of referring it to a Committee of the Whole, the Committee of Claims, and the Committee of Public Lands, and motions for these several objects were successively rejected.

The motion for a reference to a select committee prevailed by a large majority.

Mr. GRUNDY, of Tennessee, then rose to move the adoption of the following instruction to the select committee.

Resolved, That the committee appointed on the above bill be instructed to report the evidence of the authority vested in the agent now attending to compromise the claims set up by the respective claimants.

Mr. G. said that as a majority of this House appeared to be of opinion with the Senate, that a compromise could and ought to be effected, it was a great object that any law passed on this subject should be so passed as to be effectual. That it might be effectual, too great caution could not be exercised in examining the authority under which these agents acted. Mr. G. said he had voted to reject the bill, and should vote against any bill which might be passed on the subject; but if such an act were to pass, he was anxious that it should be in such manner as should attain the views of its advocates.

Mr. STANFORD, of North Carolina, trusted, as the subject was referred to a committee, that they would be instructed to make a detailed report on the merits of this, perhaps, the most base and abominable claim the world ever knew, whose origin was so corrupt and revolting to the mind of every honest man. He, therefore, moved to amend the resolution so as to require the committee to make a "detailed report."

This motion was opposed by Mr. OAKLEY as unnecessary on a subject so fully understood, and so frequently reported on in both branches of the Legislature.

Some incidental remarks were made by Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, in favor of printing all the documents relating to this claim, of which, although heretofore printed, he had been unable to find a copy in the common Library of the House, and he believed it would be difficult to find a complete copy, nor perhaps the whole of the originals, in the possession of the Clerk of the House.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, remarked that these documents had been twice or thrice printed for the use of the House, and he had no doubt there were a sufficient number of copies within reach of the members. To reprint them now would require a longer time than was allowed for the duration of the present session.

Mr. STANFORD confirmed the statement of the difficulty in obtaining a complete copy of these documents, and adverted to a copy once belonging to the House, out of which some interested Yazoo claimant, he supposed, (for no other person would think of doing it) had with a knife cut all those leaves of the book which contained the important evidence of the fraud of the transaction.

The motion of Mr. STANFORD to amend the motion of Mr. GRUNDY was negatived. For the motion 53, against it 70.

Mr. INGERSOLL, of Pennsylvania, rose to move to add to the proposed resolution the following amendment:

"And that the committee be further instructed to ascertain and report to the House the amount of money actually paid by bona fide third purchasers for grants or titles they may hold under the original grant."

Mr. I. said his object was to ascertain the amount of losses for which these third purchasers claimed indemnity. He took it for granted, that Congress would not return more than the principal of money actually paid by them for these claims, and the interest where it was equitably due. He was desirous that this business, which began in an enormous scene of speculation, should not also end in a like manner.

Mr. OAKLEY questioned the practicability of the object, to which he had no other objection, except the labor with which he thought it would unnecessarily burden the committee.

Mr. INGERSOLL modified his motion by inserting therein the words if practicable, and thus modified, his motion was agreed to.

Mr. STANFORD objected to the particularity of the motion as it now stood—referring only to one species of claim. Now, Mr. S. said, that was not the only Yazoo claim. A previous act had been passed by the Legislature of Georgia, selling a part of the very land embraced in this claim. That was also a Yazoo purchase, and ought to be embraced in the inquiry. Mr. S. did not, however, make any motion on that head.

Mr. HALL, of Georgia, said that it would be recollected that the Legislature of Georgia had passed an act subsequent to the grant of the original grantees authorizing the withdrawal by them of the money which they had paid into the treasury of Georgia, under which $310,000 of the money had been actually withdrawn. With a reference to this fact, he moved to amend the resolution, by adding thereto the following words:

“Also, from which of the original companies the present claimants derive title, and the amount of money withdrawn by any of the original grantees, or their agent or agents, from the treasury of Georgia.”

This motion was further modified, on the suggestion of Mr. STANFORD, by adding the words, or persons claiming under them, after the word grantees.

Mr. WRIGHT remarked, that gentlemen appeared to him to be carving out for the committee more work than they could possibly go through during this session. He could not but think the intention was to delay the business, so as to defeat indirectly an object which the House had directly determined should be acted on during the present session. He concluded by moving that the resolution and amendments be laid on the table.

This motion was negatived.

Mr. OAKLEY objected to Mr. HALL's motion, because the facts required to be ascertained could have no influence in the decision on the question of a compromise of the claims now before the House, because they acquired all the title they possessed between the passage of the first act by the Legislature of Georgia in January, 1795, and the passing of the rescinding act in February, 1796. Under the latter act it was that the grantees had gone in and withdrawn the purchase-money from the Treasury of Georgia, after they had transferred their claims to other hands. They had thus committed a second fraud, which, however base and unjustifiable, did not affect the titles of those who purchased from them in the intermediate time. The bill contained a provision that the United States might sue for and recover from these persons the money thus withdrawn; but the facts required—which it might be difficult to ascertain—had no bearing on the question before the House, and he was therefore opposed to the proposed amendment.

After some further conversation between Mr. ALSTON of North Carolina, and Mr. WRIGHT and Mr. BARNETT of Georgia—the latter of whom expressed his opinion that an inquiry into this subject would unfold some curious circumstances not generally known, respecting the withdrawal of this money from the treasury of Georgia—Mr. HALL's amendment was agreed to; the first clause of it without opposition, and the latter clause by a vote, by yeas and nays, of 71 to 69, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. The question was then stated on the adoption of the whole resolution, as amended, in the following words:

Resolved, That the committee to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled “An act for the indemnification of certain claimants to lands in the Mississippi Territory,” be instructed to report the evidence of the authority vested in the agents now attending to compromise the claims set up by the respective claimants; and that the committee be further instructed to ascertain, if practicable, and report to the House, the amount of money actually paid by bona fide third purchasers for grants or titles they may hold under the original grant; also, from which of the original companies the present claimants derive title, and the amount of money withdrawn by any of the original grantees, or persons claiming under them, or their agent or agents, from the treasury of Georgia:

And the same was agreed to. For agreeing to it 73, against it 65, as follows:

THURSDAY, March 10.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections on the contested election of Thomas K. Harris, a member from Tennessee; and after a speech of some length from Mr. KENNEDY, of North Carolina, on some Constitutional points involved in it, the question was taken on the report, and Mr. HARRIS was confirmed in his seat by a large majority.

The bill for the relief of Mary Cheever passed through a Committee of the Whole, and, after some debate, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill authorizing the payment for private property destroyed by the enemy whilst in the public service, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and, after much discussion and several material amendments, was, on motion of Mr. FISK, of New York, ordered to lie on the table.

COPPER CURRENCY.

Mr. SEYBERT, of Pennsylvania, said he was about to offer a resolution for the consideration of the House, the propriety of which had been suggested by several gentlemen. Letters have been received, in which it is stated, that many persons are now engaged in melting the copper coins of the United States. This was occasioned by the present enhanced price of copper. Copper sheets were now selling at from sixty to seventy cents per pound. Those who melted the cents coined at the Mint of the United States, would gain from twenty to thirty per cent. These proceedings, he had been told, had already occasioned much inconvenience in some situations in the United States, and it was apprehended it would injure those who were least able to suffer. To some the amount might seem inconsiderable and unworthy of legislative interposition. But, by the report of the Director of the Mint, it appears that the copper coined in the year

1810	amounted to	-	-	$15,660
1811	"	"	-	2,495
1812	"	"	-	10,755
1813	"	"	-	4,180

Making a total for 4 years of $33,090.

Or an average of $8,272 per annum, which, for the last twenty years, would be $165,440. A much greater amount of these coins must now be in circulation; but the inducement to those who had already commenced to melt them, must be sufficient to continue their operations, and thus injuriously to diminish the circulating medium. His resolution was in the following words:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of altering the copper coins of the United States."

The motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. FISK, of New York, rose to make a motion which he said he had in contemplation ever since he examined the provisions of the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means for the establishment of a National Bank. Whatever might be his opinion as to the expediency of a bank for national purposes, he did not know that this was the proper moment for erecting such an institution, because, when Congress had just authorized the sale of stock to the amount of twenty-five millions, it would certainly be inexpedient to create a demand for so large an amount of other stock. But, if it was expedient, or whenever it shall be, every one who had read the bill must perceive that a bill containing such provisions would not, could not pass. He therefore moved that the Committee of the Whole, to whom is referred the bill to incorporate the stockholders of the National Bank, be discharged from the consideration thereof, and that it be referred to a select committee, with instructions to report a bill to establish a National Bank, with provisions for branches.

Mr. SEYBERT, of Pennsylvania, said he was opposed to this motion. He thought it would be highly improper, if it was referred to a committee at all, to refer this subject to a select committee, when it properly belonged to the standing committee, to which was referred all subjects relating to the Ways and Means, and to the credit of the Government. Mr. S. related the course of this subject had taken during this session. In the first instance, it had been introduced into the House by a petition from the citizens of New York, which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. The committee had reported that in their opinion it was not Constitutional to establish branches in the States. It was now proposed again to refer this question to a committee—for what? To inquire into the expediency of establishing a Bank with branches, against which so pointed a report had already been made.

MARCH, 1814.

Proceedings.

H. of R.

What could the gentleman promise himself from this course? Nothing but defeat. The question was one of considerable magnitude, which there was during this session no time to investigate. Mr. S. said he had been and should be opposed to the bill; and, on a former occasion, several of the States had declared their opposition to such a proposition. To keep the question before the House, would do an injury to the nation, in regard to its public stock. There were men here who were highly interested in the fate of this question, and who, during its agitation, would doubtless dissuade their friends from embarking in the loan. He hoped this motion would not prevail, but that the bill now before the House would be taken up at a proper time and heard on its merits.

Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, stated the course this question had taken in the Committee of Ways and Means. When the question was referred to them they had decided against the constitutionality of the measure as then proposed; and, as so much argument had heretofore taken place on the subject, they thought it would be better now to place the naked question before the House, to enable them to decide in the first instance whether the Constitution did vest in Congress the power to establish a National Bank. This report of the Committee of Ways and Means was referred to a Committee of the Whole; but, by discharging that Committee from the further consideration of the report, and referring it back to the Committee of Ways and Means with particular instructions, the House had waived the Constitutional question, and directed an inquiry into the expediency of establishing a Bank within the District of Columbia. A majority of the committee believed it would be expedient, though he himself did not think so, and did not agree to the report. If the gentleman was disposed to try the question of establishing branches to the Bank, it would be easier to do so by ingrafting a proposition to that effect on the present bill. It would be better, if recommitted, however, that the bill should be referred to a select committee, and not to the Committee of Ways and Means, who had already expressed their opinion on the subject.

Mr. FISK said he did not know that the question could be acted on at the present session, but that was one of the points he wished to be inquired into. The question was of so much importance that he wished it to be examined in all its bearings; and, if it could not be acted on at the present session, that the public opinion on it might be concentrated before the next. The agitation of this question, he presumed, would not create any difficulty in procuring the loan, when it was recollected that every Legislature in the Union almost was principally engaged during its sessions in establishing new banks. He thought the establishment of a great bank would rather have a tendency to check the extravagant issue of paper, and, if he might be allowed the expression, to bring the community to its senses. It had been said that though the incorporation of a National Bank was unconstitutional, yet it might be established in this District, where Congress possesses exclusive jurisdiction. He said that he should be alarmed by such a construction, if it were to prevail, that Congress might within this District do the most unconstitutional acts. Such a bank was certainly not necessary for the use of people within this District. To establish such a bank with this view would be as preposterous as it would be to build fifty sail-of-the-line, under a pretence of protecting the city by sailing along the canal which runs through it. There was in the District as much natural capacity to employ the one as the other. In regard to the principle of exclusive legislation in the District, Congress had decided it not to exist in the extent now contended for, when they acquiesced in the views of the President in putting his veto to the bill for incorporating a church in the town of Alexandria, because of the unconstitutional connexion of religion with the powers of the Government. A very cursory view of the bill now before the House would show that it was not intended for the use of the good people within the District, because so few of the directors were located within it. Mr. F. adverted to other objectionable features of the bill, by way of proving that, if a National Bank was necessary, this bill was not calculated to answer the object.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, made a few observations on the propriety of acting on this subject speedily. Though he had reported this bill, it was not a favorite project. He was in favor of reporting a bill with very different provisions, but a majority had overruled him, and decided that it was not Constitutional to establish a Bank with branches.

Mr. ALSTON, of North Carolina, observed that gentlemen might obtain their object without recommitting the bill, by moving a resolution, and obtaining a vote thereon, that it was or was not expedient to establish a Bank with branches.

The question was taken on Mr. FISK's motion, and decided in the negative—ayes 36.

FRIDAY, March 11.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, reported a bill for the relief of Seth Russell and sons; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-day.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill authorizing the Secretary of State, during the continuance of the present war, to make an additional allowance to the owners and masters of vessels for bringing back to the United States destitute and distressed American seamen; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EPPES also reported a bill for the relief of Augustus McKinnery and Laysel Bancroft; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EPPES reported a bill for the relief of Arthur Tappan, John Frothingham, and Etham Eaton; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EPPES also made a report on the resolution instructing the committee to inquire into the expediency of increasing the compensation allowed by law to the Commissioner of Loans for the State of Maryland; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TROUP, on his own motion, was excused from serving on the committee to whom was referred the bill from the Senate "providing for the indemnification of certain claimants of public lands in the Mississippi Territory," and Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, was appointed on the said committee in his place.

The engrossed bill for the relief of Mary Cheever (allowing her a pension of $100 a year as a gratuity from Congress in consideration of the distinguished bravery of her two sons, John and Joseph Cheever, slain on board the frigate Constitution in her engagement with the Java) was read a third time, and passed.

The bill declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, (which act apportions the direct tax in a different manner from that described in the act laying the tax) passed through Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of Joseph W. Page passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of the owners of the cargo of the Spanish brig Patriota passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of Seth Russell and sons passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be and they are hereby instructed to inquire into the justice and expediency of increasing the salary of the District Judge for the District of Massachusetts, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The bill confirming certain claims to lands in the Illinois Territory, and providing for their location, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of Henry Malcom passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of George Walkington passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of Daniel Macauley and Samuel Ralston passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House spent some time in Committee of the Whole, on the bill to incorporate an Insurance Company in Georgetown, in the District of Columbia; the Committee reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

The resolution reported by the Committee of Public Lands in favor of Dennis Clarke, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was agreed to by the House, and referred back to the committee to report a bill accordingly.

The bill to alter the time for holding the District Courts of the United States for the Virginia district, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of Stephen Girard passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

SATURDAY, March 12.

Mr. MOORE presented the petition of the President and Managers of the Columbia Turnpike Road, in the State of Maryland, praying permission to open and turnpike a road from Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, to the line of the said District, so as to intersect the Columbia Turnpike Road.—Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. MURFREE, from the committee to whom was referred the petitions from sundry inhabitants of the State of North Carolina, reported a bill authorizing the President to cause certain parts of the coast of the United States to be surveyed; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

On motion of Mr. McKIM, the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures were directed to bring in a bill to revive, and continue in force, an act, entitled "An act to revive, and continue in force, 'An act declaring the assent of Congress to certain acts of the States of Maryland and Georgia,'" passed on the 20th of April, 1808.

An engrossed bill declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the State of Tennessee, therein mentioned, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill providing for certain claims to land in the Illinois Territory, and providing for their location, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Henry Malcolm was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill for the relief of George Walkington was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Daniel Macauley and Samuel Ralston was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill to alter the time for holding the district courts of the United States, for the Virginia district, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Joseph W. Page was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill for the relief of the owners of the cargo of the brig Patriota was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Seth Russell and sons was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Stephen Girard was read the third time, and passed.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill supplementary to the act for the relief of the officers and soldiers who served in the late campaign on the Wabash. The Committee rose and reported the bill with an amendment, which was concurred in by the House, and the bill as amended ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of Wm. H. Savage passed through a Committee of the Whole, was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, the Committee of the Whole was discharged from the consideration of the bill relative to the organization of the courts of the Indiana Territory, and the same was recommitted to the Judiciary Committee.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill and the amendments reported by the select committee thereto, for the better organizing, paying, and supplying, of the Army of the United States.

Mr. TROUP, of Georgia, explained in a particular manner the objects of the bill; the passage of which he urged, on the ground generally that it would place a certain part of the Military Establishment upon a better footing, would economise the public resources, and supply some material defects which at present existed in the Military Establishment.

The bill received various unimportant amendments, which were reported to the House and concurred in, and the bill and amendments ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Judiciary Committee on the petition of Robert C. Cochran, Marshal of the district of South Carolina, which report was unfavorable to the petitioner.

After some explanations from Mr. INGERSOLL, of Pennsylvania, Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and a statement of facts by Mr. CHEVES of South Carolina, to show that the report of the Committee ought not to be agreed to—a desultory proceeding took place on various propositions made with a view to reverse the report of the Committee, and extend relief to the petitioner. Before it came to any decision on the report, the Committee rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

MONDAY, March 14.

Mr. WOOD presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of Thomastown, in the State of Massachusetts, praying permission to export their lime coastwise to other towns in the said State.—Referred to the Committee of Foreign Relations.

Mr. NEWTON presented a petition of John Thompson, praying payment of the balance of his account for laying brick on the fortifications at Norfolk, in Virginia.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. WOOD, from the select committee appointed on the 24th ultimo, reported a bill granting pensions to the officers and seamen serving on board the revenue cutters in certain cases; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

An engrossed bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act for the relief of the officers and soldiers who served in the late campaign on the Wabash," was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill for the relief of William Henry Savage was read the third time and passed.

The bill from the Senate "for the better organizing, paying, and supplying, the Army of the United States," was read the third time and passed as amended.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States for the year 1814," with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

THE EMBARGO.

Mr. GASTON, of North Carolina, rose to submit to the consideration of the House a proposition which he deemed of vital importance, and to which he had been desirous for several days to call the attention of the House, but had not been able to obtain an opportunity. It was a proposition somewhat similar to that offered the other day by a gentleman from Maryland (Mr. WRIGHT) from which, however, it differed in two circumstances. It did not embrace a mere palliative for the evil, but a radical cure: it did not propose an inquiry by any committee into the expediency of a certain course, but it required a decision thereon by the House. In other words, it was a proposition for a total and complete abandonment of the restrictive system, an abandonment at once and forever. In conformity to the practice which had prevailed under the rule of the former Speaker, and which, as it had not been reversed, he should consider as binding, Mr. G. said he should reluctantly abstain from arguing the motion he was about to propose, and confine himself to a brief statement of the reasons on which it was founded. It might be supposed at first a little strange that he should entertain a hope that a proposition of this kind should receive the sanction of the House, when it had so short a time ago made a decision in favor of the embargo, and that decision had been supported by a co-ordinate branch of the Legislature. But there were a few considerations applicable to the present moment, which induced the hope that the House might depart from the system. It would be recollected, Mr. G. said, that the Government was now about commencing, perhaps had already commenced, the collection of the war taxes imposed by Congress at their last session. How it might be in other parts of the country, he could not say; but in the part whence he came, he could say with some confidence, that unless there should be a departure from a system which deprived the husbandman of a market for the produce of his labors, these taxes would bear most oppressively on the people. It was of importance, too, that a decision should be pronounced on this subject without delay, from another consideration.

H. OF R.

Proposed Repeal of the Embargo.

MARCH, 1814.

Speculations are already afloat, rumors circulated, and hopes indulged, that the embargo would be removed. If such a thing was designed, it was necessary that the design should be effectuated without delay, that all persons interested might be permitted to derive fair profits from the trade which would be thrown open on the removal of the embargo, and that it might not fall altogether into the hands of speculators. It was important that suspense should be done away, and that those sensations which arise from a rapid succession of hopes and fears, should be lulled. There was another consideration which had weight on his mind. Congress had authorized by law an immense expenditure. To enable the Treasury to meet this expenditure, a large loan had become necessary. Such was the pressure on our moneyed institutions, from the present state of commerce, as induced him to suppose there would be a most serious difficulty in obtaining that loan. If the consequence would be felt only by those through whose agency the present state of things had been produced, and/or required of him to say, that he should behold it with composure, if not with complacency. But he looked to its effects on the character of the nation, and on its public credit; and, as far as these considerations went, he felt as lively an interest in the success of the loan as any gentleman in the House. One more consideration he would urge. He was one of those who thought this policy always erroneous, embarrassing to the finances, oppressive to the community, and inefficient as regards the enemy. But if he had been in error on this subject; if the contrary opinion was correct, he submitted to gentlemen whether the period had not passed by when an important advantage could be expected to be derived from the embargo? Could we, he asked, expect to produce the difficulty in obtaining provisions for the armies of Spain and Portugal, when their soil was no longer polluted by a hostile foot? That we could occasion difficulty to Great Britain in obtaining supplies for her navy, when all the granaries in the world were open to her? Or that we could affect her manufactures by prohibiting their importation, when we know, that with all their exertions, her artisans can scarcely produce a sufficient supply to satisfy the present demand for her fabrics from abroad? With these considerations, expressed in language somewhat like the above, Mr. G. submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States.

Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal so much as may be in force of the several provisions of an act entitled "An act to interdict commercial intercourse between the United States, and Great Britain, and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes."

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill or bills pursuant to the foregoing resolutions.

The question was stated "Will the House now proceed to consider these resolutions?" And Mr. GRUNDY, of Tennessee, having required the yeas and nays thereon, the question was decided in the negative—for consideration 58, against it 86, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brigham, Caperton, Champion, Cilley, Cooper, Cox, Culpeper, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Ely, Gaston, Geddes, Grosvenor, Hale, Hungerford, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Macon, Markell, Miller, Moffit, Montgomery, Moseley, Oakley, Pitkin, Post, John Reed, William Reed, Richardson, Ridgely, Ruggles, Sherwood, Shipherd, Smith of New Hampshire, Smith of New York, Stanford, Stockton, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Webster, White, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, Winter, and Wood.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Bard, Barnett, Beall, Bowen, Bradley, Brown, Burwell, Caldwell, Calhoun, Chappell, Clark, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Duvall, Earle, Eppes, Evans, Farrow Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Grundy, Hall, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irving, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kennedy, Kerr, Kershaw, King of North Carolina, Lefferts, Lowndes, Lyle, McCoy, McKee, McKim, McLane, Moore, Murfree, Nelson, Newton, Ormsby, Parker, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Roane, Sevier, Seybert, Sharp, Skinner, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Taylor, Telfair, Troup, Udree, Ward of New Jersey, Whitehill, Williams, Wright, and Yancey.

So the House refused now to consider the said resolutions.

The bill to alter and establish certain postroads passed through a Committee of the Whole, and received various amendments, after considerable desultory and unimportant debate on the merits of particular roads, &c.

The bill was reported to the House, the amendments therein made were agreed to, with the exception of one; and other amendments being proposed, the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 15.

Mr. INGHAM, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill concerning invalid pensioners; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill concerning the pay of officers, seamen, and marines, in the Navy of the United States. [This bill authorizes the President to fix the pay to be allowed to the petty officers, midshipmen, and seamen, and that the President be authorized to make an addition not exceeding — per cent. to the pay of those engaged in particularly hard and disadvantageous service.]—Twice read and committed.

Mr. L. also made a report on the petition of Samuel Harrison and John T. Courtney, praying compensation for putting out the fire which the enemy had put to the Asp in Yeocomico river in Virginia, which report, recommending a reference of the petitions to the Secretary of the Navy, was read and concurred in.

The amendments of the Senate to the Military Appropriation Bill were passed through a Committee of the Whole, and agreed to by the House.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill for altering and establishing certain post roads, which, after further discussion, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have concurred in the amendments proposed by this House to the bill "in addition to the act, entitled 'An act allowing a bounty to the owners, officers, and crews, of private armed vessels of the United States,' with an amendment; in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the report of the Committee on the Judiciary on the petition of Robert E. Cochran; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported their agreement to the resolution therein contained, as follows:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of the whole House; when, a motion was made by Mr. LOWNDES, that the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, together with the resolution contained therein, be recommended to the same committee, with instructions to report a bill for the relief of the petitioner, upon a full and fair disclosure and surrender of his estate and effects. And the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative. The question was then taken to concur with the Committee of the whole House in their agreement in the resolution proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary, and passed in the affirmative.

NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. W. REED, of Massachusetts, called up a resolution which he had moved some weeks ago, and which had been temporarily ordered to lie on the table; and the House agreed now to consider said resolution in the following words:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what means of retrenchment and economy of reform in the general management, and of extension and efficiency in the Naval Establishment, may be practicable and expedient; and that they have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. R. explained the grounds of his motion as he had before stated them: the multiplicity of duties attached to the Head of the Navy Department, and the want of accountability in the various branches.

Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, acknowledged that benefit might result from the adoption of the motion, &c.

Mr. INGHAM, of Pennsylvania, moved to amend the motion so as to refer the inquiry to the Naval Committee: which motion, after objections by

Mr. LOWNDES, was negatived, and Mr. REED's motion was agreed to: and Messrs. W. REED, LOWNDES, RIDGELY, WEBSTER, WOOD, SEYBERT, and IRVING, were appointed the said committee.

CLAIM OF BEAUMARCHAIS.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of J. A. Chevallie, agent for Amelie Eugenie de Beaumarchais, made a report; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole. The report is as follows:

That the circumstances under which shipments of goods and advances of money to the United States were made by Mr. de Beaumarchais, during our Revolution, were such as necessarily produced much difficulty in the settlement of his accounts. There was no contract by which the obligations and rights of the two parties were defined; and it appears, from many letters of Dr. Franklin and of Arthur Lee, that both those gentlemen considered Mr. de Beaumarchais as supplied with funds by the French Government, to encourage the resistance of America, and to give to this political transaction the appearance of a mercantile speculation. Mr. Lee represents Mr. de Beaumarchais when first introduced to him, as declaring that he was authorized by the French Government to offer 200,000 louis for the use of the revolted colonies. In a letter, signed by B. Franklin, Arthur Lee, and Silas Deane, they express the wish that Mr. D. Beaumarchais's accounts might be left to them for settlement, "as there was a mixture of public and private concerns, which Congress could not so well develop." Letters from Mr. Girard, a former Minister from France to the United States, written in support of the claim of Mr. de Beaumarchais, states, "that only military stores were advanced to him by the French Government for the United States, which he was to return to the royal arsenals;" and Mr. de Vergennes says that, "for the payment of the military stores the Government" of this country "should not be pressed." In these letters, indeed, as in those of Mr. Turreau since, all connexion on the part of the French Government with Mr. de Beaumarchais's speculations is denied, and the transaction represented as a mere commercial adventure. Yet it could not have been meant that the Government of France did not furnish a part of the cargoes; for this is proved by the statement of Dr. Franklin, of Mr. Girard, and of Mr. de Vergennes himself. It could not have been meant, that the Government of France had not some power over the debt, which the delivery of these stores produced; for Mr. de Vergennes himself promises that for this our Government should not be pressed. It could have been intended only to say that the French Government was to have no profit from the transaction; and this may readily be admitted.

The committee have adverted to this apparent "mixture of public and private concerns," in the subjects of Mr. de Beaumarchais's accounts, for the purpose of explaining that delay in their liquidation, which could not otherwise be reconciled to the habitual fidelity of this Government to all its engagements. The principles on which those accounts were finally settled at the Comptroller's office, in 1805, are fully explained and supported by the report of the Committee of Claims of the 10th of March, 1806, which the committee to which the same business is now referred, beg to be allowed to adopt as a part of this report. The balance which, under that settlement, appeared due to the estate of Mr. de Beaumarchais was paid to the memorialist in 1806. This committee have not minutely examined the charges brought by Mr. de Beaumarchais against the United States, because they have been settled at the Treasury, on principles which the memorialist does not indeed represent himself as approving, but to which he seems disposed to acquiesce. The only question relating to the account, which it appears necessary to bring distinctly to the view of the House, refers to a million of livres, which, at the Treasury, have been considered as paid in 1776, by the French Government, to Mr. de Beaumarchais, for the service of the United States, and for which credit has been accordingly taken. This question is so fully explained, and, in the opinion of the committee so justly decided, in the letter of the former Secretary of the Treasury, (Mr. Gallatin,) included in the report before referred to, that they will add a very few observations to the perspicuous statement which it contains. If the opinion expressed in that letter be correct, the just claim of the heiress of Caron de Beaumarchais has been fully satisfied.

With respect to the claim of the United States to this credit of a million, (which is denied by the memorialist,) the committee submit to the House that it must be supposed either—

1. That this million was paid to Mr. de Beaumarchais, for the use of the United States, to which he was bound to account for its expenditure; or,

2. That this million was not paid to Mr. de Beaumarchais, for the use of the United States; or,

3. That, if it were paid for the use of the United States, it was expended on "objects of secret political service," connected with the interests of the United States, but different from the supplies which are charged in Mr. de Beaumarchais's accounts; that it was satisfactorily accounted for to the French Government; and that it was to that Government only that he was bound to account.

1. On the first supposition there can exist no claim, on the part of the estate of Mr. de Beaumarchais, against the United States, and it is therefore only necessary to examine the others. It may be supposed—

2. That this million was not paid to Mr. de Beaumarchais for the use of the United States. This supposition is contradicted by the evidence of facts, and by the declaration of the French Government in 1794, as is shown in the letter of Mr. Gallatin, before referred to. But, if it be admitted, the obligation of the United States to pay this million now will not be implied. It will be recollected that by the contract of February 25, 1783, three millions of livres advanced by France before the treaty of 1778, as well as six millions afterwards granted, were declared to be a gratuitous assistance. If there were not a million paid to Mr. de Beaumarchais for the use of the United States, the million advanced in 1777 by the farmers general, (which was entered in our foreign account under the title of "subsidies,") must be considered as having been a gratuitous aid, and should have been deducted from the amount which France claimed to be due by America. In a letter from the Comptroller of the Treasury to Mr. Bournonville, dated February 8, 1794, he refuses to admit to the credit of France the balance due to the farmers general, until it should be shown that the million received from them formed no part of the gratuitous aid specified in the contract of 1783. The French Government, by the receipt of Mr. de Beaumarchais, and by the opinion which it expressed, satisfied the Comptroller that the deduction of the million was to be made from Mr. de Beaumarchais's account, and not from its own. If the French Government were mistaken in this opinion, it follows that we overpaid it in 1794, by an amount equal to that which by its mistake was withheld from Mr. de Beaumarchais. But, the evidence which should ascertain the real creditor could only have been obtained from France. The acknowledged debtors as we at that time were of the French Government, as well as of Mr. de Beaumarchais, we had no interest in making this deduction rather from the one debit than the other; and if France, in deciding a question in which her Government and one of her subjects were alone interested, and of the evidence of which her Government was the only depository, has erroneously decided, it is not against the Government of the United States that complaints can properly be directed. It may be supposed—

3. That, if the million in question were paid to Mr. de Beaumarchais, for the use of the United States, it was expended on objects of a political nature, connected, indeed, with the interests of the American Government, but different from the supplies which are charged in Mr. de Beaumarchais's accounts; that it was satisfactorily accounted for to the French Government; and that to it only was he bound to account. It appears to the committee, that these suppositions cannot be admitted. The French Government advanced money to Mr. de Beaumarchais, to be employed for our service. Mr. de Beaumarchais purchased articles most essential to our service, and sent them to this country; shall we presume that this advance has been invested in these articles, or been used in some other way for our benefit, of which no evidence appears? A receipt is indeed produced, showing that the French Minister was satisfied with the application of a million "to an object of secret political service;" but this by no means contradicts the opinion, that it may have been employed for the purchase of the articles which Mr. de Beaumarchais sent to America, and that therefore it ought to be deducted from his account.

But, besides other difficulties, are we to presume that Dr. Franklin, who negotiated this contract of 1783, would not have been informed that the gratuitous aid which he was called upon formally to acknowledge, was made so mysteriously, that neither he nor his Government was to know the objects to which it was applied, nor the services which it accomplished.

The objection, however, to a reversal of the judgment of the Comptroller of the Treasury, appears to the committee not to result alone from an examination of the case which he has decided. The Government of the United States, in constituting a department by which all claims upon it are to be impartially examined, and in consigning the direction of this department to men of judgment and integrity, has adopted the only method of securing justice to creditors which the institutions of any society can provide. Mr. de Beaumarchais was himself anxious that the question in which he was interested should be decided by arbitration. Mr. Chevallie (the attorney of his heiress) would wish that it should be referred to judicial decision. But neither arbitrators nor judges could be more impartial than the officers of the Government, who have no interest to induce a wrong decision, and whose reputation, in some degree, must depend on their making a right one. If the rules of a court of law be different, they cannot be supposed to be more liberal, or, in general, more satisfactory to a foreign claimant, than those adopted by the Treasury, in the settlement of their accounts. But, if the officers of the Treasury have erred in their decision, shall not Congress correct the error? The committee believe that in this case they have not erred; and the voluminous documents which the reference of this question has obliged them to examine were not necessary to convince them that want of time must, of itself, disqualify the Legislature for the task of rejudging the sentences of its officers of finance.

The committee submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the memorialist have leave to withdraw his memorial.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, February 28, 1812.

SIR: I have considered the subject of the letter which you did me the honor to address to me on the 9th of last month, in the case of the representatives of Monsieur de Beaumarchais, and am of opinion that the documents do not, in point of law, maintain the discount of a million of livres to which your letter alludes.

The demand of Monsieur de Beaumarchais appears to be admitted; upon what principle, whether of strict law, or of liberal equity, whether upon a reasonable probability, or upon regular proof, I do not know, and have not been called upon to inquire.

If the demand has been admitted without rigorous proof, it is for Congress to determine how far it may be proper to measure a discount, claimed by the Government, by a standard purely legal. But viewing the question referred to me, as I have been desired to view it, as a mere matter of law, I am compelled to say, that the title to the deduction insisted upon must be shown by the United States, and that the evidence would not be sufficient to establish it in a court of justice.

If the reasons of this opinion should be thought necessary, I shall take great pleasure in stating them to the committee.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration, yours, &c.

WM. PINKNEY.

HON. CHAIRMAN of Committee of Claims.

YAZOO CLAIMS.

MR. OAKLEY, from the committee to whom was referred the bill from the Senate "providing for the indemnification of certain claimants of public lands in the Mississippi Territory," (a compromise of the Yazoo claims,) made a report; which was read, and, together with the bill, committed to a Committee of the whole House. The report is as follows:

The committee have had the subject of the said bill under their consideration, and are of opinion that it is expedient for the Government of the United States to enter into a compromise with the persons claiming lands in the Mississippi Territory, under or by virtue of the act of the Legislature of Georgia, of the 7th January, 1795. The reasons for this opinion do not rest on the strict legality of the title of these claimants to the lands in question—though the committee cannot forbear remarking that that title appears to have all the sanction which can be derived from a solemn decision of the highest judicial tribunal known to our laws—they are grounded on considerations connected with the permanent interests of the United States, as they relate to the Mississippi Territory; with the quiet and speedy settlement of that Territory; with the more easy extinguishment of the Indian title to the lands contained in it; with the security against all future Indian wars in that quarter, which the settlement of the Territory must afford; with the extensive navigation connecting parts of the Western States with the ocean, which must be opened when the population of the Territory shall be adequate to such an object, and with the strength and safety which such a population must confer on the Louisiana frontier.

It may, in addition, be remarked that there are equitable considerations connected with the present claims, which, in the opinion of the committee, strongly recommend them to the favor of Congress. Although the original act of the State of Georgia might have been procured by fraudulent and corrupt means, it satisfactorily appears to the committee, as far as their inquiries have been extended, that the present claimants, or those under whom they hold, were bona fide purchasers of the immediate grantees of Georgia, without notice of any fraud or corruption in the original grant. The committee refer, on this head, to the papers annexed to this report, marked from "A." to "L," inclusive.

As to the terms of the compromise which it may be expedient to make, the committee have considered that those contained in the bill from the Senate are as effectual and practicable, and, at the same time, as eligible as ought to be required under the circumstances of the case. They have accordingly directed the chairman to report the said bill without amendment.

The committee have had under consideration the resolution adopted by the House on the 9th instant.

As to the "authority vested in the agents now attending to compromise the claims set up by the respective claimants," the committee have procured all the information within their reach. They have examined various documents and papers, some of them very voluminous, consisting of conveyances, powers of attorney, letters, &c. They have also received, from the respective agents, written representations of the extent of their powers and authority, and of their readiness to accede to the terms of compromise contained in the bill from the Senate. These representations are annexed to this report.

The committee did not consider it necessary to report to the House the various documents exhibited to them by the respective agents in support of these representations. Such a procedure was supposed not to come necessarily within the purview of the resolution of the House, and would have encumbered this report with a mass of papers. The committee will remark, generally, that the authority of the agents appears to be very extensive, and that, in the course of their inquiries on this head, they have discovered no reason to believe that any one of the claimants will refuse to accede to the proposed compromise.

As to the "amount of money actually paid by bona fide purchasers for grants or titles they may hold under the original grant," the annexed papers afford all the information which the committee have found it "practicable" to obtain. These papers show, to a great extent, the prices at which "bona fide third purchasers" contracted for the lands in question, and which were paid in negotiable and endorsed notes, and other securities. But the committee consider it impracticable to ascertain to any extent "the amount of money actually paid" without devoting to the inquiry more time and attention than any committee could bestow on it, during any session of Congress, as it would lead to an examination of all the private transactions of the numerous individuals now interested in these claims, which might be connected with the purchases and sales of the lands in question, and with the notes and other securities given in consequence of these purchases and sales.

As to that part of the resolution which instructs the committee to inquire "from which of the original companies the present claimants derive title, and the amount of money withdrawn by any of the original grantees, or persons claiming under them, or their agent, or agents, from the treasury of Georgia?" the committee also refer to the annexed papers, and to a document accompanying the report of the commissioners appointed in pursuance of an act of Congress, entitled "An act for the amicable settlement of limits with the State of Georgia, and authorizing the establishment of a government in the Mississippi Territory," which document is contained in a volume, from page 147 to page 153, inclusive, printed by order of Congress, on the 19th day of December, 1809.

The committee also take the liberty to refer to the volume abovementioned, as containing much useful information in relation to the acts and proceedings of the State of Georgia, and of the United States, connected with the subject under consideration. In the same volume will also be found the report of the commissioners abovementioned, and various documents accompanying the same, showing, among other things, the evidence of the fraud and corruption connected with the original grant of these lands by the State of Georgia.

All which is respectfully submitted to the House.

On the question for what day the consideration of this subject by a Committee of the Whole should be ordered, different days were named, and a desultory conversation, not connected with the question immediately before the House, continued until it was checked by the SPEAKER for its irregularity.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, took occasion to reply to a remark made by Mr. STANFORD the other day, that there were no complete copies of the documents relative to the Yazoo claim, to be found on the files of the House. On inquiry he had found that there was at least twenty complete copies of those documents.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, repeated the observation he had made upon the subject of the mutilation of the printed records on the subject, of which he had derived his information from others, and from the gentleman from North Carolina, to whom he appealed to confirm the statement.

Mr. STANFORD, of North Carolina, said he did state the other day, and he now affirmed and could prove the fact, that certain books which had been printed, containing the evidence of the Yazoo fraud, had been gutted of their contents; he had seen them, and the fact had been at a former session urged on the floor as a reason for reprinting them. He had also stated, merely as presumption, that they had been so mutilated by some interested person.

Mr. RIDGELY, of Delaware, in a low voice, made a statement of the facts which had come to his knowledge on this subject. The reporter understood him to say, that on inquiry in the office of the Clerk, to satisfy his mind on the correctness of what had been stated on this subject, he had been informed by the Clerk, that there was, or had been about the office, one book of the first edition of those documents, out of which the leaves had been cut for the printer, by the clerks, to save themselves the trouble of copying the papers, when they were last reprinted by order of the House; and that the only book which had been mutilated to their knowledge was the one to which he had referred, &c.

Upon the question on the day for considering this report, motions for Monday and Saturday next were negatived; and it was made the order of the day for Thursday.

WEDNESDAY, March 16.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, presented a letter from Return J. Meigs, Agent of the United States at Highwassee, in the Mississippi Territory, suggesting the propriety of extending the laws of the United States over white persons residing within the Indian boundaries.—Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McKEE, of Kentucky, reported a bill for the relief of Dennis Clarke; which was twice read, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. RICHARDSON, of Massachusetts, from the select committee on the subject, reported a bill for the relief of John Whitney and Joseph H. Dorr; which was twice read and committed.

The engrossed bill to alter and establish certain post roads, was read a third time and passed.

The amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the bill "in addition to the act allowing a bounty to the owners, officers, and crews of the private armed vessels of the United States," was read and concurred in by the House.

The House spent a short time in Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of James Doyle; which bill was reported and then ordered to lie on the table.

DISTRICT PENITENTIARY.

The House, on motion of Mr. INGERSOLL, of Pennsylvania, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to authorize the erection of a Penitentiary in the District of Columbia, and to provide the necessary funds therefor.

[This bill authorizes the President, under the direction of the Board of Commissioners, to cause to be erected the buildings and walls of a Penitentiary, on the square in the City of Washington called the Judiciary Square; and, to provide means competent to effect this purpose, appropriates certain public lots in the city, to be sold under the direction of the said commissioners, so much of the proceeds as is necessary to be applied to the object of the bill, and the remainder to be paid over into the Treasury of the United States.]

place, the bill being opposed by Mr. WRIGHT and Mr. FISK, of New York, on the ground that it would be unjust to appropriate the public property to the purposes of this District, already sufficiently favored by benefits from the public Treasury, &c.; and was warmly supported by Mr. INGERSOLL, on the ground of the expediency of the measure, and the propriety of the mode in which it was proposed to be effected. The public lots proposed to be appropriated to this purpose were at present of no possible benefit to the public, from whom the property would not be transferred by an application of these lots to the purpose of erecting a Penitentiary, because the Penitentiary itself would be the property of the public, &c. Mr. FINDLEY defended the city from the remarks applied to it by Mr. WRIGHT.

The Committee rose for want of a quorum, and, at length, after refusing once to adjourn, and having come to no decision on the subject of the bill, there being a difficulty in keeping a quorum to attend to business, the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 17.

Mr. INGERSOLL, of Pennsylvania, from the Judiciary Committee, to whom was referred the bill to define more explicitly the duties of the judges of the Territory of Indiana, reported the same with an amendment applying the principle to the Territory of Illinois as well as to the Territory of Indiana; which, after some observations from Messrs. INGERSOLL, JENNINGS, of Indiana, and GHOLSON, of Virginia, was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SEYBERT, of Pennsylvania from the select committee, to whom was referred the resolution on the subject of the copper coins, reported that it was inexpedient at this time to make any alteration in the copper coins of the United States. Mr. S. presented a letter from the Director of the Mint on the subject; which was read. The report was then agreed to.

The engrossed bill for the relief of Dennis Clarke was read a third time, and passed.

COASTING TRADE.

Mr. WOOD, of Massachusetts, offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing vessels, whose cargoes shall consist of firewood, bark, or lime, to proceed from a port or place in a State to one or more ports in the same, or an adjoining State, under such restrictions and regulations as the President of the United States may direct; and, also, of allowing vessels that have usually been employed in the fisheries to be again employed in that business; and that they have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

And on the question that the House do now proceed to consider the said resolution, it was determined in the negative—yeas 63, nays 80, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bayly of Virginia, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brigham, Caperton, Calhoun, Cilley, Cooper, Cox, Culpeper, Davis of Massachusetts, Ely, Forsyth, Gaston, Grosvenor, Grundy, Hale, Hufty, Hungerford, Irving, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Lewis, Lovett, Lowndes, Macon, Markell, McKee, Miller, Montgomery, Moseley, Murfree, Pitkin, John Reed, William Reed, Richardson, Ridgely, Ruggles, Sherwood, Skinner, Smith of New Hampshire, Smith of New York, Stanford, Stockton, Strong, Stuart, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, Winter, and Wood.

Y., Forney, Franklin, Gholson, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hall, Harris, Hawes, Ingham, Irwin, Johnson of Va., Kennedy, Kent of Md., Kerr, Ker-shaw, King of North Carolina, Lefferts, Lyle, McCoy, McKim, Moffitt, Moore, Nelson, Newton, Ormsby, Pickens, Piper; Pleasants, Post, Potter, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Roane, Robertson, Sage, Sevier, Seybert, Sharp, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Troup, Udree, Whitehill, Williams, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wright, and Yancey.

DUTIES ON SPIRITS.

On motion of Mr. YANCEY, of North Carolina, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means against the expediency (into which they had been, on motion of Mr. Y., instructed to inquire) of amending that provision in the act laying duties on licenses to retailers, &c., so far as respects the sale of domestic spirits sold in less quantities than five gallons, at the place where the same shall have been distilled, and by the person to whom license shall have been granted for that purpose.

Mr. YANCEY moved to amend the report, so as to declare it to be expedient to make the proposed amendment to the license law. His object was to make it legal for distillers to sell in any quantity not less than one gallon.

After considerable debate in the Committee, and afterwards in the House, this motion was decided in the negative by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Avery, Barnett, Beall, Breckenridge, Burwell, Caldwell, Calhoun, Clark, Cooper, Creighton, Culpeper, Davis of Pennsylvania, Desha, Duvall, Earle, Farrow, Findley, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gaston, Gholson, Goodwyn, Grundy, Hall, Harris, Hawes, Hungerford, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Virginia, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kilbourn, King of North Carolina, Lewis, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McLean, Montgomery, Moore, Murfree, Nelson, Newton, Ormsby, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Rhea of Tennessee, Roane, Sevier, Sharp, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Udree, Wilson of Pennsylvania, and Yancey—60.

ISAAC CLASON.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate for the relief of Isaac Clason, and the amendments thereto of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures; which were agreed to by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NEWTON, of Virginia, moved to amend the bill so as to include the extension also of relief to Archibald McCall, of Philadelphia, whose petition had been referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

This motion produced considerable discussion, in which Messrs. NEWTON, INGERSOLL, and SEYBERT, supported the motion, and Messrs. FISK, of New York, POST, and IRVING, opposed it; but not in any way involving the merits of A. McCall's case. The motion was negatived—ayes 34.

The Committee rose and reported the amendments to the bill.

Mr. MURFREE, of North Carolina, moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, with a view of having comprehended in one bill all the cases of a similar character which deserve relief.

This motion also gave rise to a considerable debate, being supported by Messrs. MURFREE, SEYBERT, INGERSOLL, and McKIM, and opposed by Messrs. FISK, of Vermont, WRIGHT, FISK, of New York, and NEWTON. The motion was lost—ayes 35; and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 18.

Mr. KENT, of Maryland, presented a petition of Joseph Johnson, packetmaster, of the City of Washington, praying permission to run his packet between the said city and Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, by giving a general bond in such amount as the Government may prescribe, not to evade the act laying an embargo.—Referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business, being a bill from the Senate "for the relief of Isaac Clason;" and the amendments yesterday made thereto in Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

Mr. MURFREE, of North Carolina, moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures; which motion was negatived.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill indefinitely; which motion was also negatived; and the bill was then ordered to a third reading.

PAUL CUFFEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate for authorizing the President of the United States to permit the departure of Paul Cuffee with a cargo to Sierra Leone; together with a report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures against the same.

This bill underwent a discussion of a very diffuse nature, and of no little length, in the course of which the object of the bill was supported by Messrs. WHEATON, GROSVENOR, PICKERING, TAGGART, BAYLIES, WEBSTER, FARROW, DUVAL, and SHIPHERD, and opposed by Messrs. NEWTON, WRIGHT, McKIM, KERR, INGHAM, FISK, of Vermont, and INGERSOLL.

The bill was supported on the ground of the excellence of the general character of Mr. Cuffee; the philanthropy of his views; the benefits to humanity and religion generally of which a success in these views might be productive; the benefits which would result to the United States, particularly from the establishment of an institution which would invite the emigration of free blacks, a part of our population which we could well spare, &c.

On the other hand, the bill was opposed on various grounds. While the excellence of the general character of Mr. Cuffee was fully credited and generally admitted, it was said that the bill would violate, in favor of a foreign mission, that policy which we had refused to infringe for the sake even of our coasters and fishermen; that Mr. Cuffee might depart in neutral vessels with his companions, but that it would be improper to permit him to carry out a cargo, which was not at all necessary to his views of propagating the Gospel; that his voyage would be contrary to the policy of existing laws, independent of the embargo policy, because Sierra Leone was a British settlement; that as this was a British settlement, in the possession of a nation claiming and asserted to be the bulwark of our religion, there was no occasion for cargoes departing from the United States to enable her to carry her views into effect, &c.

Intermingled in this debate was considerable controversy and something like asperity as to the character of the British nation for religion and humanity, in which Mr. PICKERING, of Massachusetts, on the one side, and Mr. KERR, of Virginia, and Mr. FISK, of Vermont, on the other, were the principal debaters, and also on the evil which might result from transporting liberated slaves from this country to a British settlement. The question, however, appeared to the reporter to turn on the expediency of permitting, under the existence of the restrictive system, a cargo to go out which must necessarily sail under British license; which it was argued would not be granted unless it were considered advantageous to the interest of the enemy that such trade should be carried on.

The debate having been extended to the usual hour of adjournment, the Committee reported the bill to the House with certain amendments, and on the question on the passage of the bill to a third reading, which was decided by yeas and nays, the vote was for the bill 65, against it 72, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bayly of Virginia, Bigelow, Bowen, Boyd, Bradbury, Brigham, Butler, Caperton, Champion, Cilley, Cooper, Cox, Culpeper, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Duvall, Ely, Farrow, Geddes, Hale, Hufty, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, Kent of Maryland, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lefferts, Lovett, Markell, McLean, Miller, Moffit, Montgomery, Moseley, Nelson, Oakley, Pickering, Pitkin, Pleasants, Post, John Reed, William Reed, Rich, Ruggles, Sheffey, Sherwood, Shipherd, Skinner, Smith of New Hampshire, Stanford, Stockton, Strong, Sturges, Taggart, Thompson, Tallmadge, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Webster, Wheaton, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Wood.

NAYS—Messrs. Alston, Anderson, Avery, Bard, Barnett, Brown, Burwell, Chappell, Condict, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Davis of Pennsylvania, Desha, Earle, Eppes, Evans, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Hall, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hungerford, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irving, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kennedy, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, Lyle, McCoy, McKim, Moore, Murfree, Newton, Parker, Pickens, Piper, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Ringgold, Roane, Robertson, Sage, Sevier, Seybert, Sharp, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Udree, Whitehill, Williams, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Winter, Wright, and Yancey.

So the bill was rejected.

SATURDAY, March 19.

Mr. SEYBERT presented a petition of Stephen Girard, of Philadelphia, merchant, stating that his ship Montesquieu and cargo, being captured on the passage from the East Indies by the enemy, he, by permission of the Government, effected her ransom, and brought her into the port of Philadelphia; and praying that a part of the duties paid on said cargo may be refunded to him, in consequence of the benefit which accrued to the Government by said ransom.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

The SPEAKER presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of South Carolina, praying for the aid of Government in opening an inland water communication from the Chesapeake Bay to St. Mary's river, in Georgia.—Referred.

Mr. MCKEE, of Kentucky, reported a bill for quieting and adjusting claims to land in the Mississippi Territory; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, reported a bill concerning certificates of confirmation of claims to land in the State of Louisiana; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. TROUP, of Georgia, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to authorize the President of the United States to accept the service of volunteers who may associate and organize themselves for the defence of the frontier of the United States; which was twice read, and committed.

ISAAC CLASON.

The engrossed bill from the Senate for the relief of Isaac Clason, was read a third time.

The case of Isaac Clason has been for some years before the Legislature, and has frequently passed through one or the other House; sometimes separately, and sometimes in connexion with others. The following are the circumstances of his case, as stated by those who supported the bill: Several years ago, Mr. Clason, on account of circumstances arising from the existence of contagion in New York, was prevented from giving bond on a cargo of foreign produce re-exported, within the time required by law to entitle him to receive drawback thereon. He prays that, in consequence of these accidental circumstances, he may not be deprived of the benefit of drawback, which he would have received but for the intervention of circumstances not within his control.

The bill was opposed with some warmth, and supported with equal zeal, in a debate of some length. The objections were, that it was improper to legislate in particular cases, when others of the same class were passed by; that this was a claim not on the justice but on the liberality of Congress, who ought to be just before they were generous, and not open the Treasury to claims of this description, when claims of a more urgent nature, arising from the Revolutionary war, were barred by the statute of limitations. The claim was, on the other hand, supported on its merits, and the injustice of refusing to render justice in one case because it was not done in another.

A motion was made by Mr. GHOLSON, of Virginia, that the bill be postponed indefinitely; and the question being taken thereon, was decided as follows—For postponement 57, against it 83.

A motion was also made to postpone the bill to Monday next, and negatived—ayes 45.

A motion was then made to adjourn, and negatived. The same motion was again made, and negatived.

After further debate, the question on the passage of the bill was decided in the affirmative—yeas 84, nays 59, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Avery, Baylies of Massachusetts, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brigham, Caperton, Champion, Chappell, Cilley, Comstock, Cox, Creighton, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davenport, Denoyelles, Ely, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Gaston, Gourdin, Grosvenor, Hale, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Howell, Ingersoll, Irving, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kennedy, Kershaw, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lefferts, Lewis, Lovett, Markell, McKee, McKim, Miller, Moffitt, Montgomery, Moseley, Newton, Oakley, Pearson, Pitkin, Pleasants, Post, Potter, John Reed, Rich, Richardson, Ringgold, Robertson, Ruggles, Sage, Sheffey, Sherwood, Shipherd, Skinner, Smith of New Hampshire, Smith of New York, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Stockton, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Taylor, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Webster, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Williams, Wilson of Massachusetts, Winter, and Wood.

YAZOOS.—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Bard, Barnett, Beall, Bowen, Brown, Burwell, Butler, Caldwell, Calhoun, Condict, Conard, Crawford, Crouch, Davis of Pennsylvania, Desha, Duval, Earle, Eppes, Evans, Forney, Forsyth, Gholson, Goodwyn, Griffin, Grundy, Hall, Harris, Hungerford, Ingham, Irwin, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kilbourn, King of North Carolina, Lowndes, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, Moore, Murfree, Nelson, Pickens, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Roane, Sharp, Tannehill, Telfair, Udree, Whitehill, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wright, and Yancey.

So the bill was passed.

MONDAY, March 21.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year 1814," with an amendment. The Senate have disagreed to the 2d, 5th, 16th, 18th, and 22d of the amendments made by this House to the bill "for the better organizing, paying, and supplying the Army of the United States," and have concurred in the residue of the said amendments with amendments; in all which amendments they ask the concurrence of this House.

YAZOO CLAIMS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill from the Senate for the indemnification of certain claimants to lands in the Mississippi Territory.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman—I feel myself bound as a member of the committee to whom this bill has been referred, in justice to the parties, as well as to the friends of the bill, to present this subject to the nation as it is, and to rescue the parties and their advocates from the ignorant clamors of the public prints. In May, 1789, Georgia established her Constitution, and thereby vested her Legislature with full power to dispose of her public lands. As a proof thereof, in December, 1789, she passed a law disposing of several tracts of land therein mentioned to three companies, by the names of the Virginia Yazoo, the South Carolina Yazoo, and Tennessee, and for issuing to them grants, on their complying with the conditions. These are parts of the same lands, but they failed to comply with the terms of the sale, and the lands remained to be disposed of by Georgia. On the 7th January, 1795, Georgia again sold those lands by an act of the Legislature of that State, to the four companies, under whom the present persons claim, amounting to fifty millions of acres of land, for the sum of five hundred thousand dollars, and, by the act, directed the Governor, on payment of the purchase money into the treasury of Georgia, to issue to the said companies their grants, agreeably to the said act. The several companies without delay paid into the treasury the several sums by them respectively to be paid, and the Governor, in pursuance of the said act, issued to them their respective patents. During the Summer of 1795, these lands were sold to the New England purchasers, now applying for an equitable compromise, without notice of any malpractice in the original purchasers. In February, 1796, Georgia repealed the law of 7th of January, 1795, declared the sales under it fraudulent and void, and, as an evidence of their temperance, burnt the act and records of the grants with fire drawn from heaven with a sun-glass.

Even that Legislature, in this temper of mind, directed the repayment of the money paid into their treasury by these fraudulent purchasers—they did not burn that. And out of the five hundred thousand dollars paid into the treasury, three hundred and ten thousand six hundred and ninety-four dollars were withdrawn, and their claims to a proportionate quantity of the lands were given up. Permit me to remark, that by a number of resolutions of the old Congress, the lands belonging to the King of Great Britain, with whom we were at war, were pledged as a fund for the payment of the national debt, in the event of our conquest, which by the laws of war inured to the joint benefit of the nation, by whose united blood and treasure they should be conquered, and such a resolution will be found on the same page, with a vote of thanks to the Maryland line, for their gallant conduct in action in South Carolina; and it will appear that Maryland entered into the consideration, upon that express condition—her claim to her portion of these lands remaining yet to be adjusted, with the claims of her sister States.

Congress, however, desirous that the States, within whose jurisdictional limits these lands thus acquired were, pressed the States to relinquish them for that purpose, and on the 7th of April, 1798, passed an act authorizing the President to appoint three commissioners, to act with commissioners to be appointed by the State of Georgia, to fix the true limits of the State of Georgia, and to establish the Mississippi Territory out of the lands so relinquished by Georgia. On the 10th of May, 1800, Congress passed another act authorizing the commissioners so appointed, to make such settlement of limits, on such terms as might be agreed on, not advancing any money from the Treasury of the United States; and also, authorizing said commissioners to receive propositions of compromise for any claims against said lands so intended and expected to be relinquished by Georgia, many of the States having then relinquished large tracts of land to the United States. To fulfil this expectation, Georgia appointed Mr. Jackson and Mr. Baldwin of the Senate, and Mr. Milledge of the House of Representatives, on her part, and Mr. Jefferson appointed Mr. Madison the Secretary of State, Mr. Gallatin the Secretary of the Treasury, and Mr. Lincoln the Attorney General, who on the 24th of April, 1802, settled the limits of Georgia, and also of the Mississippi Territory, stipulated for the payment of a million and a quarter of dollars to Georgia, out of the first sales of the lands in the Mississippi Territory, and also, to extinguish the Indian title to all the lands within the limits of Georgia held by the Indians; they also agreed "that a portion of the said lands, not exceeding five millions of acres, or the proceeds of the said five millions of acres, or of any part thereof, be appropriated for the purpose of satisfying, quieting, and compensating for any claims other than those hereinbefore recognised, which may be made to the said lands, or any part thereof, provided it shall be appropriated by Congress within one year, after the confirmation of the said compromise by Georgia. And they limit the time for Georgia to decide on said agreement, to six months, and that Congress shall be bound by the agreement if they do not within six months repeal the laws for the appointment of said commissioners by the United States."

This agreement made and executed as aforesaid by the Commissioners of Georgia and the United States was on the 26th of April, 1802, submitted by the President to both Houses of Congress, and a motion was made in both Houses to repeal the laws for the appointment of the Commissioners of the United States, thereby to reject the said amendment. Then, sir, I was a member of the Senate, and it will appear by the votes and proceedings of that body, which I hold in my hand, that I then voted against that agreement. I opposed it, sir, first, because I thought the claim of Georgia to such an immense territory, with one Representative, inadmissible; that the paying her a million and a quarter of dollars for the Mississippi Territory, and extinguishing the Indian title to the lands in Georgia held by the Indians was an outrageous imposition, and a departure from the principles recognised by Congress, as to the lands conquered from the King of Great Britain by the Revolution, which by the laws of war vested in the conqueror, the United States. Secondly, I contended that the purchasers of the fifty millions of acres of land in the Mississippi Territory were or were not entitled—if entitled, they were entitled to the whole, and ought not, by the iron hand of power, to be deprived of their rights; if not entitled, it would be improper to give them five millions of acres as proposed by the agreement. That the repealing act of Georgia could not affect rights vested at the time. That Georgia ought to have tried the case in chancery, where, if fraudulent, she could have set aside their patents, which were evidence of a legal title, if the act of the Legislature could be avoided. I therefore voted against the agreement, which passed the Senate by a majority of only one vote. In the House of Representatives it passed by a majority of twelve votes, and the agreement with Georgia and the United States was thereby ratified and confirmed, on the part of the United States. Georgia also by her Legislature ratified it within six months.

After this agreement, so entered into, had been so ratified, although I voted against it, I considered the nation and Georgia bound by it, agreebly to its true intendment; and Congress, on the 3d March, 1803, in virtue of said agreement, and with intent to carry the same into effect, passed an act for that purpose; and, among other things, enacted—

"That so much of the five millions of acres reserved for that purpose, by the articles of agreement abovementioned, as may be necessary to satisfy the claims not confirmed by that agreement, which are embraced in the two first sections of this act, or which may be derived from British grants for lands which have not been regranted by the Spanish Government, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, for that purpose, and so much of the residue of the said five millions of acres, or of the net proceeds thereof, as may be necessary for that purpose, shall be and is hereby appropriated for the purpose of satisfying, quieting, and compensating for such other claims to the lands south of the State of Tennessee, not recognised in the abovementioned articles of agreement, and which are derived from any act or pretended act of the State of Georgia, which Congress may hereafter think fit to provide for: Provided, however, That no other claims shall be embraced by this appropriation, but those the evidence of which shall have on or before the first day of January next been exhibited by the claimants to the Secretary of State, and recorded in books to be kept in his office for that purpose, at the expense of the party exhibiting the same."

And the said act authorizes the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General, to receive the propositions of compromise from the companies or persons claiming lands in said Territory, and report their opinion to Congress at their next session; and that, no doubt, with a view of Congress seeing fit to confirm such compromise as our said Commissioners should approve. The said Commissioners, in virtue of said appointment reported, that a great majority of the persons claiming said lands had signed propositions to relinquish their claims at twenty-five cents per acre; "that this proposition is inadmissible, and without pretending to affirm that the Legislature of Georgia was incompetent to decide on the title, under all the circumstances that have come to their knowledge, they think their title cannot be supported." "But they nevertheless believe that the interest of the United States, the tranquillity of those who may hereafter inhabit that Territory, and various equitable considerations which may be urged in favor of most of the present claimants, render it expedient to enter into a compromise on reasonable terms."

"Under that impression a plan is submitted to the consideration of Congress, which, although it does not render a full indemnity to every claimant is believed to give in the aggregate nearly as much as has been paid in the whole by all the present claimants."

"As it is understood, and generally agreed, that the five millions of acres reserved by the agreement with Georgia constitute the fund from which the indemnity is to be paid, it is of primary importance that it should not exceed that fund."

"They, therefore, submit to Congress the following propositions:

"1. That so much of the five millions of acres as shall remain after satisfying the claims therein specified, be appropriated for satisfying and quieting the claims of the persons who derive their claims from an act of the State of Georgia, passed 7th of January, 1795, for which purpose the several companies be permitted to locate the quantity allotted them on any part of the land they claim.

"2. That the claimants may nevertheless receive, in lieu of said lands, certificates bearing interest from 1st January, 1804, for two millions five hundred thousand dollars, or, at their option, certificates without interest to the amount of five millions of dollars, to be paid out of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands in the said Territory, after Georgia had received her million and a quarter of dollars.

"3. That the lands or certificates be apportioned among the companies agreeably to their claims.

"4. That every original grant, deed, or other claim, be exhibited to the Secretary of State within one year, to be recorded, and if not so exhibited, never to be received as evidence in any court.

"5. That the claims so exhibited shall be apportioned by Commissioners authorized finally to settle the same.

"6. That each individual claimant shall be allowed to have the benefit of these terms for the amount of his claim thus ascertained, and to receive, at his option, his proportion either of the lands or certificates bearing interest or certificates without interest."

This report was in December, 1804, in the House of Representatives, referred to a committee, which, on the 18th January, 1805, after examining the same, recommended the following resolution:

"Resolved, That three Commissioners be authorized to receive propositions of compromise and settlement from the several companies or persons having claims to public lands within the present limits of the Mississippi Territory, and finally to adjust and settle the same in such manner as in their opinion will conduce to the interest of the United States: Provided, in such settlement, the Commissioners shall not exceed the limits prescribed by the convention with the State of Georgia."

Let any man compare this proposed resolution with the report of the Commissioners and their opinions of the compromise that ought to be accepted and made, and they will discover not only an approbation of it, but that they should be re-appointed to confirm and execute it. This resolution, however, was not acted on during that session.

The next session the subject was brought before the Senate, who passed a bill to carry said compromise into effect by a large majority, which was rejected in the House of Representatives on the first reading, without examining the merits of the question, and some new members were excused from voting because they did not understand the subject.

In 1812 the Senate passed another bill to the same effect, which, from a multiplicity of important public business, was not acted on definitively in the House of Representatives, though I thought there was then a majority for it.

At this session, the present bill has passed the Senate by a majority of three to one, and it now becomes our duty to examine the case with temper, and to decide it upon principles of justice and sound policy.

Having presented the subject with its history and progress before the Commissioners, as well as before both Houses of Congress, I will present to you the opinion of the Supreme Court, in a case instituted to try the title of the purchasers from Georgia, as delivered by Judge Marshall:

"The Legislature of Georgia had the right to dispose of her public lands, unless restrained by her constitution."

"Georgia, by her constitution of 1789, was not restrained, and by her act of 1795 did not transcend her powers."

"The lands in controversy vested in the original grantees, by the grant of the Governor, in pursuance of the act of 1795, who, being thus possessed of the legal estate, conveyed it to these innocent purchasers without notice, and if the original transaction was infected with fraud, these purchasers without notice were innocent. Yet the Legislature of Georgia have involved them in one common fate, if that act be valid."

"Georgia was a party to this transaction; and for a party to pronounce its own deed invalid, must be a mere act of power, not to be vindicated in courts of justice."

"If a suit be brought to set aside a conveyance obtained by fraud, and the fraud be clearly proved, the conveyance will be set aside as between the parties; but the right of third persons, who are purchasers without notice, for a valuable consideration, cannot be disregarded. Titles that, according to every legal test, are perfect, are acquired with confidence that they are safe. He who pays his money for a title good at law is innocent, and, whatever may be the guilt of others, equity will not subject him to the penalty of that guilt."

"Had a bill in chancery been filed against the purchasers for their fraudulent practices with the Legislature, whatever might have been its decision as to the original grantees, by the clearest principles of equity, would have left unmolested purchasers without notice for a valuable consideration."

"When a law is in its nature a contract whereby absolute rights have vested under that contract, a repeal of the law cannot divest these rights."

"The contract between Georgia and the purchasers was executed by the grant."

"By the Constitution no State can pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts."

I will add that, by the fourth article, first section of the Constitution, it is provided "that full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State."

In the scales of evidence a statute is a record of the first class, and the grant of the Governor under that act of such authority, that no lawyer, in examining the title, under the statute of Georgia and the grant in pursuance of it, could have hesitated to have declared the title good. He would have repelled the unheard of principle, that the act of a sovereign power could have been set aside by a subordinate court of chancery—sovereignty cannot be subordinate.

And yet the rights of these innocent purchasers without notice, whose innocence is declared by the report of your own Commissioners, confirmed by the decision of the Supreme Court, and by the report of the committee now on your table, are to be destroyed by the typographical clamors of the knights of the sheepskin, who have ascended the whirlwind to direct the storm without a compass—the truth; and shall gentlemen be deterred from an examination of the merits of the case, and a decision of it upon the evidence, by these senseless denunciators? No, sir, I have met that whirlwind, and will assuage that storm by the honest history of this case, which is now submitted to you, and which will defeat their ridiculous machinations. But, strange as it may seem, we have been told on this floor that posterity will identify this thirteenth Congress with the corrupt Legislature of Georgia of 1795. I hope the honest historian who shall record the case, will note particularly, that when the Commissioners made the convention and Congress ratified it, and passed the act of 3d March, 1803, to carry that convention into effect, it was not known where the claimants lived, and that since it has been known that they resided in New England, that it has been made a geographical and a party question, as will appear by an examination of the votes in the case, there being but one vote against it to the east of New Jersey. I regret, sir, to see geographical and party principles so much incorporated into our legislative proceedings, and I wish I could say that they were confined to the Legislature alone; but I fear that is not the case. Had these claimants have resided in the Southern and Western sections of the Union, I cannot be brought to believe that they would not have had more friends in that quarter. Notwithstanding, I trust there will be a majority of this House, who, on a candid examination of it, will put to sleep a subject which has so long disturbed the public repose; and that when they recollect that even Georgia, in a paroxysm of just indignation, paid back to the original purchasers—covered, as they declared, with turpitude—their purchase money, this Congress will not only feel itself justified, but bound to pay back to these purchasers, declared innocent by your own Commissioners, by your Supreme Court, and by a committee of this House, that sum of money which, in 1802, your own Commissioners—one of whom is now Chief Magistrate—then declared was barely sufficient for that purpose, and that the sum proposed by this bill, without interest, for twelve years, will not now be denied to these patient supplicants.

Mr. IRVING, of New York, assigned, in a neat speech of moderate length, the reasons which would influence him to vote in favor of this bill. He expressed his utter detestation of the fraud in which the purchase originated; but the titles of the present claimants had received such a legal sanction, that they were entitled to some attention. We are often under the necessity, in this world, of being governed by policy; of making a surrender of a small portion of our rights, that we may enjoy in comfort the whole of the remainder; of making friends with the very mammon of unrighteousness. On that score should he vote for this bill. Mr. I. adduced a number of considerations which, in his view, concurred to render the passage of the bill expedient; among which was the operation of time in confirming the titles of the present claimants, softening down the circumstances of the fraud, and the claimants becoming, by transfer or descent of the claims, more and more innocent, more and more entitled to relief. He relied also on the articles of agreement between the United States and Georgia, reserving five millions of acres for the purpose of settling the disputed claims to this land, which was reserved with no other view, however it might from a just pride have been disguised by the State of Georgia, than that of settling this claim. He added also, that it was the interest of the United States to quiet these claims in order that the fine country which they covered might be settled, &c. From these and a variety of other considerations which he urged, he was induced to vote in favor of this bill.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, took a variety of views of this bill, to the passage of which he was opposed on several grounds which he stated, the principal of which was, that Congress had not, by their act setting apart five millions of acres for the settlement of claims to the land ceded by the territory of Georgia, complied with that article of the compact which required the settlement of such claims to take place within one year after the passage of the law. His other objections were to the detail of the bill, and principally to the section which declares all claims which shall not be settled under this act to be void, &c., a course which he said the Government had no right to pursue.

Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, replied pretty much at length to Mr. FORSYTH's observations, which he deemed invalid; and defended the details of the bill with much zeal. He controverted Mr. F.'s construction of the articles of compact, which he said was contradicted also by the report of the commissioners, recommending a compromise of the claims long after the expiration of the year succeeding the signature of the articles of agreement, &c.

Mr. FORSYTH briefly rejoined.

The Committee rose and reported their agreement to the bill—ayes 76, nays 44.

The bill being before the House, Mr. HALL, of Georgia, moved to strike out the fifth section of the bill, and to insert the following:

And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passing of this act, the balance of the five hundred thousand dollars, deposited by the original grantees as the consideration for the purchase of said lands, and which has not been withdrawn by the said grantees, their agent or agents, or persons claiming under them, (or expended in the hire of guards over the same,) shall be set over and paid, by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, to the State of Georgia, in part payment of one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, stipulated to be paid by the articles of agreement and cession between the United States and the State of Georgia.

This motion was opposed by Mr. OAKLEY, chiefly on account of the delay which such or any amendment returned to the Senate might create in the passage of the bill; and was negative—ayes 38.

Mr. FORSYTH then moved to strike out the 4th section of the bill, which makes the stock created by this bill receivable in payment for public lands hereafter sold in the Mississippi Territory; which provision he considered inexpedient and repugnant to another part of the bill, which provides for the extinguishment of the debt due to Georgia previously to the redemption of these certificates, inasmuch as that provision would be thus completely evaded.

Mr. OAKLEY objected to the motion, which he said would defeat the compromise proposed, if it did not defeat the passage of the bill. The bill already proposed to pay the claimants a less sum than the principal and interest thereon that they had actually paid; and these certificates, which constituted the payment, not bearing interest, would lose much of their value if the proposed amendment prevailed; because, although there might be sufficient money to compensate the claim of Georgia in the Treasury or in the hands of the receivers, it might be some years before sufficient other moneys accrued to the Treasury to redeem the certificates.

After some further discussion, the question on the amendment proposed by Mr. FORSYTH, was decided by yeas and nays—for the amendment 62, against it 90, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Avery, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brigham, Butler, Champion, Cilley, Clark, Comstock, Cooper, Cox, Creighton, Culpeper, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Pennsylvania, Ely, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New-York, Forney, Gaston, Geddes, Gourdin, Grosvenor, Hale, Hasbrouck, Howell, Hufty, Irving, Jackson of Rhode Island, Jackson of Virginia, Kent of New York, Kent of Maryland, Kershaw, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Lowndes, Markell, McLean, Miller, Moffitt, Montgomery, Moseley, Oakley, Parker, Pearson, Pickering, Pickens, Pitkin, Post, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Rich, Richardson, Ridgely, Robertson, Ruggles, Sherwood, Shipherd, Skinner, Smith of New Hampshire, Smith of N. York, Smith of Virginia, Stockton, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Taylor, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Webster, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Williams, Wilson of Massachusetts, Winter, Wood, Wright, and Yancey.

So the amendment was negative.

Mr. TELFAIR, of Georgia, then moved to amend the section which the House had refused to strike out, by adding thereto the following proviso, which he supported by appropriate remarks:

Provided, also, That the certificates thus received in payment shall so far be considered cash, as to be obligatory upon the United States to pay over a like sum out of the proceeds of the first sales of land, according to the understanding of the deed of cession of the State of Georgia.

Mr. OAKLEY opposed the motion, because he conceived it unnecessary, as the rights of Georgia were, as he believed, abundantly secured by the bill.

The question was taken on said amendment, and negative.

The usual hour of adjournment having arrived, a motion was made to adjourn, before ordering the bill to a third reading, on which the vote was: for adjournment 58, against it 63.

Mr. GASTON, of North Carolina, then moved an amendment to the first section of the bill, under the impression that the decision of the commissioners to be appointed ought to be final as to the claims of all companies or individuals who hold claims to the said land.

The object of the amendment was to secure the United States against future claims of all persons against whom the Board of Commissioners appointed by this bill shall decide; that is, to make the provisions of the bill completely final as to all conflicting claimants, that purchasers of the United States might not be harassed by suits from disappointed claimants.

Discussion arising on this motion, the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 22.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee of Public Lands, made an unfavorable report on the petition of a religious association in Illinois, praying for a grant of land, to which they have no title, on which they have built a church. The House having refused to lay the report on the table, as moved by Mr. HALL, of Georgia; it was taken up and concurred in.

Mr. INGERSOLL, of Pennsylvania, from the Judiciary Committee, who had been instructed to inquire into the expediency of raising the salary of the district judge of Massachusetts, made a report on the same, declaring in substance that however expedient it might be to raise the salaries of judges of the courts generally, this was not the moment when such a step would be expedient.—The report was concurred in.

A verbal amendment of the Senate to the general appropriation bill was taken up and agreed to.

NATIONAL ARMORIES.

The amendments of the Senate to some and its disagreement to other amendments of this House, to the bill for the better organizing and supplying the Army, were taken up and discussed.

The amendments were of various importance. That which gave rise to the most discussion went to strike out a section (inserted in the bill by this House) which authorized the appointment of a Superintendent of Armories, with a salary of sixteen hundred dollars.

It was wished by Mr. TROUP, of Georgia, (the Chairman of the Military Committee of this House,) that the House insist on this provision, which he deemed necessary to the prosperity and well conducting of the armories of the United States, and to the proper manufacture and uniformity of quality of arms for the public service. It was contended by Mr. TALLMADGE, of Connecticut, Mr. ELY, and Mr. PICKERING, of Massachusetts, that the proposed officer would be of very little service to the armories, and obviously could not perform adequately the duty of personally superintending three armories, one in Massachusetts, one in Virginia, and one in South Carolina.

Mr. TROUP read a letter from the Secretary of War, and also a letter from the Commissary of Purchases, stating the irregularity in the manufactures of the public arms, and the abuses in the establishments of the armories; pointing out the necessity of a remedy, and indicating that which is proposed by the bill, in the event of the adoption of which it is proposed to discharge the subordinate superintendents now employed.

Mr. WEBSTER, of New Hampshire, took occasion; on Mr. TROUP's reading this letter from the Secretary of War, to object to the course of legislation lately pursued, of adopting measures at the recommendation of the Heads of Departments, addressed not to the House but to committees of the House, and which were frequently not laid before the House. He wished to see all such papers put on record, that it might be known at whose recommendation particular measures were adopted by Congress.

Mr. TROUP replied, that the letter was now in possession of the House, and might be disposed of as it thought proper.

The question on this House insisting on its amendment (to insert the section above mentioned) was decided in the negative.

On the question to recede from the said amendment, after further debate, it was decided in the affirmative. For receding, 82; the nays were not counted.

The other amendments of the Senate were agreed to.

YAZOO CLAIMS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill for the indemnification of certain claimants to land in the Mississippi Territory.

Mr. GASTON's amendment was still under consideration, which amendment proposes to strike out from the end of the first section (providing for the release of all their title by the claimants) the following words: "such release, assignment, transfer, and power, to take effect on the indemnification of such claimants being made conformably to the provisions of this act."

After objections by Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, and Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, and remarks in reply by Mr. GASTON, the motion was negatived by a small majority.

Mr. INGERSOLL, of Pennsylvania, then moved that the bill be recommended to a select committee, with instructions to report a bill providing that the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General of the United States, for the time being, be a board of commissioners to receive evidence and report to this House on the following particulars, to wit:

1. The precise amount of actual payments made by each and every purchaser and purchasers, without notice of the original fraud, under a grant made by the Legislature of Georgia to certain persons styled the South Carolina Company, the Georgia Company, the Upper Mississippi Company, the Tennessee Company, and the Georgia Mississippi Company, by virtue or color of any act or acts, pretended act or acts, of the State of Georgia.

2. The names, ages, and titles, whether original, derivative, in trust, or otherwise, of all such claimants.

3. The powers and authorities of all such claimants to make settlements with the United States for their said claims: Provided, always, That each and every claimant shall accompany his claim with an account, under oath or affirmation, of the amount of the money or other consideration actually paid by him, together with an oath or affirmation, that he, or she, or they, as the case may be, had no notice, knowledge, or information, of the original fraud; the forms of which oaths or affirmations shall be prescribed by the said commissioners.

Mr. INGERSOLL, in support of this motion, delivered his opinion on the subject very much at large, premising that three weeks ago he knew nothing of the circumstances of this case, had formed no opinion, and in examining it had commenced entirely de novo, and therefore without prejudice or bias in any way. Mr. I. spoke considerably more than an hour against the present bill.

Mr. ALSTON, of North Carolina, spoke in favor of recommitment; and Mr. FISK, of Vermont, against it.

The question on recommitment was decided in the negative, 53 voting in the affirmative. A motion was then made to adjourn and negatived.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, then moved to strike out of the third section the proviso, which excludes from all benefit under this act all persons who had fraudulently withdrawn money from the treasury of Georgia, and provides that all claims of such persons recorded in the office of the Department of State shall be vested in the United States. He contended that such a provision would have an ex post facto operation, and went to annex a penalty to certain immoral conduct, which was not punishable by any known law at the time of its commitment. The obvious tendency of the provision would be to defeat the avowed object of the bill, because the claims of persons of this description were as valid as any other of the claims, because all were equally fraudulent.

Mr. OAKLEY objected to the motion; and Mr. FORSYTH replied.

Mr. GHOLSON, of Virginia, also supported the motion; and Mr. JACKSON of Virginia, opposed it.

The proposed amendment was negatived.

Mr. HALL, of Georgia, moved to amend the 4th section of the bill, which makes the said certificates of stock receivable in payment for public lands sold in the Mississippi Territory, by incorporating in it words to the following effect: "after payment of the debt due to the State of Georgia by the United States, under the article of agreement and cession, entered into on the 4th of April 1802."

After some observations by Mr. NEWTON, on the vital importance of the bill, and the necessity of due deliberation on its various and intricate provisions, on his motion, carried by a small majority, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 23.

A message was received from the Senate announcing that they insist on their disagreement to the 16th amendment of this House, to the bill for the better supply of the Army, &c., and that they ask a conference.

YAZOO CLAIMS.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill from the Senate for the indemnification of certain claimants to lands in the Mississippi Territory.

Mr. HALL's amendment still under consideration, for securing to Georgia the first moneys arising from the sales of the lands in question, until the debt due to her by the United States should be satisfied.

The amendment was opposed by Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, as unnecessary, and supported by Messrs. HALL, ALSTON of North Carolina, TELFAIR of Georgia, and BARNETT of Georgia.

Mr. TROUP, of Georgia, moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill indefinitely, and in support of this motion entered at large into the subject, in which he displayed that vehemence and zeal which usually characterizes his observations on this question. He examined and dissected the report of the committee of this House on the subject, which he said contained not a tittle of evidence, not a particle of information; which, taking into view the ability of the committee who made it, he considered as evidence conclusive of the badness of their cause. He also examined the decision of the Supreme Court, and spoke against the decision, and the speculators in whose favor it was made, until he appeared to be exhausted by the effort of speaking. He spoke about an hour.

Mr. FARROW, of South Carolina, spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker, when I first heard of the transaction and the claims—the subject of the bill under consideration—which happened many years ago—impressed with a belief that it was a wicked and corrupt fraud in the original purchasers, and that the second purchasers in Massachusetts, the present claimants, were knowing to the fraud before they became purchasers. I felt strong prejudices against all parties concerned in the same.

When this bill came from the Senate to this House, the other day, I undertook to prepare myself to vote on the subject. To do so, I attempted to drive from my mind those prejudices thus imbibed; in this I have been unsuccessful; I find the nearer I come in contact with it, the more violent is the influence of my first impressions. But, under this embarrassment, I have the comfort to know that this enlightened body will attend to my remarks, and will not be influenced by my impressions.

In addressing you on the merits of the bill, there is another difficulty in my way. Ever since this subject has been called up, honorable members have stated that we ought to pass the bill, as the title of the claimants to the land has received the sanction of the Supreme Court by a solemn decision. I will remove this formidable barrier before I call your attention to the merits of the bill. To do this, does not require abilities, nor much labor. The case referred to is reported by Cranch, in his 6th vol., p. 87. I have read the case with attention, and I accord with the court in the opinion delivered in that case. But I deny that the court gave any decision on the great question before this House. The case before the court was a feigned issue made up between Fletcher and Peck, with the aid of their counsel, for the purpose of obtaining a judgment of the court against Fletcher, the plaintiff. If the plaintiff had have gained the action, the fifty millions of acres of land would have been lost. Notwithstanding the great zeal of plaintiffs to gain their suits, they oftentimes are disappointed; but I never did hear of one who wished to lose his suit, but what he was by some means accommodated. I never did see a judge who had talents and ingenuity enough to overrule and defeat both parties and their attorneys, and award judgment to the plaintiff, contrary to their united efforts. I am a stranger to the rule that authorized Messrs. Fletcher and Peck to make up a feigned issue for the court to try. I know that the courts possess the power of ordering issues to be made up.

Any honorable gentleman that will give himself the trouble to look into this case, must see that the deed from the defendant to the plaintiff, which contains the covenant, the ground of the action, was a feigned deed to enable them to make up the issue. The novelty of a covenant contained in the deed is worth seeing; nothing like it has ever appeared to us before. The special pleadings do display much ingenuity, well calculated to obtain a judgment against the plaintiff, and to keep the important question out of view, or rather out of danger; for the court did see it, but very properly observed that the pleadings did not bring it before them. To prove this, will you indulge me while I read to you that part of the opinion of the court? Here Mr. F. read—"What ever difficulties this subject might present when viewed under aspects of which it may be susceptible, this court can perceive none in the particular pleadings now under consideration. This is not a bill brought by the State of Georgia to annul the contract, nor does it appear to the court, by this count, that the State of Georgia is dissatisfied with the sale that has been made."

I must further trespass on the time of the House in calling your attention to a statement of the case before you, by which you will see that it was not before the court. On the 7th of January, 1795, the Legislature of the State of Georgia passed an act, by which they sold to four companies fifty million acres of land for $500,000; one of these companies, called the Georgia Mississippi Company, on the — day of January, 1796, sold their part of the land to a company in Massachusetts, called the New England Mississippi Land Company. On the 13th February, 1796, the Legislature of the State of Georgia repealed the act, making a provision to refund to the purchasers any money that they had paid for the land. $310,695 have been withdrawn from the treasury of the said State under this law.

The memorialists state, and so the fact is, that before the law was repealed they became purchasers; therefore, their purchase ought not to be affected by the repealing act. This is a correct position. The repealing law affords me no aid in making up the opinion that will govern my vote. If the first act was lawful, no subsequent act could rescind or impair contracts made under it. If the first act was void, on the ground that it was obtained by fraud, the repealing act was nugatory. But, notwithstanding the repealing act was not necessary, the honest and honorable intention of the Legislature who passed it was shown by the provision made to refund to the purchasers what they had paid. I lay down this principle, that a grant, or deed, obtained by fraud, is void. The volume that lies before me, which contains the proof taken by your commissioners appointed for that purpose, shows that every member, in both branches of the Legislature, who voted for the passage of the bill (with only one exception) by which the land was sold, was wickedly corrupted and bribed for that express purpose, and therefore void on the principle laid down.

I do agree with the memorialists, that a party executing a fraudulent deed, cannot take an advantage of his own turpitude to set aside his deed. But I state, that a third party who is injured can set it aside. In this case, who are the persons defrauded? Surely, not the members who received the amount in money for their votes; agreeably to contract, they cannot complain. The land sold belonged to the people of that State. The members were their agents, or representatives. Their powers extended to make any laws for the benefit of those whom they represented; and the moment that they combined with the corrupters to defraud their constituents, they that moment ceased to be the agents of the people of Georgia, and became the corrupted representatives of the corrupters, who were hostile to the interest of the citizens of that State. This is a view of the case, that the court states that the pleadings did not bring before them; and this is the fact that the special pleaders took so much pains to keep behind the curtain.

It is stated by the memorialists, and so contended by the honorable gentlemen who advocate their claim, that however fraudulent the transaction between the Legislature and the grantees might have been, that it cannot affect their claim, who are innocent purchasers, for valuable consideration, without notice of the fraud practised. Mr. Speaker, if the claimants have made out such a case, you ought to relieve them by indemnifying them in what they have paid. Let us attend to the facts which accompanied the transaction, and see if it is probable, nay possible, that they could have made the purchase without sufficient notice to have prevented prudent men from engaging in the speculation. At the time, and for several months after the passage of the law in the State of Georgia, which authorized the selling of the land, the people of that State were much inflamed; meetings of the people over the State were called to express their disapprobation at the illegal conduct of their perjured, wicked, and debased Legislature; one of their Senators, by the name of Thomas, murdered, on account of his being engaged in the infamous fraud; the papers from the State of Georgia to Boston teemed with that base, infamous transaction. The fifteenth day of February, President WASHINGTON sent to Congress a Message in these words: "I have received copies of two acts of the Legislature of Georgia, 'one passed on the 28th day of December, and 'the other on the 7th day of January last, for appropriating and selling the Indian lands within 'the territorial limits claimed by that State, 'These acts embrace an object of such magnitude, 'and their consequences may so deeply affect the 'peace and welfare of the United States, that I 'have thought it necessary now to lay them before Congress." This message being of a public nature, I presume it was run through all the papers published in this Government; and this happened about eleven months before the claimants purchased.

It is also proper to state, that all the deeds given by the companies, which have been exhibited to the commissioners, as well as all the subsequent deeds, with only two or three exceptions, not only give a special instead of a general warrantee, but have also a special covenant in the following words: "And, lastly, it is covenanted, and expressly agreed and understood, by and between 'the parties to these presents, that neither the 'grantors aforesaid, nor their heirs, executors, or 'administrators, shall be held to any further or 'other warrantee than is hereinbefore expressed, 'nor liable to refunding of any money, in consequence of any defect in their title, from the State 'of Georgia, if any such there should hereafter 'appear to be." I will conclude this head with reading to you a few lines from the claimants' memorial that lies before you. Here Mr. F. read as follows: "It may with truth be affirmed, that 'the purchasers in Massachusetts, speaking of 'them generally, had never heard that any objections had been made to the grants; but considered them as the indisputable acts of the supreme 'power of Georgia. It is believed that not one 'of them had heard enough to excite alarm in 'any reasonable mind." I will only remark that, with the strength of this evidence, I am authorized to say that it is impossible that the claimants could have purchased, without some notice of the fraud practised in the original transaction; they acknowledge some notice themselves.

It has also been said, that the Government is pledged to remunerate the claimants. If that is a fact, I request that some honorable member would be kind enough to show me the law where-in the faith of the nation is pledged. I will not examine into the policy of the law: whatever you may have promised to do shall be faithfully performed, as far as my vote can accomplish it. But, I have in vain looked for any act pledging your Government, and I defy gentlemen to point it out to me. Neither the compact with Georgia nor the subsequent acts of Congress contain any such a clause.

The Legislature of the State of Georgia sold the land in question to the grantees for $500,000. After that State repealed the act under which the land was sold, the State refunded to the purchasers $310,695 15. The United States shortly afterwards purchased the same land for $1,250,000, and by this bill you propose to the claimants $5,000,000, to purchase from them their claim! How or by what rule will posterity be able to understand this method of legislating? How will the historian record this transaction when we are gone? I presume, somehow in this manner: after stating that King Charles the Second by charter created the colony of Carolina, and that the same was divided; that this 50,000,000 of acres in part founded the new colony called Georgia; that a company called the Yazoo Company, in the Winter of the year 1795, bribed the Legislature of Georgia to pass a law to sell this 50,000,000 acres to them for $500,000, and that the thirteenth Congress purchased the same from the said company, and of those to whom they had sold a part, at the sum of $5,000,000; and in this manner will be coupled together the corrupted Legislature, the Yazoo Company, and the thirteenth Congress. For, you are certainly purchasing with a knowledge of the original fraud, and thereby consuming the same.

Your Government ought to have nothing to do with the Yazoo purchase, with the company, nor their claim. If they have a right to 50,000,000 of acres of land, it is unjust for you, by virtue of your power, to compel them to take $5,000,000 for it. If they have no right, it is unwise and unjust for you to give them $5,000,000 of money that belongs to the nation.

But, it is stated that the poor, honest yeomanry of the East became purchasers of this land, innocent and ignorant of the fraud. Do you believe, if you pass the bill, that class of people will derive any advantage by it? If you think so, you must have a very contemptible opinion of the dexterity of speculators. They have known for two months past that the bill now under consideration will pass this session, and they have purchased up from those honest people their shares for very trifling sums before this time. If you want any proof of this, I must call your recollection back to the funding of indents. In that case, a speculation was opened, which extended from your Capitol to every corner of the nation; and some of your high military officers were engaged in the business, purchasing up the claims of the soldiers, who fought and bled by their side, at the rate of about ten dollars for one; and, by the time that it was known that the law was passed for funding the indents, there was not one to be found in the hands of the poor soldiers, whose toil and blood purchased your independence. Speculators are not less attentive to this business now than what they were then, and probably not much more honest.

But, the bill upon your table provides as well for the infamous, base, fraudulent corrupters, as those who you say are innocent second purchasers. Your bill places them all on the same footing. Yes, the bill before you makes provision for the same men who counted out the money to the treacherous, corrupted Legislature, as a bribe—the price of their vote. And those same men, by this bill, are invited into your Treasury, with hands besmeared with fraud and corruption, to receive the reward of their labors! While you continue to boast that yours is the only virtuous nation on earth, I beseech you to keep it so, by rewarding virtue and punishing vice. Smile on virtue, but frown vice out of your presence. Have nothing to do with either the Yazooos or the claimants.

To make a contract, it is necessary that both parties should be able to contract, and both reciprocally bound by the same. You, on the part of the Government, are able to pass this bill, by which you hold the nation to perform on her part; but, who are the other party, and where are they? The reporting committee states in this way: "The committee will remark, generally, that the authority of the agents appears to be very extensive; and that, in the course of their inquiries on this head, they have discovered no reason to believe that any one of the claimants will refuse to accede to the proposed compromise."

This is all the information that your committee can give you on the subject. The claimants are not before you to agree to the compromise; they are not bound, and it is impossible that they can be. The claimants are scattered over your Government—some of them in Europe. Many children, of tender age, are entitled under the grants from Georgia. If those grants convey a title, they cannot be represented so as to enable you to dispossess them of their freehold; and the framers of the bill appear to have been sensible of this difficulty, to remedy which, the eighth section is introduced. Let us examine if it will answer the purpose. Mr. F. read the section:

"And be it further enacted, That, if any person or persons claiming lands under the aforesaid act, or pretended act, of the State of Georgia, passed January 7, 1795, shall neglect or refuse to compromise and make settlement of all such claim or claims, in conformity with the provisions of this act, the United States shall be, and hereby are declared to be, exonerated and discharged from all such claim or claims, and the same shall be forever barred; and no evidence of any such claim or claims shall be admitted to be pleaded, or allowed to be given in evidence, in any court whatever, against any grant derived from the United States."

Mr. Speaker, this is a very plain section. You tell the claimants that you want and will have their land; telling them to relinquish and give up to you their title, and that you will give to them five millions of dollars; but, that if they refuse to do so, you will give them nothing; and that, if they sue any person for the same, to whom you may sell, their grants and deeds shall not be admitted in court as evidence of their title. Sir, I admire your power for making of contracts, but I dislike your principles. Do you believe that you possess such powers; and if you do, are you in your discretion ready to exercise them? As this bill originated in the Senate, and passed by that honorable body, it would appear almost presumptuous in me to say that the eighth section is unconstitutional; but I will say that it is repugnant to the first principles of civilized nations; and I never understood that your Constitution gave birth to new principles.

Mr. FINDLEY, of Pennsylvania, spoke a few minutes, chiefly in reply to Mr. FARROW.

Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, followed in an animated and decided speech of nearly an hour, in opposition to the bill, and in favor of Mr. TROUP's motion.

Mr. CLARK, of Kentucky, replied to Mr. EPPES and others, and supported the passage of the bill in an argumentative speech of considerable length.

Mr. BARNETT, of Georgia, opposed the bill, and recited various circumstances to prove the villainy practised by the first purchasers.

Mr. FISK, of New York, in a short and pertinent speech, advocated the bill and opposed the motion to postpone.

Mr. STANFORD, of North Carolina, rose to reply to a remark made by Mr. CLARK, respecting the mutilation of the documents in the office of the Clerk of this House, which established the fraud in the purchase of the Yazoo lands; which fact Mr. S. had asserted some days ago. He now reiterated the assertion, and his statement was confirmed by Mr. MACON, of North Carolina, and others.

A good deal of explanatory conversation took place on this topic, during which several motions to adjourn were made and lost.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, declared his intention of opposing his voice to the passage of the bill, and commenced a speech in opposition thereto. After proceeding a few minutes, he made a motion to adjourn, and accordingly the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 24.

Mr. MILLER presented a memorial of sundry physicians residing in the city of Albany, in the State of New York, requesting that Congress would make known whether it was their intention to require physicians who keep medicines on hand, for making up their own prescriptions, to take out licenses as retail dealers in foreign merchandise.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The House agreed to appoint managers on its part of the conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of this House to the bill for better organization and supply of the Army.

A Message from the President was read, transmitting to the Congress certain resolutions adopted by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, expressive of their abhorrence of the conduct of the Governor of the State of Vermont, in issuing a proclamation to recall the militia of Vermont from the frontier, and their no less astonishment and regret at beholding a resolution lying on the table of the Legislature of another State approving his conduct, accompanied by a threat to act on it if the General Government shall think proper to inquire into the constitutionality of his conduct; and declaring that the Legislature of Pennsylvania, as legislators or individual members of society, will aid and support the Government in all Constitutional measures to bring to justice any and all infractors of the Constitution and the laws.—Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

YAZOO CLAIMS.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill from the Senate for the indemnification of certain claimants to land in the Mississippi Territory—the motion for indefinite postponement still under consideration.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, redeemed his pledge yesterday given to oppose this bill. He perceived, he said, the total inability of any effort to stem the torrent now setting in favor of this measure; but he could not consent that this bill should pass without some remarks from him against it. He proceeded to take a legal view of the question, and laid down the principle, that the rights of sovereignty of a nation were not examinable by its subordinate agents; that courts, being but subordinate agents to the sovereign authority, had no power to adjudge the rights of the sovereign who created them; that the Supreme Court could not decide against the rights of the United States, &c., because, if it could, the creature would be paramount to the creator. That a conveyance originating in fraud was void ab initio between individuals, and much more in a case where a State is concerned; that the Legislature had not power to transfer property appertaining to the sovereignty, and, having transcended their powers, the sale was void, were it never so fair and honest a sale. Mr. N. spoke about an hour in a strain of indignant feeling against the bill.

Mr. LATTIMORE, of Mississippi, spoke as follows: Mr. Speaker, it is with peculiar reluctance that I rise on this occasion. But as I am not much in the habit of troubling the House, I hope I shall be indulged in some remarks on a question the most important to the Territory I represent of any that has ever been agitated on this floor. Some years ago, Mr. Speaker, I had the honor of a seat in this House; and at all the four sessions which I served (except, perhaps, one) this subject was discussed, yet I never took any part in the debate. On these occasions it was contended on the one side, that the act of sale of Georgia was valid; on the other, that it was not valid. By gentlemen eminent for their legal abilities, (such as there always are in this House,) both of these opinions were strenuously maintained. It was, sir, impossible for me to determine which was the right one, or to foresee what would be the issue of this claim in a court of law. But my doubts are now at an end. I consider the principle as settled; and conceive that all inquiries on this subject should commence with the decision of the Supreme Federal Court. Whether this decision be a correct one or not, it is not for me to say. It is true I am no lawyer; yet I am sufficiently acquainted with the institutions of my country to know that the final decisions of courts must be carried into effect. That the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States would be favorable to the companies claiming under the act of Georgia, I cannot doubt. I must take things as I find them, not as I wish them to be. Had the court decided against the validity of that act, I should not now open my lips on this subject, and the people whom I represent would have hailed the decision as preserving them from evils which, as things now are, they have but too much reason to apprehend. Or, if Congress should even yet think it proper to adopt measures to counteract that decision, and would do so, I should still be content. But, sir, I do not believe that any will be adopted. It has been ten years since the question was first agitated in Congress, and several since it was decided in court; yet no remedy has been provided, none attempted, none suggested, during all this time. I see, therefore, but too well, that if these claims are not compromised, the claimants will harass us by law, and ultimately evict us of our lands.

I will now, Mr. Speaker, notice some observations of honorable gentlemen, to which I feel it my duty to reply. I understood an honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. INGERSOLL) to say, that the Legislature of Georgia has no right to sell the territory in question, inasmuch as the Indian title was not extinguished; and that, therefore, I need not indulge in the apprehension I had expressed in relation to the claims intended to be compromised by the bill. But let me say to that gentleman, that he has not quieted my fears. It will be admitted, I presume, that Georgia could sell just such a right as she had; and that if she had any, it was a right of preemption. It is doubted whether she had any right at all to these lands; but this is now immaterial, since the court has determined that she had. I will not, however, argue the principle with the gentleman as to the right of Georgia to sell Indian lands. He is chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, and it would be presumption in me to contend with him on this point. Yielding, then, to the gentleman, for the sake of argument, the correctness of the principle he has assumed, I must be permitted to say that he is not correct as to the facts. He must be informed that the Indian title to seven-eighths at least of all the settled parts of the territory exposed to these claims was extinguished long before the act of sale of Georgia was passed. The gentleman's conclusion is of course incorrect; and no obstacle, in relation to the Indian title, will prevent the Yazoo companies from prosecuting their claims to the lands of the settlers in courts of law.

An honorable gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. TROUP,) with a view of showing that the settlement of the Mississippi Territory has not been retarded from an apprehension of the Yazoo claims, has stated that more public land has been sold in that Territory, than has been sold in the State of Ohio within the same time. This statement is made on the authority of a document which is obtained, no doubt, from an official source. Since the gentleman made this statement yesterday, I also have procured one from the Land Office, and will now compare notes. I do not know how the mistake has arisen, but there certainly is a wide difference between his statement and the document which I have procured. From this it appears that three times as much land was sold in the State of Ohio and the Indiana Territory together, as was sold in the Mississippi Territory within the same four years. Another document which I have shows that considerably more than double the quantity of land was sold in the State of Ohio alone in one year, than was sold in the same year in the Mississippi Territory. [Mr. T. explaining, said he had stated that more land had been sold within the same time in the Mississippi Territory than had been sold in the State of Ohio in proportion to the relative quantity of land subject to sale in each.] Still this goes to prove the point which I have in view. Why is it that there is not a greater quantity of public lands subject to sale in the Mississippi Territory? Because the Indian title is not extinguished. And why is the Indian title not extinguished? Because the Yazoo claims cover the country. I recollect, sir, that when I formerly had the honor of a seat in this House, a treaty was made with some of the Indian tribes, under the authority of the President of the United States, and sanctioned by the Senate; but the appropriations for carrying it into effect were withheld by this House, because a part of the land ceded lay within the claim of one of the Yazoo companies, (in the Big Bend of Tennessee, now Madison county,) and the treaty had to lie over a whole year. This shows, sir, that the Indian title to lands in the Mississippi Territory is not to be extinguished, and, consequently, that the country will not be settled so long as these claims are in the way.

The gentleman from Georgia has said also, that the Mississippi Territory has settled more rapidly than any other of the Territories of the United States. It would probably require considerable investigation to ascertain the fact; but if the gentleman would give himself the trouble of inquiring more closely into this subject, I think his inquiries would lead him to a different result. I do not know the relative increase of population in the different Territories; but with respect to Ohio, which was a Territory, I recollect that, in the year 1803, soon after it was admitted into the Union as a State, it was entitled to but one Representative in this House, and contained when admitted, as I am informed, about 45,000 souls. But this State has now six Representatives on this floor; it has, therefore, gained in ten years not much less than 200,000 souls. The Mississippi Territory has gained only about 35,000 in more than fourteen years—on an average about 2,500 a year. I do not think that this can be considered, with propriety, a rapid increase of population, especially when compared with the emigrations to other parts of the United States.

Another remark of the gentleman was calculated to make an impression of great importance upon the House. I should be sorry to misconceive the gentleman, but I understood him as saying, in substance, that there was no propriety in urging the settlement of the Mississippi Territory, for the purpose of enabling it to defend itself and the State of Louisiana; that Tennessee and Georgia had defended the former, and that we should soon have peace with the Indians. Before I say one word in reply to these observations of the gentleman, I wish to express my grateful approbation of the conduct of the people of Tennessee and Georgia, in relation to the present Indian war. Yes, sir, I feel great pleasure in expressing the sentiments of gratitude which I cherish, and which I have on every occasion expressed—sentiments which the people of the Mississippi Territory also cherish and express. I wish it to be distinctly understood, that we feel ourselves greatly indebted to the brave people of those States for their patriotism, their promptitude, and friendly aid in our defence. But, sir, whilst I ascribe much, I cannot ascribe everything to this aid.

The gentleman says that Tennessee and Georgia have defended us; and here I must repeat my gratitude for the defence which has been extended to us by these States. But did they defend Fort Mims, which fell before they knew that we needed defence? Did they prevent the sacrifice of hundreds of inhabitants in that quarter of the country, who fell victims to savage hostility, whilst the unhappy remnant, abandoning their property to destruction, had to seek refuge in forts, and there remain trembling for their lives; to preserve which, even in that situation, required all the local militia, the whole of the twelve months' volunteers, and nearly all the regular force that the country possessed? Why did the Western settlement—the principal settlement of the Territory on the Mississippi river—not experience a similar fate? I presume no gentleman anticipates the reply. Here, Mr. Speaker, I must disclose a fact, which, but for the observation of the gentleman from Georgia, I might have withheld from this House. It may be humiliating to the House—it may be humiliating to the nation—still it is my duty to make it known. But why was the Western part also of the Mississippi Territory not invaded by the Creeks? Because the Choctaw nation interposed. The Choctaws are a numerous nation as well as the Creeks, and are even said to be more warlike and brave. When the fall of Fort Mims was known in the Western settlement, the inhabitants of this section of the Territory entertained, as they had but too much reason to do, much solicitude for their safety; and the Choctaw nation became the object of their hopes and their fears. It seemed to be the universal opinion of those who were acquainted with the disposition of Indians, that the Choctaws would not be neutral when those around them were at war; and the anxious and important inquiry of every one was, which side will they take? Happily for us the Choctaw nation, which some years ago was divided into an American party, and a French or Spanish party, has since, through the assiduity and address of the agent, the present incumbent, become more united in our favor, and formed something like a general attachment to the United States. When the war with the Creeks commenced, the Choctaws took a deep interest in the event, and, determining in favor of the United States, gave the Creeks to understand that they should not pass through their lands to make war upon the whites. Their geographical position and physical strength enabled them to enforce this determination, and save our Western settlements, by presenting a complete barrier to the inroads of the Creeks. But for this barrier, that settlement also might have been ravaged by our cruel foe. But for this barrier, dispersed as the population of that settlement is, and deprived as it was of all the regular force in the country which had been drawn to another point, (the Tombigbee settlement,) one thousand Creeks might have made their way through the strongest part of it, have crossed over the Mississippi to Louisiana, and laid waste all the upper settlements of that State.

But it seems we are now to have peace with the Creeks. This may be; it may be very soon. But I have heard nothing on the subject that is satisfactory to my mind. If the gentleman from Georgia is in possession of facts which assure him of such an event, I would thank him if he would communicate them to me, and rejoice my heart. But a word or two more respecting these Creeks. The general denomination of Creeks is applied to several nations of Indians, with only one of whom (the Muscogeas) we are at war; and even of that one a portion is friendly to us, and engaged in our cause. It is this one nation of Indians, divided as they are, that has given us so much trouble and done us so much harm; and notwithstanding the brilliant victories obtained over them by the brave people of Tennessee and Georgia, they still hold out and maintain their ground in the heart of the Territory where they live. Yet, against the hostility of these Creeks, as well as against that of all other nations, whether savage or civilized, both Louisiana and the Mississippi Territory are to rely on Tennessee and Georgia for defence. I regret, Mr. Speaker, that the honorable gentleman who is chairman of the Military Committee did not take that enlarged view of this subject, which his capacious mind would have enabled him to do. Tennessee and Georgia defend Louisiana at the distance of five, six, or seven hundred miles! No, sir; the means of defence must be nearer at hand, to be timely and effectually employed. And let not gentlemen say there is no danger of an attack on this portion of the United States. We are at war, and New Orleans may be invaded. Nay, it seems as if danger was now apprehended; or why has the Governor of Louisiana called out the militia of that State, for the avowed purpose of defending the metropolis itself? It will not be foreign to this part of the subject to notice a circumstance of considerable notoriety, and which cannot but be known to this House. Every gentleman here must be acquainted with the fact, of a large and formidable community of pirates being established in Louisiana, not one hundred miles from New Orleans, who have killed several of the custom-house officers and wounded others, and whom all the militia and regulars have not been able to dislodge.

In pursuing my view of this subject, let me observe, that Pensacola and all East Florida are in possession of a foreign Power. I could wish that gentlemen would lay the map before them, and view all the points from which we might be invaded between the Chattahoochie and Mississippi rivers, and see whether the means of defence could be so readily furnished from any other quarter as the Mississippi Territory, provided it had the population which it is susceptible of. But the settlement of this country is an object of sufficient importance to claim the attention of this House, though viewed in relation to the protection of New Orleans alone. The State of Louisiana is certainly a very fine country, and possesses, perhaps, more advantages than any other State in the Union; yet its localities are such as to render it unsusceptible of a large compact population; and some of its settlements are too remote from New Orleans to afford it such speedy succor it might need. The Mississippi Territory is susceptible of such a population, and, being contiguous, could, if settled to the extent of its capacity, afford more prompt and efficient aid to that city, than all the Western and Southern States combined. The importance of this great emporium (New Orleans) to all the upper country, needs not to be shown. Once let it fall into the hands of an enemy, and I perceive a general sensation and effect throughout all the States and Territories that enjoy its trade. It might be recovered, indeed, (no doubt of this,) but in doing so the Delta of the Mississippi would furnish untimely graves for thousands of the brave youth of the West.

The settlement of the Mississippi Territory would be highly advantageous in another point of view. Its climate and soil render it particularly capable of producing that valuable raw material (cotton) which is now in such general demand, and which it could furnish to all the manufacturing and commercial States; whilst it would afford an extensive market for the manufactures and other articles which those States would find it to their advantage to supply. In short, whether this Territory be considered in relation to its susceptibility of commercial advantages, or its capacity for military defence, (were it well settled,) there is not a more interesting portion of country in all the United States.

But if the claims of the Yazoo companies, which cover this territory, are not compromised, what will be the effect on the pecuniary interest of the United States? The gentleman from Georgia says if these companies are entitled to any of the land, they are entitled to all; then let them take the whole, if they can obtain it by law. To say nothing of the loss which the United States would sustain in such an event, by being deprived of the proceeds of the future sales of these lands, it may be well to inquire what they would have to refund, if the companies establish the whole of their claim. This claim embraces nearly all the lands held by the present settlers of the Territory. Some of these hold under titles, legally and fully executed, derived from the Spanish Government, which are expressly confirmed by the articles of agreement and cession between the United States and the State of Georgia. Others held under incomplete Spanish titles, which the United States have also confirmed. And others who are purchasers, (the most numerous description of all,) hold under titles originally and exclusively derived from the United States. Of these purchasers, some have completed their payments, others have paid in part, and all will have to pay the whole. The lands purchased are obtained at two dollars per acre; but it is impossible to say what their increased value may be. This will depend much on the labor and expense which may be bestowed on their improvement. Some may be worth four dollars the acre, some six, some ten, and others more. Who, then, can calculate the amount which the United States may have to refund? And what will they make by the purchase from Georgia, if the claimants under the act of that State obtain the whole extent of their claim? They will have made a very bad bargain with Georgia in such an event. I think Georgia has made a very good one on her part, and that she ought to be content. She receives $1,250,000, and gets rid of much trouble and perplexity, which she has shifted from herself upon the United States. Yet the gentlemen from Georgia seem unwilling that the United States also should get rid of the embarrassments which the Legislature of their State has produced. Why are the United States paying to Georgia $1,250,000 if they are not to be permitted to save a part of the purchase by extinguishing the Yazoo claims? If these claims eventually succeed to their full extent, and the United States, of consequence, lose their territory, after paying the $1,250,000, and after paying all the various expenses incurred in the adjustment of claims, and the disposal of lands in that Territory, and still have to compensate the settlers who may lose their lands, I repeat the question—what will they make by the purchase?

But there is one short answer to all this. Gentlemen say they will not compromise with corruption and fraud. This position is too abstract; and the zeal indulged on this subject seems to be displayed rather against the act than those who committed it. The authors of this criminal speculation are not within the reach of this House. The original purchasers have transferred their claims, which have passed into the hands of those whose innocence should be presumed. I am not the advocate of the present claimants. I know nothing of them. Still I cannot but believe, from the documents before me, that they were generally ignorant of the fraud. But admitting that they are all corrupt, equally corrupt with the original purchasers, what then? I will give gentlemen as broad ground as they wish, and broader than they have assumed. I will suppose, for the sake of argument, that all the present claimants had knowledge of the fraudulent transaction; and then ask, if we the people of the Mississippi Territory are to be punished for their crime? I foresee, sir, that such will be the issue, if the compromise contemplated by the bill does not take place. I cannot but reflect upon the injustice of such a case. The guilty original purchasers, and the more guilty sellers, (the Legislature of Georgia,) have escaped justice, and profited by their guilt; the present claimants have a legal decision in their favor; while the innocent settlers in the Territory, who have had no sort of participation in the transaction, must yield their rights, or preserve them at the risk of their lives. And what might be the issue of the contest, I cannot say. I would, sir, be far from encouraging or wishing such a contest. But gentlemen are acquainted with human nature as well as I am. They all know how much men are attached to their property, especially to property in land on which they reside. And why? Because it is their home, the dwelling place of their families, which the recollection of a thousand interesting domestic and social scenes renders them reluctant to leave. Sir, there is an injury sustained in such cases, a violence done to the feelings, for which no reparation can be made. If even complete pecuniary compensation were provided, many would still be unwilling to take an equivalent in money for an abode of their choice, which many considerations endear to their minds. It may be that there is a sacred spot on the premises, where the remains of their connexions are deposited; and what sensibilities will be excited, if families are driven from their homes, and forced to abandon the soil which contains the ashes of their friends!

Mr. Speaker, I cannot but advert to the course which has been given to this bill. When it came from the Senate and was about to be read, it was ordered to lie on the table, although several other bills in a similar situation were read immediately thereafter, and disposed of in the usual way. After lying some time, this bill was at length called up, when a motion for its rejection was made. This having failed, it was regularly referred and reported on; and after being again before the House, and after having undergone sufficient discussion for a decision on its merits, a motion is now made for its indefinite postponement. I have all along apprehended this motion, recollecting that when I had formerly the honor of a seat in this House, it was by such means that the compromise was always defeated, although there was then always a majority that seemed in favor of its being carried into effect. Among those who approved of the measure, there are always some who are willing to put off its adoption until a more convenient season, which season never arrives.

The gentleman from Georgia says he is tired and sick of the subject. Why then defer it from year to year? If gentlemen from Georgia are so tired and sick of this question, what should the people of the Mississippi Territory be, who have so much at stake? They have but too much cause to be tired of anxiety and sick of suspense; and I may well exclaim for them, we are weary of conjecture. To do, or not to do? That is the question. Whether it be better to prepare to resign to the injustice which awaits us with folded arms, or to raise them in defence of our rights?

Why postpone this question again? Is it to be without end? Has not the settlement of our territory been already sufficiently retarded by the claim, which this bill is intended to put at rest? Had it been compromised ten years ago, as then proposed, the country might have contained at this time, instead of forty or fifty thousand, one hundred and fifty or two hundred thousand souls, and have been sufficiently strong to control all savage hostility, and check the sanguinary intrigues of the Governor of Pensacola, who has furnished the means of our destruction, and evinced as much enmity as he dares to do, and more than would have been suffered with impunity by any other Government than that of the United States. Yes, sir, to the postponement of this compromise may justly be attributed all the blood which has been shed, and all the treasure which has been expended in this war with the Creeks.

But, sir, while I ascribe to such a cause the evils we have sustained, I am far from supposing anything like hostility in the minds of honorable gentlemen to the Mississippi Territory. Among those who oppose this compromise, I see a number of my old friends who, in other respects, have uniformly supported the interests of the country. I represent. I do not call in question the motives of gentlemen. My observations apply to the tendency, and what I fear will be the result, of their course in relation to this claim. No, sir, I cannot suppose hostility to our Territory from either side of the House, or from any branch of the Government. Such a supposition would oppose all my former experience, and be the reverse of what I have both known and declared. For it has been my pride and my boast to feel myself, and say to my constituents, that our section of the Union has never ceased to obtain the patronage of the Government of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the motion for postponement will not prevail. I wish to see the question decided upon its merits. If a majority suppose the bill to be improper, let it be rejected, that we may prepare for events. If a majority conceive it proper, why delay its passage another whole year? We have already suffered much, and may yet suffer more. What do we ask? Not a grant of lands—no direct positive gift. We solicit a preservation from evils, the removal of obstacles that lie in our way. We wish things to take only their common and natural course, and to see the country settle and strengthen without unnecessary impediment or delay. Our property, our rights, our lives, are at risk; and it is time to begin to provide the means of our protection and defence. If they are to be provided at all, I do hope that the provision will not be deferred. Why defer it when so much apprehension and danger exist, and while the Indian tomahawk is still held over our heads?

Mr. GHOLSON, of Virginia, opposed the bill very decidedly on the grounds heretofore occupied, viz: the fraud of the original transaction; the fallacy of the reasoning, and error of judgment of the Supreme Court; the slender title of the present claimants to the charity, and their want of claim, on the justice of the Government, &c. Mr. G. in substance said he did not impute corrupt motives to the members of Congress. On the contrary, he said that he believed gentlemen who from policy and prudential considerations had advocated the bill, were actuated by the purest motives. He believed them to be honorable men. But, he said, he feared, if the bill passed, that the future historian, and posterity, in reviewing this transaction, would couple with the original grant of the Georgia Legislature, the act of compromise of the thirteenth Congress, and that the proper distinction between the two might not be sufficiently discerned.

Mr. STANFORD, of North Carolina, opposed the bill in a short speech.

Mr. LATTIMORE, of Mississippi, submitted a few remarks in reply to Mr. STANFORD.

After some explanatory conversation between Mr. YANCEY and Mr. GHOLSON, the latter of whom had been misunderstood in a remark he had made on this subject—

Mr. YANCEY, of North Carolina, stated concisely the reasons which would govern him in voting for the bill. He should support its passage from a belief in its present expediency, and not from any view to sanction the original corruption of the Yazoo speculation.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, offered a few additional remarks, and Mr. ALSTON, of North Carolina, said a few words in explanation of a fact which had been alluded to; when

The question was taken on the motion to postpone the bill indefinitely, and decided in the negative—yeas 72, nays 83, as follows:

*Remission of Duties.

H. OF R.

Mr. MACON, of North Carolina, spoke a few minutes on a particular clause of the bill.

Mr. FISK, of New York, replied.

Mr. ALSTON then moved to amend the bill by striking out the following words, contained in the 14th line of the 1st section, to wit: "a sufficient legal release of all such claim or claims to the United States," and to insert these words: "such sufficient release as, in the opinion of the President of the United States, shall release to the United States and discharge all claims to the said lands." But before the question was taken the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 25.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, reported a bill to revive, and continue in force, "An act declaring the assent of Congress to certain acts of the States of Maryland and Georgia;" which was read twice and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Joseph Anderson, and a resolution of the 29th of January, directing an inquiry into the justice of making good certain bounties in land promised during the Revolutionary war by the State of Virginia to her officers, soldiers, seamen, &c., made a report, which was ordered to be referred to a Committee of the Whole, and be printed—ayes 91.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "to authorize two lotteries in Georgetown, District of Columbia;" also, a joint resolution for the appointment of a joint committee to inquire into the expediency of establishing permanent rules for regulating and conducting the printing of the two Houses;" in which bill and resolution they ask the concurrence of this House. The Senate have disagreed to the report of the Committee of Conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses to the sixteenth amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill for the better organizing, paying, and supplying the Army of the United States," and ask a further conference on the subject-matter thereof: and the Senate have appointed managers at said conference on their part.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred the petition of James Washburn and John Alexander, of New Bedford, Mass., made the following report, which was read and concurred in:

The object of the petitioners is to be relieved from the payment of two executions which have been issued against them. The facts as set forth are these:

The petitioners, in the Summer of 1811, despatched the schooner Mars, a coasting vessel, to Eastport, in Massachusetts, for a load of plaster of Paris, which was obtained; on her return she was seized, and the vessel and cargo were libelled. Judgment by the court was given against the vessel and cargo, on this ground: that the vessel, as a coasting vessel, was engaged, contrary to law, in a foreign trade; all which will evidently appear by a reference to the record. The petitioners seek relief from Congress, and rely to obtain it on the ground that the plaster of Paris, which was purchased of a certain Solomon Rice, of Eastport, was legally imported into the United States. This case has been solemnly decided by the judiciary, on great deliberation, after giving the parties ample time to make their defence. The fact on which they depend for obtaining relief from Congress, if it existed at all, had an existence prior to the institution of a libel against the said vessel and cargo, and might have been made manifest to the court. But this was not done; no new case is made out; a review of the cause, in the nature of an appeal, is solicited. This solicitation is contrary to every principle of jurisprudence, were it to be granted. Infinite mischief would be the result, and the province of the judicatories of the United States would be invaded. If the parties have sustained any damage, it is fairly chargeable to their own rashness or negligence. If they are without a remedy, they are the cause of it. From this view of the case, the committee are compelled to recommend to the House the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petition.

REMISSION OF DUTIES.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred the petition of Zenon Orso, a native of New Orleans, made the following report, which was read and ordered to lie on the table:

The petitioner states, that, since the year 1809, he has purchased of John D. Beckett, and others, merchants of New Orleans, sundry articles of foreign merchandise, the duties on which he was informed, and verily believes, have been paid. That the merchandise, thus purchased, at sundry times, was shipped on board the coasting schooner Victoire, to the town of Mobile, in that part of Louisiana, of which possession had not been delivered to the Government of the United States, and there landed the said merchandise, and disposed of a part of the same. The petitioner also, further states, that, towards the end of November, 1810, it was generally believed, that a certain Reuben Kemper, with others associated with him, had formed a plan for taking, plundering, and burning the said town of Mobile. The petitioner, apprehending an attack on the said town, embarked for the county of Baldwin, near Fort Stoddert, carrying with him, in the said schooner Victoire, his family, and the merchandise which remained unsold; the articles of which are enumerated in the invoice annexed to this petition. On the arrival of which merchandise, at the port of Fort Stoddert, the petitioner reported to the collector of the district of Mobile, who compelled him to enter the same, and give bond for the payment of duties on the same. The petitioner prays to be relieved from the payment of the said bond, amounting to upwards of six hundred dollars.

The committee, on mature consideration of this case, are impressed with the opinion, that they have no jurisdiction over the same. They think that it belongs, properly, to the cognizance of the judiciary. The petitioner complains that he has been compelled, by the collector at Fort Stoddert, to execute a bond contrary to law, for the payment of duties on certain merchandise, not liable to pay duties. The case is briefly this: the merchandise subjected to duty, he says, he purchased of John D. Beckett, and others, at New Orleans, in the years 1809 and 1810, the duties, previously to his purchasing the same, having been paid. That, in the year 1809 he moved, and carried with him to the town of Mobile, the merchandise then purchased; and that at sundry times afterwards, in the year 1810, he received at the last mentioned place, other articles of merchandise, purchased of the said John D. Beckett, and others; and that he resided at the town of Mobile, till the latter end of November, 1810; at which time, apprehending an attack on the town, by a certain Reuben Kemper and others, he removed, with the merchandise then unsold, to the county of Baldwin, near Fort Stoddert. If the petitioner has been constrained, illegally, to secure the duties on the above-mentioned merchandise, the courts of law are open to the petitioner for relief; to them he ought to resort. The petitioner can fairly bring his case to a judicial examination and decision, by refusing to pay the bond, executed by him to secure the duties to the United States. It is the province of the Legislature to enact laws, but not to expound and enforce them. Happily for this nation, these solemn duties are confided to separate and distinct departments. The committee can never be brought to countenance an usurpation of power, by any of their acts. The demarkations which the Constitution has fixed and assigned to the several co-ordinate branches of the Government, will be sedulously kept in view. They will never pass, knowingly, the barrier prescribed by the Constitution to their functions. These considerations, they conceive, sufficiently justify them in recommending to the House of Representatives to refuse the interposition of its extraordinary powers, and the propriety of leaving the petitioner to his remedy at law. But, should the House deem this position not solid, and require a report on the merits of the case; in order to meet with promptitude such a requisition, and to prevent delay, the committee beg leave to offer the following views on the merits of the claim of the petitioner, to a remission of the duties:

On a full and deliberate examination of this case, this committee are of opinion, that relief ought not to be granted. The reasons which have led them to form this opinion, are the following: The petitioner, who states that he is a citizen of the United States, knew, at the time that he removed from New Orleans, with the avowed intention of taking his stand, of residing at the town of Mobile, and carrying on there the business of a merchant, that the town of Mobile was in possession of the Spaniards, and subject, while they possessed it, to the laws of Spain.

He had voluntarily removed himself from the jurisdiction of the laws of the United States, and had relinquished during such residence there, all claim to the privileges which they impart. Had he committed, while he resided there, an offence, which was punishable by the Spanish laws, he would have been amenable to them? Had he imported merchandise there, it would likewise have been subject to the tariff of the Spanish customs, and the duties arising from the same, would have gone to the Spanish treasury. These are positions the committee take to be undeniable; no exception can be made to them; nor can the petitioner avail to himself any advantage, by alleging, that the town of Mobile, was a part of Louisiana; because, although the town in fact was part of the territory belonging to the United States, yet the possession of it had not been obtained by the Government of the United States, from that of Spain.

During the forcible detainer of the town of Mobile, by the Spanish Government, that of the United States could view it in no other light, than as being, during the possession thereof by the Spaniards, for all purposes of commerce and intercourse, a place under the jurisdiction of a foreign nation. Had the Government of the United States considered it in any other point of view, the town of Mobile would have been the emporium of foreign merchandise for the surrounding country, and the treasury of the United States would have been defrauded of the duties arising on their importation. If these reasons be sound, and the committee are persuaded that they are so, the petitioner can have no just cause for complaining that the merchandise, which he removed from the town of Mobile, to the county of Baldwin, has been subjected to the payment of duties to the United States. Should this ground, however, prove to be untenable, which the committee apprehend is not likely to be done; another consideration of which the petitioner's case is susceptible, will place it beyond every hope of redress, and show, in the strongest manner, that, by granting relief, all the just rules which reason and law sanction, would be violated.

The petitioner, in substantiating his claim to have the duties remitted, which he has been compelled to secure to the United States, by the collector of Fort Stoddert, insists much on this fact, that the merchandise, on which the duties have been paid, was purchased of certain merchants in New Orleans, on which the duties, previous to his purchasing the same, had been paid to the United States. This statement, and the confident reliance of the petitioner on it, to make good his claim, requires some examination. To perform which task, the committee are necessarily compelled to analyze the evidence offered by the petitioner. The deposition of John D. Beckett, taken ex parte, amounts to this, that certain merchandise, specified in the invoice annexed to the petition, was purchased of him at New Orleans, in the years 1809 and 1810, but it does not prove that the merchandise which was removed in 1810, by the petitioner, in the schooner Victoire, a coasting vessel of the United States, to the aforementioned county of Baldwin, was the same merchandise which had been purchased of him in the years 1809 and 1810. Nor was it possible for the deponent to do so. How could he depose to the identity of the articles of merchandise, after such a lapse of time? Could not the town of Mobile be furnished in the course of trade, with the like articles, from no other person than the deponent; from no other place than New Orleans? The attempt to prove the fact as stated, would be proving too much; it would be proving a thing, if not impossible, that was at least highly improbable. The fact, then, that the merchandise which was removed to the aforementioned county of Baldwin, was a part of the same specified in the invoice, and which was purchased as aforementioned, is proved only by the statement and averment of the petitioner alone. This testimony is inadmissible; it is contrary to all the rules of enlightened jurisprudence, that the party interested should be a witness; nay, the sole witness in his own cause. The committee do not intend, by their mode of examining this case, to implicate the characters of the petitioner, or the deponent. These are persons unknown to them; and they deprecate nothing more than the infliction of injury on the feelings and characters of those who shall pass in their view and review, while performing the sacred office of judges. To keep the scales of justice in equipoise, between the Government and the citizen, is the sole object of the committee. To effectuate this object, always desirable, but of difficult attainment, the freedom of discussion is essential. Truth cannot be arrived at without the vigorous and free exercise and exertion of the faculties of the mind. Her lights must be elicited, like sparks from the flint; to those belong the property to animate and to cherish, and, when just cause and imperious necessity shall require, to blast, or to consume.

For these reasons, the committee respectfully submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition.

YAZOO CLAIMS.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill to compromise the claims to lands in the Mississippi Territory.

Mr. ALSTON's amendment, proposing to strike out of the 4th section, the words "a sufficient legal release of all such claim or claims to the United States," and insert "such sufficient release as in the opinion of the President of the United States," being still under consideration—

Messrs. OAKLEY and FISK, of New York, opposed its adoption, and Mr. ALSTON supported it.

The question on Mr. ALSTON's motion was decided in the negative, without a division.

Mr. YANCEY moved to add the following proviso to the end of the 4th section:

"Provided further, That no person or persons, making payment for lands in certificates authorized to be issued by this act, shall be entitled to discount for prompt payment, now allowed by law to purchasers of public lands."

And the question being taken, it passed in the affirmative.

Mr. BARNETT moved to amend the bill by inserting a new section as the 8th section of the bill, as follows:

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That no original grantee or grantees, their heirs or devisees, or any person or persons concerned in, or privy to, the fraud in the original contract, or any one claiming under them, having notice of the fraud at the time of purchase, shall be entitled to any benefit arising from the provisions of this bill, but all such claims shall accrue to the United States."

This proposition produced considerable discussion, in which Messrs. OAKLEY, BARNETT, FISK of New York, WRIGHT, GRUNDY, WEBSTER, PICKENS, JACKSON of Virginia, FISK of Vermont, and SHARP, took a part.

Mr. SHARP, of Kentucky, took occasion to express his opinions respecting the principle of the bill. He reprobated, in an energetic and eloquent manner, the fraud of the original purchase, and invoked the House not to sanction so corrupt a transaction, and prostrate the principles of justice itself, from motives of expediency and policy.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, opposed the amendment. He likewise reiterated the reasons he had before submitted in support of the bill in its present shape; and disclaimed for himself any intention, either directly or indirectly, to give countenance to the original fraud. His object was to extend relief to innocent and uncontaminated sufferers, who, but for the compromise contemplated, would be involved in undeserved ruin, and to that ruin he would not consent to abandon them.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, briefly replied to Mr. SHARP, and vindicated his reasons for advocating the bill.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, explained concisely some of the opinions advanced by him yesterday against the bill, and replied to the several gentlemen on the other side. He likewise disclaimed any design to impeach the motives of those gentlemen who advocated the bill.

Mr. FISK, of Vermont, spoke with much zeal against the amendment. He said that, while the House was unanimously condemning the fraud of the first purchase, the proposed amendment, by requiring an oath to entitle claimants to indemnification, was, in effect, offering a bribe to swear falsely. He entered at some length, also, into an investigation of the policy of the bill, which he supported.

Mr. BARNETT, of Georgia, replied to Mr. FISK, and again urged the propriety of the amendment.

Mr. HALL, of Georgia, followed in support of the amendment, and adduced various considerations in its favor.

Mr. GHOLSON, of Virginia, made a few remarks on the amendment and on the bill. He said the claims which gave rise to the bill were founded on the decision of the Supreme Court so often alluded to, yet, in all the classes of claimants comprehended in the proposed amendment, not a case could be found similar to the case decided by the Court. He took occasion also to disclaim, in a remark he made yesterday, and which had been noticed in the course of debate, any intention to wound the feelings of gentlemen in favor of the compromise, or to reflect on their motives.

Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, replied to Mr. GHOLSON, so far as respected his allusion to the decision of the Supreme Court; which decision he explained, and illustrated in an argumentative and perspicuous manner. He likewise touched upon and advocated the validity of the act making the original Yazoo grant, and the consequent nullity of the rescinding act; which opinion he supported by the great principle of the Constitution that declares no State shall pass a law to impair the obligation of contracts, &c.

The question was then taken on Mr. BARNETT's amendment, and lost. For the amendment 71, against it, 86, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Bard, Barnett, Beall, Bowen, Brown, Burwell, Caldwell, Calhoun, Condict, Conard, Crawford, Crouch, Cuthbert, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Duvall, Earle, Eppes, Evans, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Grundy, Hall, Hawes, Humphreys, Hungerford, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irwin, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kennedy, Kerr, Lefferts, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKee, McKim, McLean, Moore, Murfree, Nelson, Newton, Ormsby, Piper, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Ringgold, Roane, Sage, Seybert, Sharp, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Strong, Tannehill, Telfair, Troup, Udree, Whitehill, Wilson of Pennsylvania, and Wright.

NAMES—Messrs. Archer, Avery, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brigham, Butler, Champion, Cilley, Clark, Comstock, Cooper, Cox, Creighton, Culpeper, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Ely, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forney, Gaston, Geddes, Grosvenor, Harris, Hasbrouck, Howell, Hufty, Irving, Jackson of Rhode Island, Jackson of Virginia, Kent of New York, Kent of Maryland, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of Massachusetts, King of North Carolina, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Lowndes, Markell, Miller, Moffit, Montgomery, Moseley, Oakley, Parker, Pearson, Pickering, Pickens, Pitkin, Post, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Rich, Richardson, Ridgely, Robertson, Ruggles, Sherwood, Skinner, Smith of New Hampshire, Smith of New York, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Taylor, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Webster, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Williams, Wilson of Massachusetts, Winter, Wood, and Yancey.

A motion was made by Mr. OAKLEY, to amend the third section of the bill, by inserting the following proviso, to come in as the first proviso of that section:

"Provided, That every person having claim under either of the said companies, and entitled to indemnity by virtue of this act, shall receive such indemnity only in proportion to the amount of such claim."

And the question being taken, it passed in the affirmative.

After the proviso which commences in the 27th line of the second section, so as to read, "and provided, also."

A motion was then made, by Mr. OAKLEY, to amend the bill by inserting a new section, to come in between the seventh and eighth sections, as follows:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That, whenever the legal estate in any of the said lands (supposing the said act of the Legislature of the State of Georgia, of the 7th of January, 1795, had been valid and effectual) shall be vested in any person or persons who, at the time of the passing of this act, shall be under the age of twenty-one years, it shall be lawful for the guardian or guardians of such person or persons, appointed in pursuance of the laws of the respective States in which such person or persons may reside, to execute for and in behalf of such person or persons, and deposit in the office of the Secretary of State of the United States, the release, assignment, and power, mentioned in the first section of this act; which said release, assignment, and power, so executed and deposited, as aforesaid, are hereby declared to be good and effectual, to all intents and purposes.

And the question being taken, it passed in the affirmative.

A motion was made by Mr. INGHAM, to amend the third section of the bill, by striking out these words: "Out of the first moneys in the Treasury of the United States arising from the sales of public lands in the Mississippi Territory, after the money due to the State of Georgia, and the expenses of surveying such lands, have been satisfied;" and, in lieu thereof, to insert the following: "in the manner prescribed by the fourth section of this act."

And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

A motion was then made by Mr. PICKENS, to amend the bill, by adding to the end of the eighth section, as adopted, the following words:

"That in case of femmes covert claiming lands under the act, or pretended act, of the State of Georgia, aforesaid, passed the 7th day of January, 1795, it shall be lawful for the husband and wife to join in the execution of the release, assignment, and transfer, mentioned in the first section of this act, and that such release, assignment, and transfer, shall be good and effectual as as to the interest of such wife: Provided, That the release, assignment, and transfer, executed as aforesaid, shall be acknowledged before a judge or justice of a court of record, and shall have the attestation of such judge or justice, certifying that, on the separate examination of the wife, she acknowledged that she had freely and voluntarily executed the same."

And the question being taken, it passed in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. OAKLEY, the bill was further amended, by striking out the word "August," in the first and second sections, and inserting the word "January."

A motion was made, by Mr. GRUNDY, to amend the third section, by striking out the following words, contained in the 3d and 4th lines: "or of any of them, as are hereinbefore prescribed," and insert the following words: "to the amount of at least nine-tenths of the whole lands claimed by virtue of the sales made by the Legislature of the State of Georgia, to the respective companies hereafter enumerated."

A motion was made by Mr. OAKLEY, to amend the amendment offered by Mr. GRUNDY, by striking out the word "nine," and inserting "six."

And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

A motion was then made, by Mr. WRIGHT, to amend the amendment proposed by Mr. GRUNDY, by striking out the word "nine," and inserting "eight."

And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

The question was then taken to agree to the said amendment, and passed in the affirmative.

A motion was then made, by Mr. OAKLEY, to add to the amendment proposed by Mr. GRUNDY, and last adopted, the following words: "exclusive of such claims to the said lands as shall have vested in the United States by the operation of law."

And the question thereon being taken, it passed in the affirmative.

A motion was made, by Mr. ALSTON, to amend the bill, by inserting, after the word "who," in the twenty-eighth line of the third section, the following words: "by themselves, their agents, or partners."

And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

A motion was made, by Mr. GRUNDY, to add a proviso to the end of the third section, in the following words:

MARCH, 1814.

Yazoo Claims.

H. OF R.

"And, provided also, That no certificate of stock shall issue until at least nine-tenths of the claims derived under the sales made by the State of Georgia, exclusive of such claims to the said lands as shall have vested in the United States by operation of law, shall have been surrendered and duly released, as required by this act,"

And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

A motion was made, by Mr. YANCEY, to amend the bill, by striking out from the word "claims," in the 3d line of the 8th section of the bill as sent from the Senate, to the end of that section, and inserting the following words: "within the time 'and upon the conditions mentioned in this act, they shall be forever thereafter precluded of the benefit of the said compromise.'"

And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. GASTON said he was conscious that a majority of the House were impatient for a decision upon the bill, and would receive with reluctance any proposition to amend it. But he felt it a duty emphatically to declare his disapprobation of a principle contained in one of the sections of the bill, and he knew of no mode by which this intention could be so effectually executed as by moving to strike out that section. Whatever might be the result of this motion, earnestly as he wished it to succeed, he should vote in favor of the bill. He should give this vote because of his conviction that the public peace and the prosperity of an extensive territory demanded that a dangerous controversy should be quieted, and the examination of the committee rendered it almost certain that the bill would produce this salutary consequence. The bill holds forth an offer of compromise to the claimants under the act of Georgia, which we have reason to believe will be generally if not universally accepted. The compromise would probably be more advantageous to them than the assertion of a doubtful and deservedly odious claim. It assuredly, in his judgment, was less injurious to the nation than the possibility that this claim might be hereafter asserted with effect.

That a reasonable time should be allowed to the claimants to determine on the acceptance or rejection of this proposition, and that all that declined acceptance within the prescribed period, should be excluded from the benefit of it, was perfectly correct. He approved also of the amendment which had been incorporated into the bill, forbidding all compromise unless nine-tenths of the claimants should embrace it. But the eighth section (said Mr. G.) undertakes to do what I cannot sanction. In substance, it declares that those who will not accede to the compromise shall forfeit their claims to the land derived under the act of Georgia. I will not say that you have not the power to legislate to this effect; but I do say, if you have the power, the exercise of it is arbitrary and despotic. You are not, indeed, fettered as the Legislature of Georgia by constitutional prohibitions to impair the obligation of contracts, but you are bound by the fundamental maxims of justice not to annihilate vested rights without the consent of those to whom they appertain. The principle involved in this section is as tyrannical as that which characterized the repealing and (as the Supreme Court has pronounced) the void act of the Legislature of Georgia. You in fact say to the claimants, "if you will not accept of what we choose to give, what you have shall be taken away." The principle is monstrous—I protest against it, and to record that protest move you that the eighth section be stricken out.

And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

A motion was made, by Mr. HALL, to amend the bill, by striking out from the words "use of," in the 10th line of the sixth section, to the end of that section, and to insert the following words: "Such person or persons as were, at that time, or now are, seized in fee of the title, and shall be, and hereby are, declared to be holden and liable to refund and pay the amount to such person or persons, or their legal representatives. And the Commissioners herein named, for the use of the United States, shall deduct the amount of the money so withdrawn, from the sums which may be allowed in the compromise herein contemplated with persons claiming under, and deriving title from, any original grantee or grantees, their associates, or agents, in proportion to the respective sums which have been drawn by or in the name of such company or companies, or by any person under them, in terms of the aforesaid act of the State of Georgia."

And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

Finally, the question was stated on engrossing the amendments, and, together with the bill, being passed to a third reading; when

Mr. PICKENS, of South Carolina, asked leave substantially to state the reasons which would govern him in voting against the bill. He then took a brief view of the subject, and declared his belief in the expediency and propriety of a compromise; but the bill was defective, he said, in certain particulars, which, in his opinion, rendered its passage improper, and which could not be remedied at this late hour, even though he were able to frame the necessary amendments.

The question, as stated above, was then taken, and decided in the affirmative. For engrossing 85, against it 65.

— SATURDAY, March 26.

Mr. INGERSOLL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made a report on the petition of the Board of Trustees of Jefferson College, in the Mississippi Territory; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WEBSTER, of New Hampshire, presented the petition of sundry inhabitants of the town of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, sufferers by the late destructive fire in that town, praying to be allowed to transport lime by water from the District of Maine, to enable them to rebuild their houses; which was read, and referred to a select committee, with instructions to bring in a bill conformable to the prayer of the petition—Messrs. WEBSTER, WARD of Massachusetts, FORSYTH, WOOD, and KENNEDY, were appointed the committee.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report on the resolution of sundry inhabitants of the Illinois Territory, referred on the 21st of December last; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, therein mentioned," with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The amendments were read, and, together with the bill, were ordered to lie on the table.

The bill from the Senate "to authorize two lotteries in Georgetown, District of Columbia," was read twice, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter addressed to him, enclosing the certificate of the election of JOSEPH H. HAWKINS, to serve in this House, as one of the members of the State of Kentucky, in the place of Henry Clay, resigned. Referred to the Committee of Elections.

The House proceeded to consider the message from the Senate, asking a further conference upon the subject-matter of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the 16th amendment made by this House to the bill "for the better organizing, paying, and supplying, the Army of the United States." When,

Mr. TROUP, from the managers appointed on the part of this House, to attend the conference on the said disagreeing votes, made a report; which was read: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House do agree to the request of the Senate for a further conference upon the subject-matter of the said 16th amendment, and that Messrs. TROUP, TALLMADGE, and DESHA, be managers at the same, on the part of this House.

A joint resolution from the Senate for appointing a joint committee to establish permanent rules and regulations for the printing of the two Houses was taken up, and, being amended, on motion of Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, by adding the words "supply of stationery," to the resolution; it was agreed to, and a committee ordered on the part of this House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "for the relief of David Porter, and his officers and crews;" also, a bill "authorizing the President of the United States to exchange a certain parcel of land in the city of New York, for other lands in the same city, or its vicinity," in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. TROUP, from the conferees on the part of the House, appointed, this day, to attend a further conference with the conferees on the part of the Senate, on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill "for the better organizing, paying, and supplying the Army of the United States;" made a report; which was read, and adopted by the House.

YAZOO CLAIMS.

The bill from the Senate "for the indemnification of certain claimants of public lands in the Mississippi Territory," was read the third time as amended, and the question was stated: "Shall the bill pass?" Whereupon,

Mr. PICKENS moved to amend the bill, by adding thereto the following words, by way of rider:

"And be it further enacted, That all persons claiming lands under the aforesaid act, or pretended act, of the State of Georgia, passed January the 7th, 1795, shall produce all the evidences of their claims on or before the first day of January next, and deposit the same in the office of the Secretary of State of the United States, for the examination of the Commissioners appointed by virtue of this act, and for the purpose of being transcribed in a book to be kept for that purpose. And all persons claiming as aforesaid, who shall fail to produce and deposit the evidences of their claims, as herein required, shall forfeit all such claims to the United States; and no claim, or evidence of claim, not so produced and deposited on or before the day mentioned in this section, shall ever be admitted in evidence in any court whatever, against any title derived from the United States:

This motion gave rise to a short discussion, in which Messrs. PICKENS, OAKLEY, FISK of New York, WRIGHT, MACON, GASTON, STANFORD, CURTHER, and FORSYTH, took part; during which Mr. STANFORD made a motion to commit the bill and rider to a select committee, which motion was lost.

The question was then taken on ordering the rider to be engrossed, and decided in the negative—ayes 60, noes 71.

Mr. PICKENS then, with a view to render the bill less exceptionable to himself and others, moved to recommit it to a Committee of the Whole; which motion was lost without a division.

The bill being put on its passage—

Mr. SHARP, of Kentucky, in an animated speech of more than half an hour, opposed its passage. He took a rapid but comprehensive view of the subject, and opposed the bill on grounds both of inexpediency and injustice.

Mr. BARNETT, of Georgia, followed on the same side of the question. Having been an eyewitness of the original fraud, and having a personal knowledge of all its enormity, he spoke in a feeling manner of that transaction and of its consequences, &c.

Mr. RICHARDSON, of Massachusetts, spoke a short time in support of the bill and in reply to gentlemen who opposed it.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, replied to Mr. RICHARDSON, and entered again into an investigation of the bill, which he opposed with his usual force, not from the just abhorrence he felt at the original corruption of the purchase, because that question was laid at rest, but from a conviction of the inexpediency, impolicy, and inadequacy of the bill to the objects contemplated.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, followed in an energetic and able defence of the bill; in the course of which he replied to the gentlemen opposed to him, took a succinct and lucid view of the subject, and enforced and illustrated the various reasons that influenced him in his support of the bill.

Mr. McKIM, of Maryland, stated concisely the reasons which would induce him to vote against the bill; and declared that his opposition arose not so much from his hostility to a compromise as from a want of confidence in the bill, which he deemed insufficient to effect its object, &c.

With a view of adducing certain facts which had come into his possession, and which might possibly shed some light on the subject, Mr. GHOLSON, of Virginia, moved to recommit the bill to a Committee of the whole House.

Mr. ALSTON, of North Carolina, supported this motion, and took occasion to deliver his sentiments in part on the bill, which he opposed.

Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, made a few remarks in reply to an observation of Mr. ALSTON; when the question was taken on the motion to commit the bill, and lost without a division.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 84, nays 76, as follows:

YAYS—Messrs. Avery, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brigham, Butler, Champion, Cilley, Clark, Comstock, Cooper, Cox, Culpeper, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Ely, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Gaston, Geddes, Gourdin, Grosvenor, Hanson, Hasbrouck, Howell, Hufty, Irving, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Lowndes, Markell, Miller, Moffit, Montgomery, Moseley, Oakley, Parker, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, Post, Potter, John Reed, Wm. Reed, Rich, Richardson, Ridgely, Robertson, Ruggles, Sherwood, Shipherd, Skinner, Smith of New Hampshire, Smith of New York, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Taylor, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Webster, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, Winter, Wood, Wright, and Yancey.

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Bard, Barnett, Beall, Bowen, Brown, Burwell, Caldwell, Calhoun, Condict, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Cuthbert, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Duvall, Earle, Eppes, Evans, Farrow, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Goodwyn, Griffin, Grundy, Hall, Harris, Hawes, Humphreys, Hungerford, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irwin, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, King of North Carolina, Leferts, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKim, McLean, Moore, Murfree, Nelson, Newton, Ormsby, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Ringgold, Roane, Sage, Seybert, Sharp, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Strong, Tannehill, Telfair, Troup, Udree, Whitehill, and Wilson of Pennsylvania.

And the House adjourned.

MONDAY, March 28.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of sundry inhabitants of Portsmouth, in New Hampshire, reported a bill to provide, during the continuance of the present embargo, for the transportation of lime, by water, from Thomastown and Camden, in the District of Maine, to Portsmouth, in New Hampshire; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill from the Senate, for the relief of David Porter, and his officers, "and his crews," was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill from the Senate, "authorizing the President of the United States to exchange a certain parcel of land in the city of New York for other lands in the same city, or its vicinity," was read twice, and ordered to be read the third time to-day. The bill was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they have passed the bill "for the relief of Edwin T. Satterwhite, late purser of the United States' brig Hornet," with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House. The amendments were read, and concurred in by the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "for the relief of Joseph Brevard;" also, a bill authorizing the purchase of a library for the use of the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States;" in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House. The first mentioned bill was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims. The last mentioned bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

MILITIA LAWS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to amend the militia laws, which was read through, and its various provisions were explained by Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, the chairman of the committee who reported it.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR an amendment was adopted by the Committee—fifty-four votes to forty—going to exempt from militia duty the Clerks to Congress and to the several departments about the seat of Government.

Considerable discussion then took place on an amendment proposed by Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, to authorize the Government to defray the expenses preparatory to and during the assemblage of militia called out by the General Government—not now provided for by law—in the same manner as is provided for defraying those accruing after their assemblage at the place of rendezvous. The amendment was warmly advocated by Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, Mr. EPPES, and Mr. NELSON, on the ground that the expenses incident to calling out and marching the militia on the requisition of the proper authority to its place of rendezvous, constituted as just a claim against the United States as those incurred afterwards. It was said that a construction had been given at the War Department adverse to such claims; that a provision for their allowance had been recommended by the President of the United States, and every principle of justice and policy sanctioned the adoption of the amendment. The chairman of the Militia Committee and others argued that it was impolitic to adopt the amendment; that it would subject the Government to the payment of improper expenditures of money, and that its retrospective operation was inadmissible. The objections urged against that provision in the section which required a payment of the expenses of calling out the militia induced its friends to consent to expunge it, and with that modification, the amendment was adopted by a vote of fifty-four to forty-three. The section, as agreed to, is in the following words:

And be it further enacted, That the expenses incurred or to be incurred by marching the militia of any State or Territory of the United States to their places of rendezvous, in pursuance of a requisition of the President of the United States, or which shall have been or may be incurred in cases of calls made by the authority of any State or Territory, which shall have been or may be approved by him, shall be adjusted and paid in like manner as the expenses incurred after such rendezvous on the requisition of the President of the United States: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be considered as authorizing any species of expenditure previous to arriving at the place of rendezvous, which is not provided by existing laws to be paid for after such rendezvous.

Several other amendments were made to the bill, which were reported to the House on the rising of the Committee.

When the first of these amendments came before the House, it was opposed by Messrs. BARNETT and HALL, of Georgia, on the ground that the persons proposed to be exempted were the best paid, best fed, and, perhaps, the ablest men in the District, and, considering these circumstances, ought to be the last exempted. Mr. TAYLOR, on the other hand, supported the amendment, on the ground of the convenience, if not absolute necessity, of such a regulation to the correct management of the affairs of the Government, which must be deranged by the absence of the clerks from the public offices.

Mr. TAYLOR proposed an amendment to the amendment, going to limit the exemption to the ordinary routine of militia duty only.

Messrs. BEALL, of Ohio, and EPPES, of Virginia, and others, opposed exemption in any degree, as well on the principle of equal rights and equal duties, as because such exemption as was now proposed would have a tendency to break up the excellent volunteer companies now existing in this city, &c.

A motion was made by Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, to strike out the whole section as agreed to in Committee, and the motion prevailed by a large majority. So the House determined to insert in the bill no provision on the subject.

The amendment agreed to in Committee on the motion of Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, next came under consideration.

Mr. RICH, of Vermont, moved to amend the amendment, by adding to it a provision that the expense proposed to be authorized to be defrayed by the Government, should be limited to that of transportation of baggage of the militia. To this Mr. JACKSON objected, as going to render completely nugatory the main amendment; and much discussion took place on it.

On Mr. RICH withdrawing the amendment, Mr. JACKSON consented to some verbal alterations in the amendment, as reported by the Committee, and the question on the adoption of his amendment was decided in the affirmative by yeas and nays—For the amendment 77, against it 36.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

TUESDAY, March 29.

Another member, to wit: JOSEPH H. HAWKINS, from Kentucky, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat, in the place of Henry Clay, resigned.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported the bill from the Senate, "to authorize two lotteries in Georgetown, District of Columbia," without amendment. The bill was then committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, made a report on the petition of the Governors of the New York Hospital; which was read, and the resolution therein contained, was concurred in by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, required to report to the House of Representatives of the United States of America, at their next session, the annual amount of the fund for the relief of sick and disabled seamen; and, also, whether the same ought to be increased, and the mode best calculated, if there exist a necessity for increasing the same, of effectuating the increase of that fund.

Mr. NEWTON also reported a bill for the relief of Archibald McCall; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill authorizing the appointment of agents for paying military pensions; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, the bill continuing the pay of the officers, seamen, and marines in the Navy of the United States, having passed through a Committee of the Whole, was, without objection, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

On motion of Mr. EPPES, it was resolved, by a large majority, that a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of an earlier meeting of Congress than the stated period, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

MARCH, 1814.

Petition of Thomas Owen—Militia Laws.

H. OF R.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "to revive and continue in force an act declaring the assent of Congress to certain acts of the States of Maryland and Georgia," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

PETITION OF THOMAS OWEN.

Mr. MOORE, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Thomas Owen, made a report; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House. The report is as follows:

That the petitioner states, that he is a manufacturer and mechanic by profession, and a native of Ireland; that he emigrated from that country, and arrived in the State of Maryland, in the year 1804, with a view of becoming a citizen of the United States; that he has ever since resided in that State, and married a woman, a native thereof, by whom he has several children; that, since his arrival in this country, he has devoted much of his time to the erection of several valuable manufactories (in which he is concerned in interest) in Baltimore county, in the State aforesaid; that he has made discoveries in manufacturing hemp and flax, which promise to be advantageous to the nation; that, in consequence of incorrect information relative to the naturalization laws, he was under the impression that they required a residence of eight years in the United States previous to a foreigner being permitted to take any steps towards being naturalized; that, confiding in the information thus received, he never made a declaration of his intention to become a citizen of the United States, as required by law, and in consequence thereof, although he had resided in the State of Maryland nearly eight years previous to the late declaration of war against Great Britain, he is precluded from the benefit of the act of Congress of the 30th July, 1813. Under this statement of his case, (which the committee believe to be correct,) the petitioner wishes a law to be passed to naturalize him. By virtue of the provisions of the act of Congress of the 6th July, 1798, the petitioner "is liable to be apprehended, restrained, secured, and removed, as an alien enemy;" and although Mr. Owen appears to be a man of fair and unsuspected character, yet the committee think it would be impolitic and inexpedient to exempt him from the provisions of the act of the 6th July, 1798, by passing a law for his naturalization. The committee also think there should be very strong circumstances to induce the Legislature, in any case, to pass a special act of naturalization, when there are general laws on the subject. They, therefore, are clearly of opinion, that the prayer of the petitioner, so far as it asks for a special act of naturalization, ought not to be granted.

The petitioner, however, wishes, in case Congress should think it inexpedient to pass an act for his naturalization, that a law may be enacted to authorize a patent to issue to him for the discoveries he has made in the manufacture of hemp and flax. On this point the committee should not hesitate to report favorably, if they were of opinion that there was no provision for the case by existing laws. The act of Congress of the 21st February, 1793, entitled "An act to promote the progress of useful arts, and to repeal the act heretofore made for that purpose," confines, it is true, the benefits of patents to citizens of the United States, and by this law the case of Mr. Owen is not provided for. But by the act of the 17th April, 1800, entitled "An act to extend the privilege of obtaining patents for useful discoveries and inventions to certain persons therein mentioned, and to enlarge and define the penalties for violating the rights of patentees," it is enacted, "that all and singular the rights and privileges given, intended, or provided to citizens of the United States, respecting patents for new inventions, discoveries, and improvements, by the act entitled "An act to promote the progress of useful arts," &c., shall be, and hereby are, extended and given to all aliens who, at the time of petitioning, in the manner prescribed by the said act, shall have resided for two years within the United States, which privileges shall be obtained and enjoyed by such persons in as full and ample manner, and under the same conditions, limitations, and restrictions, as by the said act are provided and directed in the case of citizens of the United States." Under the last mentioned act of Congress, the committee are of opinion that the case of Mr. Owen is provided for, and that he can obtain a patent. They think it altogether unnecessary to pass a special law for this case. They, therefore, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition.

MILITIA LAWS.

The engrossed bill to amend the act providing for calling forth the militia, &c., was read a third time and put on its passage.

Mr. TALLMADGE, of Connecticut, opposed the bill at considerable length, principally on account of the provisions respecting the construction and powers proposed to be given to courts martial, to proceed against accused persons in their absence, certain notice having been given them; to punish persons for contempt of the court by word and gesture; and to compel the attendance of witnesses. These provisions, Mr. T. considered as not according with the principles of the Constitution, and possibly as hazarding the existence of civil liberty.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, defended the bill, which he, as chairman of the militia committee, had introduced against Mr. TALLMADGE's objections. His object was to prevent the requisitions of militia by the President from being disregarded by the Governors of States, or rendered inefficient by the contumacy of subordinate officers or privates. For this purpose the provisions embraced in the bill were necessary, and were no more than had been adopted during the Administration of General WASHINGTON. Different opinions had been entertained as to the jurisdiction of courts martial, which ought to be conclusively settled—and such was the object of this bill. As to the objection to the powers proposed to be conferred on militia courts martial, their abuse need not be feared, as the courts would always be composed of militia officers.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, expressed himself decidedly in favor of such provisions of this bill as went to fortify the power of the Government over the militia, but opposed to the authorization of compulsory process on witnesses to attend courts martial, whose powers ought to be confined to the limits of the camp. To amend the bill in this respect, Mr. W. moved to recommit it to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PITKIN, of Connecticut, and Mr. WEBSTER, of New Hampshire, also opposed the bill on account of the extraordinary powers with which it proposed to clothe courts martial; and Mr. TAYLOR replied.

On the vote, there were for recommitment 50, against it 66.

Mr. TALLMADGE again objected to the provision which went to authorize the President (immediately) to cause courts martial to be instituted for the trial of persons, &c.

Mr. BRIGHAM, of Massachusetts, moved that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. GASTON, of North Carolina, avowing himself to be unprepared to vote decisively on the bill moved that it lie on the table.—This motion was negatived, yeas 52.

The question on indefinite postponement was then decided in the negative by yeas and nays—For indefinite postponement 46, against it 89.

Mr. GASTON then stated sundry objections to the bill, principally in matters of detail; to which Mr. TAYLOR replied.

The question on the passage of the bill was then decided in the affirmative—yeas 88, nays 53, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Bard, Barnett, Beall, Bowen, Bradley, Burwell, Butler, Caldwell, Calhoun, Chappell, Clark, Comstock, Condict, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Cuthbert, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Duvall, Eppes, Evans, Farrow, Findley, Forney, Franklin, Gholson, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Grundy, Hall, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hungerford, Ingersoll, Ingham, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kennedy, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of North Carolina, Lowndes, Lyle, McKim, McLean, Montgomery, Murfree, Nelson, Newton, Parker, Pickens, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Ridgely, Ringgold, Roane, Robertson, Sage, Sevier, Seybert, Sharp, Skinner, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Strong, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Udree, Whitehill, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wright, and Yancey.

NAYS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brigham, Champion, Cilley, Cooper, Cox, Culpeper, Davenport, Ely, Gaston, Geddes, Grosvenor, Hale, Howell, Hufty, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Macon, Markell, Moffitt, Moore, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, Post, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Ruggles, Sheffey, Sherwood, Smith of New Hampshire, Smith of New York, Sturges, Tallmadge, Thompson, Vose, Ward, of Massachusetts, Webster, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, and Wilson of Massachusetts.

WEDNESDAY, March 30.

The SPEAKER presented a petition of Thomas Claxton, the Doorkeeper to the House, praying to be allowed an additional assistant for the purpose of attending to the post office business of the House.—Referred to Mr. GRUNDY, Mr. PICKENS, and Mr. SHERWOOD.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, made a report on the resolution instructing an inquiry to be made into the expediency of establishing a hospital in the Choctaw nation of Indians; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That they be discharged from the further consideration of the above mentioned resolution.

Mr. INGHAM reported a bill from the Senate "for the relief of Joseph Brevard," without amendment; which was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill from the Senate "to revive and continue in force an act declaring the assent of Congress to certain acts of the States of Maryland and Georgia," was twice read and committed.

The engrossed bill authorizing the appointing of agents for paying military pensions, was read the third time and passed.

The engrossed bill "concerning the pay of the officers, seamen, and marines, of the Navy of the United States," was also read a third time and passed.

The bill granting to the President and Directors of the New Orleans Navigation Company and their successors a lot of ground, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and, after explanation of its object by Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

SEA FENCIBLES.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, offered the following resolution, after an explanatory remark on the propriety of connecting the corps of fencibles with the flotillas:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of placing the sea fencibles under the command of the commander of the flotillas with whom they are intended to co-operate; and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. WILSON, of Massachusetts, questioned the propriety of passing any law directing the application of a particular description of force, which, once raised, is exclusively under the control of the Executive, &c.

Mr. WRIGHT replied that he believed it to have been the intention of Congress in authorizing corps of sea fencibles to be raised, to connect them with the flotilla service, and of course to place them under the control of the Naval Department. By the construction which had been given to the law, however, they have been disconnected from that service, and placed under the direction of the Secretary of War.

In the absence of Mr. TROUP, of Georgia, (the Chairman of the Military Committee) the motion was, on the suggestion of Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, ordered to lie on the table.

INJURIES BY WAR.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to make compensation to individuals for private property captured or destroyed by the enemy while in the service of the United States.

APRIL, 1814.

Proceedings.

H. OF R.

The discussion of this bill occupied the remainder of this day's sitting, and turned principally on amendments to the bill. There were, however, some gentlemen opposed to the bill.

Mr. FISK, of New York, moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill indefinitely, and spoke in favor of the motion more than once, as also did Mr. KING, of Massachusetts. The principal objection was, the difficulty of properly restricting a bill, under whose provisions many improper and unjust claims would unquestionably be admitted. Mr. KING, however, added another objection, viz: that the passage of such a bill might be considered as sanctioning all the impressments of private property at the will or caprice of every subordinate and non-commissioned officer. The indefinite postponement was opposed in a warm and decided manner by Messrs. ARCHER, of Maryland, FARROW, of South Carolina, JOHNSON, of Kentucky, GROSVENOR, of New York, TELFAIR, of Georgia, and DUVALL, of Kentucky, on the ground of principle and expediency.

Mr. FISK afterwards withdrew his motion for indefinite postponement, and moved to recommit the bill to a Committee of the Whole—negatived.

Mr. F. then moved to strike out the third section of the bill (which proposed to allow compensation to the owners of houses occupied as public storehouses for any damage they might sustain while so occupied;) but withdrew the motion to allow Mr. YANCEY, of North Carolina, to move an amendment to the third section, restricting the compensation for damages to cases in which the houses should have been so occupied without the consent of their owners. This motion was opposed by Messrs. ARCHER and GROSVENOR, and supported by Messrs. YANCEY, and INGHAM, of Pennsylvania, but negatived by a considerable majority.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, then moved to amend the third section so as to include houses occupied as barracks for troops, as well as those occupied as storehouses. This motion was opposed by Mr. ARCHER, and supported by Mr. JACKSON.

Mr. FISK, of New York, then renewed his motion to strike out the third section; which, after debate, was negatived—yeas 34.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, then withdrew the motion he had made, because he had understood the War Department had uniformly decided in favor of the claims it embraced when well authenticated, and an inconsiderate decision against his amendment by this House might prevent them from so doing in future.

The bill was then further amended and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

THURSDAY, March 31.

Mr. NEWTON, of Virginia, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, made an unfavorable report on the petitions of sundry citizens of Virginia, Massachusetts, &c., praying the establishment of additional ports of entry; which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "for the relief of Daniel Macauley and Samuel Ralston," with an amendment. They have also passed the bill "to fix the compensation of the Clerks in the office of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives;" in which amendment and bill they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. KENT, of Maryland, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill for incorporating the Columbian Manufacturing Company in the town of Alexandria in this District; which was twice read and committed.

Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill laying duties on spirits distilled within the United States, which was twice read and committed.

The engrossed bill granting to the President and Directors of the New Orleans Manufacturing Company a certain lot of ground, was read the third time and passed.

The bill making compensation to individuals for private property captured or destroyed by the enemy while in the service of the United States, was read the third time.

Mr. FISK, of New York, moved that the bill be laid on the table, with a view that it might receive such amendments, as it appeared to him were essentially necessary.

A short debate ensued on this motion, which embraced nearly the same points as were brought into debate on the preceding days, and which have been already substantially reported. Messrs. DESHA and MILLER opposed the motion, and Messrs. FISK of New York and FISK of Vermont supported it, and it was finally carried—yeas 82.

A Message was received from the President of the United States recommending the expediency of authorizing exportations, specie excepted, from the United States, and a repeal of so much of our laws as prohibits the importation of articles not the property of enemies, &c.—Referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill concerning invalid pensioners. Various motions were made to amend the bill, by inserting amongst the pensioners the names of petitioners not reported in the bill by the Committee on Pensions; and also to amend the bill so as to alter the mode of authenticating a claim to a pension, which was carried. After considerable discussion on these propositions, the Committee rose and reported the bill and amendments. The amendments of the Committee of the Whole were concurred in, but before the House got through the consideration of the bill, a motion was made to adjourn and carried.

FRIDAY, April 1.

Immediately after the opening of this day's sitting—

Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, rose to announce the death of the Honorable JOHN DAWSON, a Representative from Virginia, who had filled various public stations, for many years of his life, in which he had been honored with the confidence of the people.

On motion of Mr. MACON, of North Carolina, the House resolved to attend his funeral at three o'clock to-day; and also to wear crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Messrs. EPPES, of Virginia, GHOLSON, GOODWYN, JACKSON, of Virginia, BRECKENRIDGE, and LEWIS, were appointed a committee to superintend the funeral.

SATURDAY, April 2.

The bill from the Senate, "to fix the compensations of the Clerks employed in the offices of the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives," was twice read and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The amendment of the Senate to the bill "for the relief of Daniel Macauley and Samuel Ralston," was read, and concurred in by the House.

On motion of Mr. TROUP, the Committee of the whole House were discharged from the consideration of the bill to amend "An act to authorize a corps of sea fencibles," and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

The bills authorizing a subscription to an edition to the laws of the United States, and providing for the distribution of the same; and for the relief of George Shannon, respectively passed through Committees of the Whole, and were ordered to a third reading.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be requested to inquire into the expediency of a provision by law for opening or improving such military routes by land and inland navigation as the President of the United States may find necessary to the operations of the war the present year.

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of a provision by law for the progressive improvement of the routes of communication by land and inland navigation throughout the United States and the Territories thereof, upon the principles and general plan contained in a report by Albert Gallatin, late Secretary of the Treasury, made in the year 1808, in pursuance of a resolution of the Senate, passed in 1807; to be carried into effect as soon as may be practicable and expedient after the termination of the war in which the United States are now engaged.

Mr. WILSON spoke in support of his resolutions as follows: On the first resolution, I am aware of an objection which, in the outset, may present itself, namely: that its object being professedly of a military character, if important to our military operations, it is to be presumed the military department would have been aware of it, and embraced it in its communications to Congress. On a little reflection, however, this objection disappears. The magnitude, variety, and multiplicity of subjects, necessarily engaging the Secretary of War, must render it impossible for him to embrace at once every possible object connected with the whole economy of the military arrangements and expenditure; and this being an object somewhat abstracted from the ordinary round of immediate duties, which devolve exclusively on the department, may be very reasonably supposed to have received but a minor share of attention, and especially so when it is considered that the present Secretary has been but a short time at the head of the department, that the vast augmentation of the military department, the change from a state of peace and a peace establishment, to a state of war and war measures, are necessarily attended with the daily occurrence of new and difficult cases, and generally with an accumulation of business which renders his deliberate attention to any abstract subject, not forming a part of the immediate and exclusive duties of the department, extremely difficult and impracticable. The object contemplated in this resolution is rather connected with the economy of expenditure generally in the operations of the war, than with the exclusive duties of the War Department. That department is not necessarily more responsible for this than any other department, whilst there seems to be a propriety in its reference to the Military Committee in preference to any other, as being more conversant with the channels of information to be derived from the military department, and in the daily practice of receiving it, which must be supposed to afford a facility in their inquiries which another committee might not so conveniently possess. But the subject in itself is one, as I conceive, requiring legislation in its origin. This objection then, I trust, will not be entertained, but that this House will consider the subject as requiring their consideration and attention.

I shall therefore endeavor very briefly to give such a view as in my opinion strongly recommends the proposed inquiry and the measure contemplated in the resolution. I shall attempt to show from facts and circumstances now of notoriety, as well as from well-known principles, that an improvement of the military routes, especially in the United States, is necessary at once to the efficiency of the military operations and to the fiscal concerns of the Government; that those contemplated in the resolution are practicable at a trifling expense and a short space of time.

When we consider the extent of our territory compared with our population, and that our movements are necessarily by land opposed to an enemy at sea, it becomes obvious, it becomes self-evident, that every practicable degree of facility in our movements is necessary in order to produce an effect duly correspondent with our physical force; this all will admit. Our experience in the present war has amply illustrated this principle. Our movements have been generally but partially successful, everywhere uncertain, everywhere tedious, and enormously expensive. The campaign under General Hull, and that under Generals Harrison and Smyth, and the more brilliant campaign in the South, sufficiently demonstrate that the difficulty or impracticability of the military routes was one of the most effectual causes of the protracted continuance, and the indecisive effects, and the destructive expenses of each of these campaigns. To these cases the inquiries of the committee would doubtless be directed for any details of facts which they may deem requisite to establish this position, but I can hardly suppose much inquiry in detail necessary to the end. I am inclined to believe that every gentleman is sufficiently convinced of the truth; if so, it would be necessary only to inquire whether the evil can be remedied by such improvement on the military routes as may be conveniently effected in a short space of time.

After a brief general view, I propose to give one instance to serve as an epitome of what in my opinion may be done.

The main connecting military routes are few and well known. They may be considered seven; four of which, however, require no improvement, or none within the view of this resolution. These four are, that on the Lakes and St. Lawrence, that from the head of the Ohio to the mouth of the Mississippi by water, one from the same point near the Seat of Government to the head of the Ohio at Pittsburg, and that between and through the State of Tennessee and the Mississippi Territory. Of these four, the last only requires improvement, but this does not enter into the view of the resolution, because whatever improvements may be required on the route or routes in the country of our Indian enemy must be effected chiefly, if not wholly, by the troops. The three remaining routes are highly important, and evidently do require improvement. To perceive this necessity requires no military knowledge, no documentary evidence. I shall notice, first, that along the Atlantic coast, some points on which it is well known are frequently very difficult and sometimes impracticable. I need not go further for an instance of this than the road between this city and Baltimore. At all times this road is bad, and frequently not practicable for empty stages, much less for loaded wagons. Now, it would doubtless be better to pave this road the whole distance than to have that communication difficult or impracticable in case of a descent by the enemy upon our coast in the vicinity of either, or alternately at both its extremes. But a pavement is far from being necessary. If some points on this road were well selected, in all not more than three or four miles of the worst parts, and paved, and the rest ploughed and well thrown up, it would be generally an excellent road, and never impracticable. I might instance some other points on this route, however, probably still more important, but have adverted to this merely because it must be well known perhaps to every gentleman in this House. If there are other points more important, or where the present route is still worse than this, then such point ought to be first selected for improvement; and if all cannot be improved, do not let that prevent the improvement of any; if one only could be improved, it would be so far an advantage: and if even one or two of these points of the route could not be rendered permanently good, do not let that consideration prevent their being much better than they now are.

The second of these then, is that between the North river and Lake Champlain, a route, unquestionably of incalculable importance; one upon which every possible facility of transportation for troops and stores is indispensable to the due effect of such of our armaments as may be destined to act upon the two correspondent points, New York and Montreal—on the two great maritime exposures of the United States—the only practicable route for military purposes, at present, between those two frontiers. I am well informed that a part of the land route, and a small part only, between the North river and Lake Champlain, is in an extremely bad state; if so, and an improvement for a moderate expense is practicable, it certainly ought to be made. I believe such an improvement would be found, on inquiry, at once necessary and practicable.

The third, and last I shall notice, is one of which I am enabled to speak with some confidence and precision, from long observation, experience, and inquiry. This is a route between the Ohio and Lake Erie. There are several routes between these waters, capable of improvement, so as to afford a commodious water communication, with the exception of a short portage on each. One, however, ought to be selected for the present occasion, and, in making the selection, the best rule for determining the preference is, to select the one which, on examination, shall be found to unite the greatest number of advantages, but, especially, the one capable of being improved so as to afford an uninterrupted navigation at the least expense, and in the shortest time. Such is the route by the Alleghany river and French creek; besides this, it connects the most important point, perhaps, at this time, on the Ohio, Pittsburg, with the most commodious harbor on the Lakes, &c. The importance of improving some route between these waters is recommended by most obvious considerations. It is absolutely necessary to the practicable co-operation of one important, extensive, and populous section of the United States in the war. The States of Kentucky, Ohio, the western parts of Virginia, and Pennsylvania, without some such improvement, are, in effect, cut off, with all their valuable and inexhaustible resources, from all efficient co-operation in the present war, unless it should again be carried to their vicinities, as heretofore. The transportation on this water route, in its present state, for a month or six weeks in the Spring, can be done for one dollar and a half per cwt. In June, French creek becomes low, which not only obstructs its own navigation, but that of the Alleghany river, also, and the land transportation can seldom be done for less than five, and sometimes is as high as seven dollars per cwt. on any route; such transportation is, moreover, always uncertain, the routes being all influenced by every material change of weather, and in wet weather impracticable. Not only, therefore, the fourfold rate of transportation is to be considered, but the total want of certainty in every movement.

This creek, sir, can be improved so as to afford a navigation uninterrupted at all seasons, the Winter excepted, for the sum of ten, at the utmost, twelve thousand dollars, and may be accomplished in three or four weeks time. I speak, sir, from experience, observation, and information from practical men; not, perhaps the most learned engineers, but tradesmen, perhaps still more competent judges on this subject; men who have been long practised in building, and who have been owners of mills and milldams. I am informed from those sources, sir, as well as by my own observation, that a dam well made of wood will stand for eight or ten years, or longer. The construction of this material is cheap, and can be effected in a shorter time, in proportion to the amount of expense, than of stone, for an obvious reason—nearly every man in the country is a workman at wood work of this description; every man can chop, haul timber, and bore; most, or a sufficient proportion, can hew and frame. The material is abundant, and almost on the spot. The plank for the dams, only, requires transportation, and that quite convenient. Saw-mills abound. About forty thousand, or forty-five thousand feet of one and a half inch plank is sufficient for six dams, one hundred yards long, and five feet high, with a lock to each; and six dams would be sufficient. This quantity of plank, if ordered in this month, would be all delivered at any port on French creek, by the middle of next month. If workmen were seasonably employed in this month, by the middle of next, all the timber might be got out, and to the spot, framed, and ready to erect into the dams, as soon as the water shall have fallen low enough.

Sir, I am as confident of the practicability of this improvement as I am of anything which is not actually done, or which I could not, perhaps, perform with my own hands. I am as well convinced of it as I am that a mill can be built, that a field can be cleared from the forest, that a well can be dug; and of the effect I am as well satisfied as I am that a mill will produce flour from wheat, that a field may produce a crop, or a well water. The completion of this relatively small and practicable work, would remove every obstruction which now impedes the communication between the Ohio and the Lakes, and, consequently that between one great section of the United States and the seat of war in the North.

The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. TROUP) having made some observations, merely to correct his misapprehensions of the subject, which requires little more than a repetition of the foregoing observations—I had never for a moment entertained an idea that the committee had omitted to report through disrespect for the mover of the resolution; for, if there was disrespect, it was a disrespect for the House, and not me; the resolution not being mine, but of the House, after it was once adopted. Neither had I ever entertained for one moment such an idea as this. The only way in which I accounted for the omission to report upon the former resolution was, that he subject could not have been understood in its real character and tendency, nor did I ever entertain the slightest reflection on the chairman, or any other gentleman of the committee, on this score. But, I confess, I have seen no good cause for the gentleman's opposition at this time, having previously presented the resolutions for his inspection, and adopted an amendment, which he said would remove all the objections he saw to the resolution proposed to be referred to the Military Committee, and in that form altered on his suggestion. They were now presented, and his approbation expected, because he had assured me that he saw no objection. Even this, however, I claim no right to insist upon; but I must, nevertheless, entertain a different opinion from that which the gentleman has just expressed with respect to the second resolution. I have but a few observations to offer at this time. One objection in offering it in company with the first is, legibly to draw the distinction between them, which is this: that as the expediency and practicability of the latter are altogether predicated on a state of peace, and, therefore, the work ought to be laid aside until after the war; so the necessity for the former, being predicated on an actual state of war, and of war with Great Britain, the work contemplated ought to be entered upon with promptitude, as an efficient and indispensable war measure. As to the merits of the object contemplated in the second resolution, after the mass of luminous information already published on the subject; after the repeated examination it has received in Congress and in different States; after the concurrent official reports which have been made, and especially the one by the late Secretary of the Treasury, in 1808; after having exerted his unrivalled talents, for near a year, in collecting, condensing, and arranging the materials, any observation of mine would seem arrogant as well as superfluous. I will, therefore, call to the recollection of this House a few of the principles of that report which experience has illustrated and established, especially since the commencement of the present war. These principles, adverted to at this time, in connexion with the confirmation they derive from facts and experience, demonstrate beyond all controversy that this great, this sublime, and well digested project of improvement, had it been actually commenced seven years ago, would have been one of the most effectual and salutary preparations for a state of war which can be made in the times of peace. And as a time of peace is best of all seasons adapted for most of the preparations for war—as the Summer is the season to provide for the Winter—so, on the other hand, there may be some preparations for a state of peace practicable in time of war. Amongst these, it appears to me a provision by law embracing the object of this second resolution is undoubtedly one as well for the purpose of laying the work aside for the present, as to insure its accomplishment by means the most suitable and salutary when it shall be commenced. A better direction can scarcely be given to the surplus labor, which for a time must be set afloat in a change from war to peace; for, as a state of war in this country must enhance the price of labor, by an unusual and undue increase of the demand for men, so on the return of peace, it must, in a correspondent degree, be depressed by a correspondent diminution of demand. I shall add no further observation or remark on this resolution at present; only this, that I have no desire to be further conspicuous on the occasion, whilst I shall never evade nor shrink from the discharge of any duty. I take this opportunity to declare that I shall cheerfully give way to any gentleman who may have it in view to offer either the same resolution or one having the same object in view as my own.

Mr. TROUP said, the subject had been referred to the Military Committee at the commencement of the session, but they had not reported on it; not from a want of respect for the subject, but from the multiplicity of business referred to the committee. They had likewise consulted the Secretary of War, as to the improvement of certain routes just mentioned by Mr. WILLON, but he did not believe such an undertaking was now absolutely necessary, and it was thought the money might be more eligibly employed. &c.

The question was then taken, at the instance of the mover, on the first resolution, and lost.

The second resolution was, on motion of Mr. ARCHER, laid on the table.

Mr. WEBSTER, of New Hampshire, moved that the House now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Secretary of State, made at the last session, on the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees.

The question on Mr. W.'s motion was decided in the negative—yeas 37, nays 75, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Boyd, Breckenridge, Brigham, Champion, Cilley, Cooper, Cox, Culpeper, Davenport, Earle, Ely, Geddes, Grosvenor, Hale, Hanson, Hungerford, Lewis, Lovett, Markell, Miller, Moseley, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, William Reed, Rhea of Tennessee, Ruggles, Shipherd, Smith of New York, Stuart, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Webster, Wheaton, White, and Wilcox.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Archer, Bard, Barnett, Beall, Bowen, Bradley, Brown, Butler, Caldwell, Clark, Comstock, Condict, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Cuthbert, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Duvall, Evans, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of New York, Forney, Forsyth, Gholson, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hawkins, Ingham, Irving, Johnson of Virginia, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of Massachusetts, King of North Carolina, Lowndes, Lyle, Macon, McKim, Nelson, Newton, Ormsby, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Potter, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rich, Robertson, Sevier, Seybert, Skinner, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Troup, Udree, Ward of New Jersey, Whitehill, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wright, and Yancey.

So the House refused to take the subject now into consideration.

NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. GRUNDY, of Tennessee, submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a National Bank; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. NEWTON, of Virginia, moved that the resolution be postponed indefinitely. He said that, by this motion, he meant not the slightest disrespect to the mover of the resolution; but feeling, as he did, a firm conviction that the Constitution had not given to Congress the power to establish such an institution, the correctness of which opinion had been tried and settled by a former Congress, he could not consent to the adoption of the present resolution. Besides, said Mr. N., the session is now drawing to a close, the day of adjournment has been fixed by a vote of this House and the mind of every member is anxiously directed to the moment which is to restore him to his family and home. The time is now too short for the consideration of so important a subject; and for this, as well as the intrinsic objections he had to the object of the resolution, he hoped his motion to postpone it indefinitely would prevail.

Mr. GRUNDY said, he trusted the motion to postpone would not succeed. He believed there was time enough left for the consideration of the subject, and if the House would bring itself to discuss it, all Constitutional difficulties, he was persuaded, would be removed. The gentleman from Virginia, by his motion to postpone, would bring the subject at once before the House; but it would be much better to refer the inquiry to a committee, let them investigate the question thoroughly, and report the result to the House, and they would then be enabled to act understandingly. Besides, said Mr. G., the gentleman has opposed the resolution without knowing what kind of a bank is contemplated, or upon what principles, or in what manner it is to be established. Let the matter be referred to a committee; it will then come regularly before the House, and every member will know how to act.

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, said, he had always believed it improper for the General Government to legislate in erecting banks, except so far as to accomplish national objects, facilitating the collection of the revenue, &c. As to these objects, however, it was the Constitutional duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to devise the ways and means, and if such an institution were necessary for the purposes of Government, it was the duty of that officer to recommend it. He wished the Secretary to say whether such a bank was necessary, and not that the subject should be referred to a committee of this House, and they to inquire privately of the Secretary as to the expediency of the measure. When the proposition came in at the proper Constitutional door, and appeared to be necessary for the financial purposes of the Government, he should not object to it. If such a necessity exists, he wished the Government to come forward and declare it, and not shrink from the responsibility of recommending the measure.

Mr. FINDLEY, of Pennsylvania, made a few remarks, not distinctly heard. He was understood to say, the erection of a bank was not so desirable on account of the Government as for the general convenience of the country.

Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, made a number of forcible remarks against the indefinite postponement. He said he did not believe it was so exclusively the duty of the Executive Department to recommend the establishment of a National Bank, even if required by the finances of the Government, as his colleague (Mr. GROSVENOR) seemed to think. He had no doubt that a National Bank was indispensable in the proper management of the fiscal affairs of Government; but, independent of this consideration, he believed it was necessary to the general convenience of the community; and should a plan for such an institution be brought forward in a shape that he approved, he should certainly give it his support. Supposing, however, that it was the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to recommend a National Bank, and that he should be unwilling to assume the responsibility; such conduct would doubtless be reprehensible, but would that be a good reason why Congress should decline to establish an institution that would alike benefit the Government and promote the general good? Mr. O. said, that although the proposition did not "come in at the proper door," still it was no reason the House should refuse to act on it. Whether this be a proper mode of establishing a National Bank, is properly to be decided when the question comes before us in a regular form. The question now turns only on our belief as to the expediency of such a bank, and, if expedient, of the fitness of the time, &c., of incorporating such an institution. He was, therefore, clearly of opinion, on general principles, that the motion for an indefinite postponement ought not to prevail. The question of a National Bank, he added, must be connected, from the very nature of the institution, with the finances of the Government. But, though he should be as loth as any one to volunteer his aid to the Administration in support of the war, yet he was not to be deterred by the fear of incidentally doing so, from doing what he believed to be of itself right and proper. It is our duty, said he, to legislate for a settled state of things. A National Bank is necessary, in my judgment, to the permanent interest of the country, and therefore I am, and shall be, in favor of it, if the details of the bill establishing it shall be such as to meet my approbation.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, said, he had heretofore voted a National Bank unconstitutional; he was then satisfied it was so, and he believed that to be the opinion of a great portion, if not a majority of the people. If so, why take up the time of the House, and consume two or three weeks in discussing a question which may be determined at this moment? He could not consent to spend the precious time of the House to no purpose, and being satisfied that no National Bank could be passed through this House, he should vote for the indefinite postponement of the motion.

Mr. WEBSTER, of New Hampshire, said, this was a subject of great importance, and required mature consideration. The hour of adjournment having arrived, he moved that the House do now adjourn.—Negatived, 69 to 67.

Mr. NEWTON repeated, he had moved the indefinite postponement, assuredly not from any disrespect to the mover of the resolution, but on this ground: The time rapidly approached at which this House had resolved to adjourn; but nine days remained of the session, if the determination of this House in that respect received the sanction of the Senate, and, after so long a sitting, every member must turn his eyes with pleasure to that moment. The subject of a National Bank was one which had been discussed in the House before, and in private circles, over and often; and he had not the least doubt but every gentleman who heard him had made up his mind on the subject, and that a year's discussion would not change it. He therefore thought it would be best in the first instance to ascertain whether a majority was or was not prepared to vote for such a measure.

Mr. GRUNDY then said, that he certainly should never have brought forward this proposition without having reflected much on it. He knew that it had been agitated in this House, and in the nation heretofore, and had been much opposed by many of those politicians with whom he usually acted in this House; but he did not believe that each Congress was so bound by the decisions of that which preceded it, that it was a good argument against a measure for members of a former Congress to come in and say, "we have decided it heretofore." As a Representative, Mr. G. said, he claimed the right to give at least one vote on this subject as well as the gentleman from Virginia. The spirit of our Constitution had wisely ordained the frequency of elections, for the very purpose of undoing what had been wrongly done by their predecessors, and of doing that which had been left undone. If the gentleman from Virginia would reflect on this subject as much as others who had been instrumental in bringing forward the proposition, he was sure he would not be so confident that he acted correctly in refusing a deliberate consideration to it. I, said Mr. G., have no secret on this subject; I wish to see a bank established as a national object, let who will be in power; as a general measure, I wish to see it adopted. Look at the situation of our country—and I say the gentleman should forget his home, and not leave his country in peril. You have authorized a loan for twenty-five millions, and have provided for the expenditure of so much money. Where is the money? Some well informed men say there will be no difficulty in obtaining it; others, as well informed, say that the attempt to obtain it may not be successful. I hope that gentlemen of the former description are correct. I know not what the prospect is; but one thing I do know—I would run no hazard on this point; and for one, though I have as much anxiety to be at home as any one, I am willing to sit a few days longer to see how it will be. The gentleman from Virginia, no doubt, felt the same anxiety for the public service; and

Mr. G. said, if his Constitutional scruples were so great that he could not vote for this measure, in case the money should not be conveniently obtained it might be necessary to resort to some other. For general considerations, Mr. G. said, he had always been in favor of a measure of this sort, and entertained no Constitutional scruples about it. In point of time he thought the present situation of the country afforded a cogent argument in favor of the measure.

Mr. GASTON, of North Carolina, expressed his entire disapprobation of the indirect introduction of Executive recommendations into the House, as producing legislation without intelligence, and action without responsibility, &c. If, therefore, the vote on this question were to test his approbation of this indirect mode of attaining a measure supposed to be in favor of the Executive, he should certainly be inclined to vote against it. But, when a proposition was made by any member of this House, which recommended itself to his best judgment, on which he felt no Constitutional scruples, and which he believed to be at all times expedient, he could not give a direct vote against it, merely because the Executive, if wishing its adoption, had not recommended it as openly as could have been wished. That it is expedient to establish a National Bank, he had no doubt, and he congratulated the House that at the moment when gentlemen on his side of the House found some of their wishes about to be gratified by the abolition of the restrictive system, the Constitutional scruples which had cramped the operations of the Government, were vanishing also; that at the moment when they were about to liberate commerce, the fetters would also be loosed with which a narrow Constitutional exposition had heretofore bound the Government. He should have been much more pleased, he said, if the measure had been directly recommended by the Executive, by an intimation that its adoption would conduce to a successful management of our finances; but merely for the reason that it had not come before the House in that manner he could not vote against a proposition which on general grounds met his approbation.

Mr. NEWTON spoke in explanation. He was as ready as the gentleman from Tennessee to yield not only his time but his personal service to his country; and, had he but a dollar in the world, would freely lend it to contribute to the support of the Government in a righteous war. But this question could be decided as intelligently in a day as in a month; and, if a majority was opposed to it, it was not advisable to consume time unnecessarily upon it. Under this impression he had made the motion for indefinite postponement, to ascertain the sense of the House on this point.

A motion was now made to adjourn, and carried by three or four votes.

MONDAY, April 4.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "making Elizabeth City the port of entry for the district of Camden, in the State of North Carolina;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

On motion of Mr. TROUP, the bill making provision for the pay of two companies of rangers, organized for the defence of the frontier of the United States, was postponed indefinitely.

The House resumed the consideration of the engrossed bill "authorizing the payment for property captured or destroyed, while in the public service, by the enemy of the United States."

And the question recurred, Shall the bill pass? And, on motion of Mr. TAYLOR, the further consideration of the said bill was postponed until tomorrow.

The bill from the Senate, "making Elizabeth City the port of entry and delivery for the district of Camden, in North Carolina," was read twice and ordered to be read a third time. The bill was accordingly read the third time and passed.

The engrossed bill authorizing a subscription to an edition of the laws of the United States, and providing for their distribution; and the engrossed bill for the relief of George Shannon, were read a third time and passed.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill concerning invalid pensioners, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

REPEAL OF THE EMBARGO.

The unfinished business being postponed with that view—

Mr. CALHOUN, from the Committee of Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the Message of the President of Thursday last, made the following report:

The Committee of Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the Message of the President, of the 31st of March, submit to the House the following report:

Taking into consideration the great importance of the measures recommended, the committee think it a duty, which they owe to the House and the nation, to state the grounds on which their report is founded. Uniting with the Executive in the policy of these measures, they wish to explain the reasons which have produced that union.

Of the past, it is unnecessary to take a review; the attention of the committee is drawn with more solicitude to the future.

Previous to the late changes in Europe, the bearing of our restrictive measures was for the most part confined to our enemies; the obstruction of our commercial intercourse with the friendly Powers of the world being in a manner insuperable. At present, a prospect exists of an extended commercial intercourse with them, highly important to both parties, and which, it may be presumed, they will find an equal interest and disposition to promote. Denmark, all Germany, and Holland, heretofore under the double restraint of internal regulation and external blockades and depredations from a commerce with the United States, appear by late events to be liberated therefrom.

Like changes, equally favorable to the commerce of this country, appear to be taking place in Italy, and the more extreme parts of the Mediterranean. With respect to Spain and Portugal, in the commerce with whom the United States have great interest, it may be expected that commerce may be carried on without the aid heretofore afforded to the enemy. Should peace take place between France and her enemies, including Great Britain, the commerce of the United States with France will fall under the same remarks.

The considerations of an internal nature which urge a repeal of these acts, at this time, are not less forcible than those which have been already stated. Among those are the following: The committee are persuaded that it will considerably augment the public revenue, and thereby maintain the public credit; that it will enhance the price and promote the circulation of our produce, in lieu of specie, which has of late become so much the object of speculation, tending to embarrass the Government.

Mr. C. then, on leave being given, reported the following bill:

A Bill to repeal an act entitled "An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States," and so much of any act or acts as prohibit the importation of goods, wares, and merchandise, of the growth, produce or manufacture, of Great Britain or Ireland, or of any of the colonies or dependencies thereof, or of any place or country in the actual possession of Great Britain, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act, entitled "An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States," passed on the 17th day of December, 1813, be and the same is hereby repealed; Provided, That all penalties and forfeitures which have been incurred under the said act shall be recovered and distributed, and may be mitigated or remitted, in like manner as if the said act had continued in full force and virtue.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of any act or acts as prohibits the importation of goods, wares, or merchandise, of the growth, produce, or manufacture, of Great Britain or Ireland, or of any of the colonies or dependencies thereof, or of any place or country in the actual possession of Great Britain, be and the same is hereby repealed: Provided, That all fines, penalties, and forfeitures, incurred in virtue of the said act or acts, shall be recovered and distributed, and may be mitigated or remitted, in like manner as if the same had continued in full force and virtue. And provided also, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize or permit the importation of goods, wares, or merchandise, or of any article the property of, or belonging at the time of such importation to, the enemy or enemies of the United States.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That no foreign ship or vessel shall receive a clearance, or be permitted to depart from the United States, whose officers and crew shall not consist wholly of the citizens or subjects of the country to which such ship or vessel shall belong, or of a country in amity with the United States; and no citizen of the United States shall be permitted to depart in such ship or vessel, without a passport or permission therefor, furnished under the authority and direction of the President of the United States.

The bill having been twice read, Mr. CALHOUN made the usual motion to refer it to a Committee of the whole House.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, objected to this reference, because of the nature of the bill, coupling together two subjects which ought to be kept entirely distinct, and on which there might be much difference of opinion. He therefore moved that the bill be recommitted to the committee who reported it, with instructions to report separate bills.

This motion was overruled by the SPEAKER, the motion made by Mr. CALHOUN having preference, according to the rules of the House.

The question on referring the bill to the Committee of the Whole was decided in the affirmative by a large majority.

Mr. CALHOUN, then, from the same committee, reported a bill to prohibit the exportation of gold or silver coins or bullion; which was twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. C. then observed, that the Message embraced another subject, which did not appear to the Committee of Foreign Relations to appertain to their province—he meant the continuance of the double duties. He therefor moved that the Committee on Foreign Relations be discharged from so much of the Message, and that it be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. INGHAM, of Pennsylvania, having required a division of the question, the question on discharging the Committee of Foreign Relations from the consideration of that part of the Message was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. WEBSTER, of New Hampshire, moved a reference of the subject to the Committee of the Whole, to whom the two bills just reported had been referred.

This motion, after some observations from Mr. INGHAM, was negatived.

Mr. INGHAM then moved a reference of this part of the Message to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instructions to report to Congress, at their next session, a general tariff of duties on imported goods, wares, and merchandise, conformably to existing circumstances, and the different local interests of various parts of the nation.

To this motion—it being objected by Mr. MACON and Mr. PITKIN that it would be improper and unusual to refer to the President's Secretary a part of his own Message; and Mr. INGHAM, yielding to the suggestion, withdrew his motion. Before he withdrew it—

Mr. McKIM, of Maryland, suggested the expediency of not acting on this subject during the present session. The Message suggested the propriety of extending double duties beyond the termination of the war. If a peace were to take place to-morrow, there would be time enough to act on this subject before they would end.

This part of the Message lies on the table, but with the avowed intention of Mr. INGHAM, at the suggestion of Mr. LOWNDES, to move an instruction to the Secretary of the Treasury to report to this House a tariff of duties, independently of the Message.

Mr. WEBSTER, of New Hampshire, said, as the House was now about to act on the President's Message, it was important that they should have before them all the measures relating to the subject. He, therefore, moved that the Committee of Foreign Relations be discharged from the further consideration of the bill which came down from the Senate some time ago for prohibiting the importation of certain descriptions of woollen goods, and spirits distilled from the cane, and that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole, to whom the two bills just reported had been referred.

Mr. GHOLSON, of Virginia, suggested that such a motion was wholly unnecessary, as that bill had no relation to the bills just referred, and its consideration was not at all necessary with a view to a due consideration of them.

Mr. WEBSTER adhered to his opinion of the propriety of giving that bill the course he had proposed.

Mr. CALHOUN remarked that that act had been predicated on the continuance of the non-importation system, which, if not repealed, ought certainly to be rigorously enforced. It was not necessary that the bill should be before the House. If the House should determine against the proposed repeal, it would then be a proper subject of consideration; and he pledged himself for the Committee, that the Committee would in such event act promptly in regard to it, and press its adoption.

Mr. WEBSTER's motion was negatived—ayes 49.

TREASURY NOTES.

Mr. DESHA, of Kentucky, rose to offer a resolution. The gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. GRUNDY,) in offering his motion on Saturday on the subject of a National Bank, had drawn a gloomy picture of the financial affairs of the nation, and asked whether Congress would adjourn and leave them in this situation. His motion looked to such a state of things, and proposed to enable the Government in such an emergency to supply the deficiency. The resolution he then offered was in the following words:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the President of the United States to cause to be issued, if he deems it necessary, any amount of Treasury notes, not exceeding fifteen millions of dollars, in sums not less than ten nor more than one thousand dollars, bearing an interest of six per centum per annum, payable quarter yearly, except the first year, and that at the end of the year, redeemable in five years; and also into the expediency of laying duties on watches, gold seals, plate, boots, and fine hats, to discharge the interest on said notes.

Mr. GRUNDY, of Tennessee, said he hoped the resolution would be adopted, and the subject placed in a proper train of examination. He was glad to perceive that gentlemen were at last impressed with the necessity of providing for possible cases. The adoption of the resolution would answer at least one good purpose. If the plan it embraced should be discussed and found inefficient, the proposition which he (Mr. G.) had made would meet with a more favorable reception than heretofore. All that he asked was, that the same liberality should be extended to his proposition as he was willing to extend to that of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. McKIM said, he should be sorry to deny to the gentleman the courtesy of having his resolution referred, were it not for one consideration. If the gentleman would add to his motion a proposition for such further tax as should be necessary to redeem the notes when they became due, he should concur in his motion. But he asked of the House to take a deliberate view of this subject before they referred the resolution. In his little experience in the world he had found it necessary, when his business was small, to be cautious in signing notes; and so ought the Government to be exceedingly cautious. If there was any one point on which the Government should be cautious, it should be its credit; and a regard for the credit of the Government would not justify the issuing of these notes without providing for their redemption.

Mr. WRIGHT said he most cordially concurred with the gentleman from Kentucky, whose soul he knew to be devoted to the best interests of his country, as he had proved by his zealous, voluntary, personal co-operation in the war during the last campaign; but he wished to add to his list of taxable articles several others which he named, viz: lottery prizes, a tax everybody would be glad to pay; saddle and carriage horses, certainly articles of luxury; houses and lots in the District of Columbia, which are now exempt from the direct tax; and a continuance of the direct tax on land.

Mr. BARNETT, of Georgia, was of opinion that many articles would bear taxation equally as well as those which had been proposed; but it would be in the power of the Committee of Ways and Means, or of the House, to add any that might be thought proper. He was in favor of this proposition. He wished to see every possible means taken to enable the Government to carry on the war in which we are engaged. He was well convinced we had resources enough to carry on the war, and that the people would pay anything, and bear taxes of any description to support the war. The people possessed patriotism and love of country enough to induce them to support the rights of the country.

Mr. STUART, of Maryland, moved to amend Mr. WRIGHT's proposed amendment by including in it "also race horses, mares, and fillies."

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, said he regretted to see the course this business was now taking. The Committee of Ways and Means had not been inattentive to the subject embraced in this motion. If they had not met the wishes of the House, it would be better to send to them a resolution of instruction in a general form, without designating the articles proposed to be taxed to raise a revenue to defray the interest of these Treasury notes. On that head, if the resolution were so passed, he knew it would be grateful to the feelings of the committee to receive any representations of individual members on the subject of the articles which it would be proper to tax.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, said he hoped it would not be considered as arrogant in men devoted to the best interests of the country, after waiting until the last moment of the session without hearing from the Committee of Ways and Means on the subject, to call their attention to a project for supplying the Treasury with the necessary funds. The only obstacle to obtaining loans was the omission to provide the ways and means to pay the interest; and this was an object worthy the attention of the House.

Mr. WRIGHT's and Mr. STUART's motions were both disagreed to.

The question being stated on Mr. DESHA's motion—

Mr. EPPEs, of Virginia, said that the Committee of Ways and Means would be happy at any time to receive any instructions from the House; but it was due to that committee to state that the system to be pursued during the war had been decided on by Congress, before the appointment of the present Committee of Ways and Means. It had been decided that taxes should be laid sufficient to raise a revenue to pay the interest on the old debt and on the new debt to be created by loans during the war. It was true that, in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury at the commencement of the session, it had been stated that the revenue of the present year would fall short of the necessary amount $750,000. It had been shortly afterwards stated to the committee, however, that the proceeds of the internal revenue would so far exceed the estimated amount during the present year as to cover the supposed deficit: which intimation had been since formally confirmed by a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, which had been recently presented to the House. The committee, therefore, had only to consider, whether it would be better to take up the general subject of providing the next year's revenue at this time, or to leave it until the next session. The committee, after considering the unsettled state of our foreign relations, the uncertainty of the continuance of the war, &c., had found it altogether impossible to decide what amount of taxes would be necessary for the ensuing year. It was impossible for the committee to decide whether or not the restrictive system would be in force during the next year; and of course they could present nothing more than a mere guess of the amount of revenue which it might be actually necessary to raise during the ensuing year. It had been, therefore, thought better to let the subject rest until they could act understandingly, and the means could be proportioned to the end. On this view of the subject they had postponed taking it up until the next session of Congress. Other considerations had an important bearing on this determination. All the internal taxes being now in operation, it would be improper to make a change in them, because any change would affect the whole system, and instead of increasing the revenue would diminish it. As to the direct tax, in several of the States it was fully paid in, while in others it was now collecting, and of course could not be revised or modified; and it would be much better for Congress to take up the whole subject on their meeting in the Fall. So much for the payment of the interest on the loans. But, on the subject of Treasury notes, a sufficient sum was already authorized for the service of the present year. For one he had no wish to see paper money introduced as a general system; and whenever it came to that question, that we cannot provide for our pecuniary wants without establishing a paper money, he was for reducing those wants. He did not believe Treasury notes could be circulated to an amount greater than our annual revenue, which he estimated at something more than eight millions of dollars. The amount of Treasury notes beyond our revenue must be in the nature of paper money, representing nothing, and possessing only a nominal value. He merely made these observations to justify the course of the Committee of Ways and Means, and to show that they had not been inattentive to their duty.

Mr. BARNETT said if the motion now before the House had answered no other purpose, it had brought out information of which he before knew nothing. He was one of those who was for prosecuting the war at any cost; and he would rather see further taxes resorted to than some other plans which had been suggested for raising a revenue. He believed that there were some schemes before the House, which had their origin in an impression that the loan would not be obtained without their adoption. A proposition to establish a National Bank had been supported on the ground that funds were wanting to support the war; which same ground had also been assigned for the passage of the bill to repeal the embargo. But now the House were told there was revenue enough, and that all was well. If so, Mr. B. said he was satisfied; and if the Committee of Ways and Means would tell the House there was no occasion for it, he would vote against this and every similar proposition; and he hoped to hear no more of these schemes for raising revenue. He was sorry to hear one observation from the gentleman, about reducing the wants of the country; which he could not construe in any other meaning than that of giving up our rights and making a dishonorable peace. He would resort to anything rather than that.

Mr. EPPEs said, in reply to Mr. B., that his conduct in this House and elsewhere would prove that he was as much disposed to support the war as any gentleman, and felt as little disposition to surrender the rights of his country. But, in regard to the Treasury notes, they must depreciate whenever there was not a known fund sufficient for their redemption, &c. As to the restrictive system, which had been hinted at, he was attached to it; but when a question was presented to his mind, whether he would remove that system or issue paper money, he could not hesitate. When paper money is resorted to, there must soon be an end of all measures requiring money to support them.

Mr. GRUNDY, of Tennessee, explained what he had said of a National Bank, as connected with the loan for the present year, differently from the idea Mr. DESHA and Mr. BARNETT appeared to entertain of it.

National Bank.

H. OF R.

Mr. DESHA said he had not expected this motion would meet with so warm an opposition, which he had predicated on the doubts which had been expressed of the practicability of obtaining the loan. As to the remarks on the danger of issuing Treasury notes, he apprehended no difficulty on that score: he had collected in the resolution several articles of extravagance and luxury, which would well bear taxation, to defray the interest of the Treasury notes; which, if issued under this regulation, would be in no danger of depreciation. They were not to be redeemable in less than five years; and the Government, being bound to redeem them, would before that time provide a fund for redeeming them. As to a paper money system, he certainly viewed it as a great evil; but what difference was there between that and a bank paper? Both were paper money. Treasury notes would circulate as freely at least as bank paper, because bearing interest. The credit of the nation was not so bad but that the farmers and others who wished to lay up money would give a preference to the Treasury notes over any other money. As to the proposed bank, he in common with many others entertained Constitutional scruples; in regard to Treasury notes, no such difficulty attended them. The first object with every friend to his country must be the prosecution of the war; and with a view to that object he had made this motion.

Mr. FISK, of New York, opposed even sending this proposition to a committee for inquiry, because it would produce an impression that this House was satisfied there might be a necessity of adding fifteen millions of Treasury notes to the amount already proposed to be issued. Such a measure would spread a general alarm, at the prospect of such a mass of paper money being thrown into circulation. Without more cogent reasons than he had heard, Mr. F. said he hoped the House would not tamper with such dangerous experiments.

Mr. ALSTON, of North Carolina, said he was opposed to this resolution, not because he was opposed to the principle of it, but because the Committee of Ways and Means already have power to act on this subject. For his part, he had been favorable to this scheme; but could not find a second in the Committee of Ways and Means on the subject. He was satisfied what would be the result of the inquiry if it were submitted to that committee, and therefore should vote against it; though if the gentleman would change it so as to make the resolution imperative on the Committee of Ways and Means to report a bill on the subject, he would vote for it.

The question on the adoption of Mr. DESHA's motion was then decided in the negative—yeas 37, nays 108, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bard, Barnett, Bowen, Caldwell, Chappell, Condict, Conard, Crawford, Crouch, Desha, Earle, Evans, Farrow, Franklin, Gourdin, Griffin, Grundy, Hall, Harris, Hawes, Humphreys, Ingham, Irving, Johnson of Kentucky, Kerr, Lyle, Macon, Murfree, Nelson, Newton, Rhea of Tennessee, Sharp, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Ward of New Jersey, Whitehill, and Wilson of Pennsylvania.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brigham, Brown, Butler, Caperton, Calhoun, Champion, Cilley, Clark, Comstock, Cox, Creighton, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davenport, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Duvall, Ely, Eppes, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forney, Gaston, Geddes, Gholson, Hanson, Hasbrouck, Hawkins, Howell, Hungerford, Ingersoll, Jackson of Rhode Island, Johnson of Virginia, Kennedy, Kent of New York, Kent of Maryland, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of Massachusetts, King of North Carolina, Law, Lefferts, Lewis, Lovett, Lowndes, Markell, McKim, McLean, Miller, Moffit, Montgomery, Moseley, Oakley, Ormsby, Parker, Pearson, Pickering, Pickens, Piper, Pitkin, Pleasants, Post, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rich, Ridgely, Ringgold, Ruggles, Sevier, Seybert, Sheffield, Sherwood, Shipherd, Smith of New Hampshire, Smith of New York, Stanford, Stuart, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Thompson, Troup, Udree, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Webster, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, Winter, Wright, and Yancey.

So the House determined against the motion.

NATIONAL BANK.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of Saturday last, being Mr. GRUNDY's motion to appoint a committee to inquire into the expediency of establishing a National Bank, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. NEWTON's motion for indefinite postponement of this subject being still under consideration—

Mr. FARROW, of South Carolina, spoke against the postponement. He was inclined to believe the establishment of a National Bank to be both Constitutional and expedient; and should therefore vote against the postponement, without saying how he should vote on the bill, because he did not know in what form it would be reported. The want of time was no argument against the discussion of this subject. None could be of more importance, or more peremptorily requiring members to sacrifice personal convenience to the public interest.

Mr. HAWKINS, of Kentucky, supported the indefinite postponement. He was against the proposition proposed to be postponed, if it was only because the difficulties said to exist in procuring funds for the prosecution of the war were seized on to produce a change of principle. As to the difficulties which were said to exist, he considered them in a great degree imaginary, and their reiteration as calculated to produce no beneficial consequences to the nation. He did not believe the difficulties in question, if they existed at all, were such as to require this House to sacrifice principle at the shrine of necessity. He should therefore vote for the indefinite postponement, however under other circumstances he might object to such a course of legislation, because present necessity was made the plea for obtaining that decision from the House which, under other circumstances, could not be obtained.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, opposed the postponement. He had heard no one, in the course of this debate, advocate a sacrifice of principle to the exigency of the times. He did not know but the establishment of a Bank could be amply supported on general grounds distinct from the situation of the Government or from considerations of finance. He was happy that this was a question trammelled by no party considerations; it was a question which concerned commerce and commercial operations. Representing a distant but highly commercial section of the country, which bid fair to equal if not outstrip any other part of the United States in commercial importance, he felt disposed, whenever in his power, to do any act, not contravening the Constitution, which would be beneficial to commerce. Those gentlemen who entertained Constitutional objections would do well to vote against postponement, because they could not be expected to yield them. Having himself no such objection, and looking to the expediency of the measure only, he wished for an opportunity of fair consideration to be offered to this subject.

Mr. HAWKINS spoke in explanation. He said he should be always ready to give a candid consideration to any proposition made in this House under ordinary circumstances. But this subject, he said, presented itself in an attitude which did not entitle it to discussion by the House, because predicated on a supposed difficulty which might be found in obtaining the loan already authorized by law. Temporary expedients were not proper for such cases, but measures of a more durable character. Therefore it was that he was in favor of the indefinite postponement. Whenever the question should present itself on principles unconnected with others of moment and present importance, he should not be found opposed to the investigation of it.

Mr. ROBERTSON added, that he considered this as an abstract proposition, and so might the gentleman from Kentucky, if he chose. Some gentlemen supposed it had reference to the immediate convenience of the Government, and some might vote for it and others against it in that view; but they who so voted would vote from motives which Mr. R. said had no operation on him. He did consider it as an abstract proposition whether or not it was expedient at this time to establish a National Bank.

Mr. PITKIN, of Connecticut, said he should vote to postpone this proposition, because there was already before the House a bill on the subject of a National Bank; and because he was opposed to taking up, at this late period of the session, a subject which required, in acting on it, the greatest care and deliberation.

Mr. POTTER, of Rhode Island, said he should vote for the postponement, because no bill could be reported on the subject of a National Bank that he could vote for. The establishment of such a bank would answer no valuable purpose to the community, and by withdrawing from circulation for six or nine months a vast amount of specie would add to the distresses already experienced in the nation from the want of it.

The question on indefinite postponement was then decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Anderson, Bard, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brigham, Caperton, Champion, Cilley, Clark, Crawford, Davenport, Desha, Ely, Eppes, Evans, Geddes, Gholson, Goodwyn, Hale, Hall, Hanson, Hawes, Hawkins, Howell, Hungerford, Ingersoll, Irving, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kennedy, Kent of New York, Kershaw, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Lyle, Macon, Markell, McKim, Miller, Moffitt, Moseley, Nelson, Newton, Pickering, Pitkin, Pleasants, Post, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Rhea of Tennessee, Ringgold, Ruggles, Sharp, Sheffield, Stanford, Stuart, Sturges, Troup, Vose, Webster, Wheaton, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Wright—71.

NAYS—Messrs. Alston, Archer, Barnett, Bowen, Bradley, Brown, Butler, Caldwell, Calhoun, Chappell, Comstock, Condict, Conard, Cox, Creighton, Crouch, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Duvall, Earle, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gaston, Gourdin, Griffin, Grundy, Harris, Hasbrouck, Humphreys, Ingham, Jackson of Rhode Island, Jackson of Virginia, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kilbourn, King of North Carolina, Lefferts, Lowndes, McLean, Montgomery, Murfree, Oakley, Ormsby, Parker, Pearson, Pickens, Piper, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rich, Ridgely, Robertson, Sevier, Sherwood, Shipherd, Skinner, Smith of New York, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Taggart, Tallmadge, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Thompson, Udree, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, White, Whitehill, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Winter, and Yancey—80.

So the House determined that Mr. GRUNDY's motion should not be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HALL of Georgia, then moved to amend the motion by adding after the word "bank," the words "within the District of Columbia."

After a few words of objection by Mr. GRUNDY, who wished the motion general, to afford the Committee latitude of discretion as to the details of the institution, and some observations from Mr. WRIGHT in reply, Mr. HALL's motion was negatived—ayes 32.

The question was then put on the adoption of the resolution, and decided as follows: For the motion 76, against it 69.

So the resolution was passed, and a committee of nine members directed to be appointed to carry it into effect. And Messrs. GRUNDY, OAKLEY, CALHOUN, GASTON, JACKSON of Virginia, LOWNDES, WARD of Massachusetts, INGHAM, and FISK of New York, were appointed the said committee.

TUESDAY, April 5.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of John R. Williams; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Next Meeting of Congress.

H. OF R.

Mr. ARCHER reported a bill to enable the President of the United States to make restitution to the owners of the Danish brigantine called the Henrick; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the relief of John Castille; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EPPES also reported a bill for the relief of Edward Hallowell; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EPPES also reported a bill for the relief of John T. Williamson and Thomas Rice; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. EPPES also reported a bill for the relief of Benjamin W. Crowninshield; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. EPPES, from the same committee, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the compensation allowed to the Collectors of the Customs, made an unfavorable report thereon; which was concurred in by the House.

Mr. EPPES made an unfavorable report on the petition of Stephen Girard, referred on the 14th ultimo; which was read, and concurred in by the House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to provide for the widows and orphans of militia slain, and for militia disabled in the actual service of the United States. The bill was reported with an amendment which was concurred in by the House and the bill ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The bill to authorize the erection of a penitentiary in the District of Columbia, and to provide the necessary funds therefor, was postponed indefinitely.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill supplementary to an act entitled "An act for ascertaining the titles and claims to lands in that part of Louisiana which lies east of the river Mississippi, and Island of New Orleans. The bill was reported with an amendment, which was concurred in by the House, and the bill ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of persons who, by mistake, have made wrong entries on the public lands; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported with an amendment thereto, striking out the first section of the same: Upon which, the SPEAKER decided, that the report of the Committee of the whole House was not in order, because the amendment struck out the whole bill, which consisted of but one section, and therefore amounted to a rejection of the bill.

A motion was then made by Mr. TAYLOR, that the said bill be postponed indefinitely, and the question being taken, it was resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. GRUNDY, of Tennessee, made a report on the memorial of Thomas Claxton, concluding with resolutions recommending the appointment of James Claxton to attend to the post office and stationery office of the House, with a compensation of three dollars per day during the session. A motion was made to substitute two for three dollars in the report, but was negatived. And the report was then ordered to lie on the table.

The engrossed bill concerning invalid pensioners was read a third time, and passed.

The bill to provide for the collection, preservation, and exhibition of such flags, standards, and colors as shall have been, or may hereafter be, taken by the land and naval forces of the United States from their enemies, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of James Cutter, and the bill for the relief of John Cahoon and others, respectively, passed through Committees of the whole House, and were ordered to a third reading.

The bill to amend the judicial system of the United States was, on motion of Mr. INGERSOLL, postponed indefinitely.

The report of the select committee on the petition of J. A. Chevallie, agent of Amelie Eugenie Beaumarchais, was, on motion of Mr. SHEFFEY, postponed indefinitely.

NEXT MEETING OF CONGRESS.

Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, from the select committee appointed to consider the subject, reported a bill fixing the time for the next meeting of Congress, (the third Monday in October next;) which was twice read.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, moved to amend the bill, so as to fix on the first day of November as the day of meeting, and assigned as a reason the occurrence of many elections about that period, which it would be desirable to members to attend, and also the advantages of short sessions, in which as much business was generally done as in long ones.

Mr. EPPES said, it was desirable that Congress should meet at as early a day as gentlemen residing at a distance could venture into the climate; for the reason that, if this present war continues, not only the direct tax must be revived, but other taxes must be put in operation. It was supposed that three months would be sufficient to put the direct tax into operation, after the law should pass for laying it. Allowing a month for enacting the law, it might go into operation within the month of February, and a considerable part of the proceeds come into the Treasury during that year. If the war continued, it would be proper for Congress to meet in time to make efficient provisions for the service of the next year. The month of October would be as inconvenient a time for himself to be absent from home, Mr. E. said, as for any gentleman in the House; but private convenience must yield to the public interest.

H. OF R.

Modified Duties.

APRIL, 1894.

Mr. JACKSON concurred in the sentiment last advanced by his colleague, but he conceived that the time he had proposed would be early enough for Congress to meet; and being only two weeks later than the day proposed by his friend, could not make any material difference.

Mr. KING, of North Carolina, moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill to Monday next. Negatived—ayes 43.

Mr. GRUNDY, of Tennessee, was desirous of fixing on such a day as should reconcile the convenience of members with the public good; and, that the House might have time to reflect on it, he moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. POST, of New York, said he saw no necessity, after what had fallen from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, for either deferring the question, or for passing the bill now before the House. For, if he understood the gentleman, it was supported on the contingency that we may next year have a continuation of the war. The occasion for meeting being a contingency, and the President having full power to call Congress whenever he shall deem it proper, he saw no occasion to pass a law on the subject; especially when, by coming here as early as proposed, members from the Northern States ran considerable risk of suffering from the influence of this climate.

Mr. EPES said, although it was perfectly true that the President might convene Congress whenever he thought proper, yet he thought it correct, when the Legislature was responsible, that it should not place itself at the discretion of the Executive. It was the duty of Congress to provide the ways and means for carrying on the war; and it was their duty to meet in time to do so, without depending on the discretion of the Executive in this respect.

Mr. FINDLEY, of Pennsylvania, remarked, in addition, that the power given to the Executive to convoke Congress, was not to do the ordinary business of the nation, but such matters as unforeseen events occurring during the recess might render necessary.

The motion to lay the bill on the table was decided as follows—For the motion 66, against it 64.

So the bill lies on the table.

MODIFIED DUTIES.

Mr. INGHAM, of Pennsylvania, with a view to fulfil the intention he had avowed during the debate of yesterday, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to Congress, at their next session, a general tariff of duties, conformably to the existing situation of the general and local interests of the United States.

Mr. PITKIN, of Connecticut, said this subject had been frequently agitated in the Committee of Ways and Means, and it had been considered desirable, with a view to modifications in the system, to obtain an account of the amount of woolen goods and other merchandise imported. To mature a resolution on this subject, he thought was more properly the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means, and suggested the propriety of referring this resolution to that committee.

Mr. SEYBERT, of Pennsylvania, expressed himself decidedly in favor of the motion of his colleague, and saw no necessity whatever for delay by a reference of the subject to any committee whatever.

Mr. NEWTON, of Virginia, expressed himself favorably to the object of this motion, but did not think it as comprehensive as might be desirable. Instead of an ad valorem duty, he thought that many of the duties ought to be specific. That he and other gentlemen might reflect on this matter, and prepare amendments if necessary, he moved that the resolution lie on the table.

Mr. INGHAM, of Pennsylvania, objected to the motion's lying on the table, because of the lateness of the period of the session. He spoke of the necessity of a tariff, and the length of time since any change had been made in the present rate of duties. Some of the specific duties were now from 45 to 50, whilst the highest ad valorem duties, being principally on those articles, too, which come in competition with our manufactures, were not more than 15, though nominally 25 per cent.

Mr. INGERSOLL, of Pennsylvania, hoped that the resolution of his colleague would be suffered to pass, as he thought it ought to have done as moved yesterday; not being able to see the force of the objection, then urged, that it would be improper to refer to one of the Secretaries any subject embraced in a Message from the President. One reason, among others, why he wished the resolution to pass, was, that he saw in to-day's newspaper a mistake which it was necessary to correct. In the National Intelligencer of this morning, it was stated that the prolongation of the double duties was not included in the report—the committee appearing to deem it not necessarily connected with other subjects embraced in the message. You have before you a message proposing to change completely, from top to bottom, the aspect of your commercial relations; and the President, well aware of the effect which even the report of these measures would have on the manufacturing interest, associates in the message a recommendation to prolong the double duties. That matter has been suffered to lie on the table. Now, suppose the present motion of his colleague should be laid on the table, the idea thrown out in this paragraph would gain ground, and the manufacturers would be impressed with the idea that there was no disposition in the House to attend to their interests. This idea the House, he hoped, would not encourage.

Mr. McKIM, of Maryland, said he could see no reason for the resolution's lying on the table, because the objects in view could be very readily obtained by an amendment, which, if the motion to lay it on the table was negatived, he would offer.

The motion to lay the resolution on the table was negatived—ayes 36.

APRIL, 1814.

Repeal of the Embargo.

H. OF R.

Mr. McKim then moved to amend the resolution, by adding to it the following words: "with a view, also, to extend the specific duties as far as practicable, and to suggest such improvements of the laws as may be necessary to secure more effectually the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage." The latter clause he had introduced because of the facility to smuggling, which the unrestricted removal of foreign goods from one port to another now afforded.

Mr. INGHAM objected to this amendment as going to limit the object of his motion.

Mr. LOWMEDES, of South Carolina, hoped the amendment would not prevail. As the resolution now stood, it was left perfectly open, expressing no opinion on the part of the House. The amendment, however, went to express an opinion, which the House could not be prepared so hastily and unadvisedly to decide on. All that could be correctly done at this late period of the session, was generally to call the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury to the subject.

The amendment moved by Mr. McKim was disagreed to, and Mr. INGHAM's motion then passed without objection.

WEDNESDAY, April 6.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "for the relief of Mary Cheevers," with amendments. The Senate have passed a bill "authorizing an augmentation of the marine corps, and for other purposes;" also, a bill "directing the disposition of money paid into the courts of the United States;" in which bills and amendments they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, submitted the following resolution, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That the following rule be added to the rules of this House: "That no amendment by way of rider be received to any bill on its third reading."

On motion of Mr. JENNINGS, of Indiana, ordered that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill to define more explicitly the duties of the Judges of the Territories of Indiana and Illinois.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on the petition of Thomas Claxton.

A motion to reconsider the vote of the House yesterday to strike out the word "three" and insert "two" as the compensation to be allowed per day to the keeper of the letter and stationery office, was carried, and the House, by a vote of 68 to 49, agreed to the said amendment.

A motion was made further to amend the report; when the resolution and amendments were, on motion of Mr. CALHOUN, ordered to lie on the table.

REPEAL OF THE EMBARGO.

The House, on motion of Mr. CALHOUN, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to repeal the embargo and non-importation acts, and the bill to prohibit the exportation of specie.

The first mentioned bill was first taken up; and the first section having been read—

Mr. CALHOUN, of South Carolina, (the Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations,) rose to speak to the merits of the bill. In order to judge of the propriety of the measure it embraced, he said, it would be necessary to go back to the nature and character of the war in which this nation is engaged. It was, as it had been emphatically and correctly stated, a war for Free Trade and Sailors' Rights: and such, Mr. C. said, must be the character of every war in which this nation is engaged. We are so far removed from the European contest, that we shall never enter into the struggles for continental power in that quarter of the world. Not that we should be indifferent spectators of the events in Europe, because the changes there may have a considerable bearing on the affairs and interests of this country: but the interest we feel in these events is not of such a character as to make us a primary party in any of these contests. But one circumstance always accompanying the European struggles, will more or less involve the rights of this country in them. Of such a character is the British commercial or maritime policy, which in its effect tends to destroy the free trade of this country and also to infringe the rights of our seamen. In this point of view it is a matter of great importance that we should duly reflect on the character of the present contest, to decide what part this country ought to act, and what principles should now govern our conduct. The policy of Britain, which is to contract and limit neutral rights, and which, if not resisted, would annihilate them, will always have a strong bearing on the United States. But that policy will not stop here; it will affect the interests of every country in Europe, and place them more or less on the side of this country in resistance to the commercial policy of England. It then becomes a matter of policy to unite those countries, interested in the cause of free trade, in the struggle which we are obliged to make against the usurpations of our enemy. In this point of view the most liberal and generous policy ought to be pursued by us as to the other Powers of Europe, and particularly to the great Northern Powers, Sweden and Russia. But it might be said our past measures contradict this leading principle of policy. Mr. C. thought not. The restrictive system sprung from an unusual state of things: it was a pacific policy, arising from the extraordinary state of the world at the time we embarked in it—and of course was a temporary rather than a permanent policy. On looking back to its origin, gentlemen would find it to be such as he had stated. It originated at a moment when every Power on the continent of Europe was arrayed against Great Britain, and no one country in Europe was then interested in the support or defence of neutral rights. There was scarcely a port in Europe, which, at the commencement of our restrictive system, was not occluded to British commerce.

In this state of things, the United States, in order to avoid war, not having taken the resolution at that time to declare war, resorted to the restrictive system—resorted to it because the extraordinary state of the European world presented a prospect that the strong pressure of this system on Great Britain might save the nation from a war into which we have since been reluctantly drawn. Such was the character of the embargo measure, originating from the posture of the world at that day, when it was resorted to without the prospect of its producing an impression on any neutral Power—for there were then no neutrals. Gentlemen might say, that, in this view of the restrictive system, it ought to have terminated at the commencement of the war. To be candid, Mr. C. said, that was his opinion; and when a motion was made, by a gentleman from Massachusetts, to that effect, he (Mr. C.) had advocated it on the ground that the restrictive policy was opposed to war. That motion was not successful, but it was rejected by a majority of one vote, so many members of the Republican party agreeing with him in that opinion as almost to have carried the question at that time. But why was the system not then terminated? The reasons would be obvious to all who reverted to the circumstances of that time. The state of the world which originally induced the system, which gave great energy to it, continued in its pristine vigor. All Europe was still occluded to British commerce; the war between Russia and France had not broken out—Russia had not then opened her ports to British commerce. This was then the governing motive which prevented the repeal of that system. Had the state of the world then been what it now is; had all the European world, France excepted, been open to British commerce; had there existed neutral nations on the continent of Europe, of very great power and influence; Mr. C. said, had this state of things then existed, there was the strongest reason to believe, from the small minority against the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts to which he had alluded, the restrictive system would have been terminated by the war. As to his own views of that system, Mr. C. said he thought it ought to have terminated in war earlier than it did. In this respect he had disagreed with gentlemen on the other side of the House, with whom he had then voted. They wished neither war nor restriction.

But, said Mr. C., let us now attend to the present state of the world. What is the condition of England? As between us and Great Britain, there are many nations of great power now in a neutral condition. Russia, Sweden, all Germany, Denmark, Russia, Spain, for even she may be considered neutral—and perhaps Holland. Under the entire change in the circumstances of Europe, ought not the restrictive system then to terminate? Indubitably—indubitably, he said, because all the reasons which justified and recommended its continuance had ceased. It was originally resorted to as a specific measure; having declared war, as a war measure it was continued, and was a forcible measure, because all Europe was shut against our enemy. All Europe being now open to her, that reason has ceased. Suppose we were to persist in the measure. Does any one believe that England will feel the measure as she did when the Continent was shut? Certainly not. But in addition to that consideration, the fact is that we are now contending for free trade, and ought to propitiate as much as possible every nation which has the same interest as ourselves in its maintenance. In one word, it is our interest to attach the friendship of Russia, Sweden, Holland, Denmark, and of all nations who have a deep interest in free trade, to the cause of America. Mr. C. felt a strong impression, that if we opened our ports to them, and the maritime usurpations of Great Britain continued, they would in time make common cause with America; that in time their weight would be thrown into the scale with us to counteract the policy of Great Britain. It would not be decorous or wise for the United States, standing up for the freedom of trade, to pursue a course of policy calculated to irritate those nations with whom we may have common cause. What had the Emperor of Russia said in relation to our war with Great Britain, when apprized of it? He had expressed his solicitude for trade with America, and regretted that our difference with Great Britain would interrupt it. This sentiment he had expressed at the moment when all France and her allies marched against him, and he did not know how soon France would plant her standard in his capital. The sentiment must have still greater influence with him now, when his enemy is repelled. The same feeling which governed the Emperor of Russia in this respect must in a greater or less degree govern every nation on the Continent of Europe, whose interests are the same. In the proposition which had been made to France on the part of the allies, a solicitude had been evinced on this subject, which, if this country shows a disposition to extend the benefits of its commerce to the European Continent, must have weight in the British Cabinet. We ought never to forget, Mr. C. said, the reason which had forced us into war. Anxious to maintain our neutral position, and to enjoy the benefits of neutral trade, we had for years closed our eyes against the aggressions on the part of the enemy. Sufferance on our part had provoked only further injury, which had forced us to arms in defence of neutral rights and free trade. Under this view of the subject, he hoped this committee would duly appreciate the necessity of conciliating those nations whose interests were now the same as ours, with whom we have now some trade, and in future may expect it to be greatly extended. But it might be said England would not permit this trade. To what situation, Mr. C. asked, would she then be reduced? To an alternative the most awkward and perplexing. She must either keep up their present mere cruising or paper blockade of our seacoast, to prevent the entrance of those neutrals, or modify her system of paper blockade in favor of all neutrals. Will not a persistence in her present illegitimate blockade, and capture at sea of neutral vessels destined for the United States, irritate and vex those nations, and detach them from the cause of Great Britain? If, on the other hand, she modifies her blockade in their favor, Mr. C. said, we may carry on a lucrative trade to the continent of Europe, not beneficial to England, but very much so to the United States. The very option which will thus be presented will embarrass the British Cabinet, and have a stronger tendency to produce peace than ten years continuance of the present system, when the prospect of its producing any pressure has become so very faint. Mr. C. said he would ask of gentlemen on the same side of the House with himself, whether, if the restrictive system were now off, there would be ten votes in the House in favor of putting it on? He contended there would not. If it were to expire on the 10th of the month, would there be ten votes in favor of its renewal? He believed not. If the House would in neither case embrace it under present circumstances, there was the strongest reason to presume that in its judgment the restrictive system is not now operative and wise. What then, he asked, was the objection to repealing it? A regard to consistency. He knew, he said, that regard ought always to be had to that valuable trait in Governments or men. But it was not the duty of men to regulate their conduct without any regard to events. True wisdom consists in properly adapting your conduct to circumstances. Two things may change our conduct in any particular point: a change of our own opinion, or of exterior circumstances, which entirely change the reason of our former conduct. Men cannot always go straight forward, but must regard the obstacles which impede their course. Inconsistency consists in a change of conduct when there is no change of circumstances which justify it. Those who adapt their conduct to a change of circumstances, act not consistently but otherwise. They would be inconsistent if they persisted in a course of measures after the reasons which called for them had so changed as to require a course directly the reverse. Mr. C. said he respected the firmness of many friends around him, because it indicated their determination to persevere in any system and adhere to any measure which they believed the interest of their country to require. But, according to the view which he had taken, he did not view such a persistence in the restrictive system to be the dictate either of wisdom or sound policy. There were many other observations which he might make on this subject, which he should at present forbear to urge. As to the manufacturing interest, in regard to which some fears had been expressed, the resolution voted by the House yesterday was a strong pledge that it would not suffer the manufacturers to be unprotected in case of a repeal of the restrictive system. Mr. C. said he hoped at all times and under every policy they would be protected with due care. All further remarks he reserved until he should hear the objections to the bill.

Mr. WEBSTER, of New Hampshire, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I am happy to be present at the office now to be performed, and to act a part in the funeral ceremonies of what has usually been called the restrictive system.

The occasion, I think, will justify a temperate and moderate exultation on the part of those who have constantly opposed this system of politics, and uniformly foretold its miserable end. I congratulate my friends on this triumph of their principles.

They have not labored altogether in vain. The vote now to be given is a high tribute to the correctness of their opinions and the consistency of their conduct. At the same time, I would not refuse condolence to the few surviving friends to whose affections the deceased was precious; who are overwhelmed with affliction at its sudden dissolution, and who sorrow, most of all, that they shall see its face no more.

The system, sir, which we are now about to explode, is likely to make no inconsiderable figure in our history. It constitutes an era which will be memorable, and I know no gentlemen who may indulge stronger hopes of being remembered by posterity than those whose names have been associated with its introduction and support. It was originally offered to the people of this country as a kind of political faith. It was to be believed, not examined. They were to act upon, not reason about it. To deliberate was to doubt, and to doubt was heretical. It stood upon the trust reposed in its authors, not upon any merit which could be discovered in itself. It was to be our political salvation, nobody knew exactly how, and any departure from it would lead to political ruin, nobody could tell exactly why. All that the eye can discern in it appeared to be absurd and preposterous; but there was a supposed hidden character, an efficacy unrevealed to vulgar sight, by which it would answer all the great ends proposed by it, and manifest its superiority over those other political systems which this or any country had at any time adopted. Having assumed the nature of a party superstition, it set all reasoning at defiance, and held the minds of a vast portion of the community in chains difficult to be broken. The more so, because it was attended with a severe and efficacious discipline, by which those who went astray were to be brought to repentance. No Saint in the Calendar ever had a set of followers less at liberty, or less disposed to indulge troublesome inquiry, than some, at least, of those on whom this system depended for support.

But, as in other cases, there were those who were above this superstition, and who directed and controlled it. They had their objects; and if those objects have not been obtained, the reason is correctly assigned in the Message before us—"the extensive changes which have recently taken place." The true character of this system, and of the purposes intended to be effected by it, will hereafter be well understood. The passionate excitement, created by opposition to it, so long as it remained the favorite measure of a predominant party, will cease, now that it is passing off with general consent, and the sense of the community, at liberty at last to exercise itself, will be able to see it in the true light, and will not be restrained from pronouncing decisive sentence of condemnation.

The opponents of these restrictive measures have uniformly contended, not only that they were ruinous to ourselves, and almost wholly inoperative on others, but that they did not spring from a purely American policy. This was the great ground of their opposition. They regarded the restrictive system of the United States as an humble imitation of the continental system of France, and as a measure of co-operation with her Government in its conflict with England.

It was easy, they thought, for those who had not yielded their reason to the dominion of party feeling, to see that such was its true character. I do not intend, on this occasion, to take a view of those historical coincidences between French and American measures which have been so often traced. The commencement of the continental system, after the subjugation of Prussia and the humiliation of Russia, was immediately followed by the American embargo of 1807; and if one were to ask what this Government could have contributed more than it has contributed towards rendering that system effectual, it would be difficult to find an answer. From the nature of things these restrictive measures would have no important effect, but from the concurrence with the measures of other Powers. How were they to affect England? By denying to her a market for her manufactures. This, it was said, would excite discontent among the people, and they would compel their Government to do us justice. How far any such consequence could be hoped for, depended on the portion of her manufactures which found a market in this country. This was not such as to afford rational grounds for such expectation. It is a high estimate to say, that one-twelfth part of the whole product of British manufactures finds a market of consumption in the United States. Could it be supposed, that, by refusing to purchase this amount of her commodities, we could coerce her to comply with our terms? Would the loss of this portion of their market so far incense the people of England that her Government would be compelled, by the force of public opinion, to abandon its measures? How could such an expectation be entertained by those who have not hesitated to deprive the people of this country of the whole market for their exports, and cut off their commerce of every description, and yet imagine that their privations will be borne with patience and resignation? No such expectation was entertained. It was impossible it should be. The truth is now acknowledged. This system depended for its success on another and a mightier system. It was the auxiliary, and not the principal. Not capable, of itself, of producing any great effect on the interest of England, it might yet contribute to that end by its co-operation with the measures of her European enemy.

meant by co-operation. In one sense he himself had not used it, and now denied its application.]

I did not allude particularly to the speech of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina. I said, that the effect to be expected from the restrictive system of the United States depended on the operation of another system, to which it was appendant. The systems of France and America were intended to operate against the same Power, at the same time, by similar measures, and were, in some degree, mutually dependent on each other for success. This I call co-operation. If France succeeded in her contest with England, then America would succeed. The more she spread desolation and ruin over Europe, the more our hopes of success to our measures were brightened. If France failed, then America would fail also. Our interests were coming to be, in this course of things, identified with those of France. It was the direct and inevitable tendency of this vicious and mischievous system of politics to make a common cause between the two Governments. It was natural that the politicians of this country should wish success to their own measures. This necessarily led them to desire the continuation and increase of the already overgrown power of France; because on this the fate of their own measures depended. Without considering what other causes existed, leading to an undue preference and partiality for that Power, which have so warped and biassed its whole system of foreign relations, it is entirely evident that the restrictive measures of this Government, from first to last, were of a nature to associate its hopes, its wishes, and its supposed interests with the side of France. This is the charge so often urged against the course of Administration, and the grounds on which it rests are now no longer to be denied. Their system, as is admitted, was adopted when every Power on the Continent was arrayed against England, and its ports shut to her commerce. The final abandonment of the system is now justified on the ground that great changes have taken place. These changes are neither more nor less than the overthrow of French power, and the deliverance of nations long oppressed by its bloody and barbarous despotism. How unnatural, how perverse, how radically false must be a system of measures which has opposed our interests to the general interests of mankind, and reduced us to that miserable condition, that unless we would wish to see the measures of our own Government disconcerted and its hopes disappointed, we must rejoice, not in the general liberty and prosperity of nations, but in the progress of successful usurpation! In my opinion, sir, no censure is too severe to bestow on such a system of politics. Even without regard to the character of the Government with which it was uniting us, it was, in its own nature, radically wrong and reprehensible. Its direct tendency was to diminish our own independence, and our self-respect, and to lead to a reliance on the efforts and success of others for the maintenance of our own rights. It was connecting us most dangerously with the affairs of foreign nations, and rendering us liable to change with every fluctuation of power and politics in Europe. If this system had been described by its authors at first introduction, as it is now described, the people of this country would not have endured it. If they had been told that it depended for support in the continuance of French power over the Continent, and that, in the event of any considerable diminution of that power, it would become futile and contemptible, they would have rejected it with scorn. There is, I trust, in the community, a sentiment of national independence which would have repelled a system of politics founded upon a reliance on the arm of another nation; and I am sure there is a sense of honor and humanity which would have been shocked at such an association of American interests with the most profligate, ruthless, and horrible tyranny that has ever been exercised over any portion of the human race.

To be consistent with themselves the friends of the measures now proposed to be repealed would be bound to re-enact them if the affairs of Europe should again change their aspect. If the armies of the allies should be repulsed and destroyed; if Prussia should again be overrun, Austria compelled to make her peace, and Russia driven, in rout and ruin, back to her own "frightful climate," a state of things will again exist favorable to our experiments of commercial restrictions. If the Emperor of France should again be able to subdue, or to humble every Power in Europe but one, then will be the time for our hitherto favorite policy again to develop itself, and to aid in the last labor of imperial ambition. I trust that no such state of things is near, and that Heaven, in its wise and merciful ordering of events, will save us from that from which we have seemed hitherto not desirous of saving ourselves. I hope, also, that the immense losses and sufferings which the people of the United States have endured, uselessly endured, under the operations of the restrictive system, will insure a long abhorrence of its memory.

By the sudden abandonment of all this policy thousands will be unavoidably ruined, as other thousands were ruined at its commencement. In a commercial country nothing can be more objectionable than frequent and violent changes. The concerns of private business do not endure such rude shocks, but with extreme inconvenience and great loss. It would seem, however, that there is a class of politicians to whose taste all change is suited; to whom whatever is unnatural seems wise, and all that is violent appears great. If great and sudden changes do not agree with their taste, they are, at least, necessary to their system. They must naturally happen in every course of politics that consists altogether in shifts, and projects, and expedients. There has been, for some of the last years, no calculating in the policy of the Government. No man has been able to say what principles would govern it any moment beyond the present. What has made it worse is, that the standard by which some of its leading measures now seem to have been governed has never before been acknowledged. It has not been before confessed that they depended on events in Europe. On the contrary, we have been a thousand times told, that they had nothing to do with the quarrels of other nations, and that to refer to any such criterion was uncharitable and unjust. Who of all the supporters of non-importations and embargoes, ever yet told us frankly and honestly that they would all be abandoned whenever the power of France should be crushed?

Looking, sir, to the language which has been holden, to the votes which have been given, and to the measures which have been adopted, so recently, who could have imagined that any Government could thus suddenly have abrogated its whole system? Since the commencement of the session we received the Message recommending an universal embargo, and more rigorous provisions for enforcing the non-importation. An embargo law was accordingly passed, annihilating, at one blow, all the trade of the country, foreign and domestic, and containing provisions and penalties without example in the legislation of this or any free country. In pursuance of the same policy, and further to enforce the system, this House has since passed a bill, relative to trials in the Admiralty Courts, which abolishes ancient and settled usages of law, and introduces novel and inconvenient regulations in their stead. We have received, also, from the other House, another bill making still further provisions for a strict and unrelenting execution of these laws. So essential was it deemed to the vital interests of the country to prevent all importation of British goods, that woollen and cotton fabrics, and spirits distilled from cane, were to be excluded altogether, come from what quarter they might; because, as they were usually the product of the enemy's country, their neutral character might be colorable only, and false.

It was but the other day that an honorable gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. WRIGHT,) who usually votes with the majority, moved a resolution for repealing the embargo, but failed in obtaining from the House the favor of taking his resolution into consideration. As little success attended a resolution subsequently moved by my honorable friend from North Carolina, (Mr. GASTON.) After a whole day's discussion, the House rejected a bill granting liberty to Paul Cuffee to cross the Atlantic for the most honorable purposes of charity and humanity, because it would endanger the safety of the country by violating the embargo. No safe provision could be devised, no adequate security could be given; even the discretion of the President, so safe to the people when the law is to be enforced, was not to be trusted with any relaxation. In addition to these proofs of the temper of the Government, legislative and other addresses have been presented to us, approving the measures of the Administration, and expressing the fullest confidence that it would adhere to its system. Yet, notwithstanding all this, in a moment—in the twinkling of an eye—the whole system is dissolved. The embargo act, the non-importation act, and all the crowd of additions and supplements, together with all their garniture of messages, reports, and resolutions, are tumbling undistinguished into one common grave. But yesterday, this policy had a thousand friends and supporters; to-day, it is fallen and prostrate, and few “so poor as to do it reverence.”

Sir, a Government which cannot administer the affairs of a nation without producing so frequent and such violent alterations in the ordinary occupations and pursuits of private life, has, in my opinion, little claim to the regard of the community.

It has been said that the system of commercial restriction was favorable to domestic manufactures, and that if it did nothing but induce the habit of providing for our own wants by our own means, it would deserve to be esteemed a blessing. Every gentleman may remember how often, and how zealously, this consideration has been urged upon us. Those, nevertheless, who were opposed to it, and who thought they understood its real character and true objects, did not hesitate to predict that the moment any supposed policy of the Government required it, manufactures would be sacrificed with as little reluctance as commerce had been.

The same unsparing and remorseless hand which had prostrated the one, would equally prostrate the other, to meet any new exigency of affairs, to overcome present financial embarrassment, or answer any purpose of temporary expediency. Something is indeed said in the Message in relation to the continuance of the double duties “as a more effectual safeguard and encouragement to our growing manufactures.”

Sir, I consider the imposition of double duties as a mere financial measure. Its great object was to raise revenue, not to foster manufactures.

It is a part of the war system of taxation. As the double duties, in their origin, had little or no reference to the encouragement of manufactures, so neither will they have in their continuance. So soon as the want of money abates, the double duties will cease, and this “safeguard to our growing manufactures” be heard of no more.

I do not say the double duties ought to be continued. I think they ought not. But what I particularly object to, is the holding out of delusive expectations to those concerned in manufactures. The proper measure is undoubtedly a new regulation of the tariff of duties, and perhaps an increase on some selected articles. To double the duties on all articles imported, for the purpose of encouraging the domestic manufacture of some, is absurd and preposterous. That sugar, and coffee, and tea, for example, should be subject to this increase of duties, under pretence of encouraging the woollen and cotton manufactures of the Eastern States, is ridiculous. I trust no man engaged in manufactures will be deceived by it.

But whatever Government intends to do on this subject, it ought to be frank and sincere. Its policy ought to be known, and if it has not a total disregard to the interests of the community, it ought to be constant. In respect to manufactures, it is necessary to speak with some precision.

I am not, generally speaking, their enemy. I am their friend, but I am not for rearing them, or any other interest, in hot-beds. I would not legislate precipitately, even in favor of them; above all, I would not profess intentions in relation to them which I did not purpose to execute. I feel no desire to push the capital into extensive manufactures faster than the general progress of our wealth and population propels it.

I am not in haste to see Sheffield and Birmingham in America. Until the population of the country shall be greater in proportion to its extent, such establishments would be impracticable, if attempted, and if practicable, they would be unwise.

Whatever manufactures can be conducted in the household, where children may be occupied under parental guardianship and protection, are useful in the highest degree. Many others, cotton and woollens for instance, of which the material constituting the article of chief value, is or may be the produce of our own soil, are likewise worthy of protection and care. But of those products of which the chief ingredient is the labor bestowed, which can be made profitable only by the employment of vast capital, by the minutest division and subdivision of labor, and by the toil of children of both sexes, drawn together in great numbers, and put out of sight of those who have a natural interest in the preservation of their health and morals, one can hardly speak in terms of so decisive approbation. Habits favorable to good morals and free Governments, are not usually most successfully cultivated in populous manufacturing cities. It is one of the consequences of such employments to render the laborer altogether dependent on his employer. This arises from the extent to which the division of labor is carried in great manufacturing establishments. He whose occupation it has been for his whole life to perform only one of the many operations necessary to the production of a single article, is necessarily among the most dependent of human beings. The trite example of the number of persons—sixteen or eighteen—who have all their several labors and operations in the production of a common brass pin, sufficiently illustrates my idea.

One of these laborers, utterly incapable of making and carrying to the market on his own account the smallest entire article, is necessarily at the mercy of the capitalist for the support of himself and family. Any cause which deprives him of that particular occupation for which only he is fit, by habit and education, throws him a burden on society. As such causes must occur often, it is in the neighborhood of such establishments that hands unemployed or ill employed will be found in greatest numbers.

It is in her manufacturing districts that England recruits her armies. It is there, principally, that those are found who have the least hold on society, and where necessities, or where habits, force them to the camp. I am not anxious to accelerate the approach of the period when the great mass of American labor shall not find its employment in the field; when the young men of the country shall be obliged to shut their eyes upon external nature, upon the heavens and the earth, and immerse themselves in close and unwholesome work-shops; when they shall be obliged to shut their ears to the bleatings of their own flocks, upon their own hills, and to the voice of the lark that cheers them at the plough, that they may open them in dust, and smoke, and steam, to the perpetual whirl of spools and spindles, and the grating of rasps and saws. I have made these remarks, sir, not because I perceive any immediate danger of carrying our manufactures to an extensive height, but for the purpose of guarding and limiting my opinions, and of checking, perhaps a little, the high-wrought hopes of some who seem to look to our present infant establishments for "more than their nature or their state can bear."

It is the true policy of Government to suffer the different pursuits of society to take their own course, and not to give excessive bounties or encouragements to one over another. This, also, is the true spirit of the Constitution. It has not, in my opinion, conferred on the Government the power of changing the occupations of the people of different States and sections, and of forcing them into other employments. It cannot prohibit commerce any more than agriculture; nor manufactures any more than commerce. It owes protection to all. I rejoice that commerce is once more permitted to exist; that its remnant, as far as this unblessed war will allow, may yet again visit the seas, before it is quite forgotten that we have been a commercial people. I shall rejoice still further, when I see the Government pursue an independent, permanent, and steady system of national politics; when it shall rely for the maintenance of rights and the redress of wrongs on the strength and resources of our own country, and break off all measures which tend, in any degree, to connect us with the fortunes of a foreign Power.

When Mr. WEBSTER had concluded, the Chairman proceeded to read the second section of the bill.

Mr. McKIM, of Maryland said, he had, from the presentation of this bill, been of opinion that it embraced two objects which ought to be kept separate and distinct. Besides, some gentlemen might be disposed to give free scope to the industry and enterprise of the country, who were averse to a repeal of the prohibition of imposts. He therefore moved to strike out the second section of the bill repealing the non-importation acts.

Mr. CALHOUN said, he had only one observation to make. He hoped the provisions of this bill would all go together; that they would all stand or all fall.

Without debate, the motion was negatived.

Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, made two successive motions, the object of which was to do away all penalties and forfeitures which shall have been incurred under the acts proposed to be repealed.

These motions were supported by Mr. OAKLEY, and Messrs. GASTON, KING of Massachusetts, and WARD, on the ground that the continuation of prosecutions and collections of fines and forfeitures would answer no end, the laws being repealed, but to enrich informers, without producing any salutary effect, as the object of penalties was not to avenge but to deter from violation of law, &c., and especially in cases of offences which were constituted by temporary laws; and were opposed by Messrs. WRIGHT of Maryland, and Mr. CALHOUN of South Carolina, on the ground of necessity of enforcing general respect to the Government and laws generally, as well as of particular statutes, and on the argument that the magnitude and evil of any wanton violation of law was in no degree lessened by the repeal of the law violated, but ought to be as rigidly punished as if the law were still in existence.

The proposed amendments were negatived; the first by a large majority, and the second by the following vote: For the amendment 52, against it 88.

Mr. CALHOUN moved an amendment to the second section of the bill, little more than verbal, going to include in the repeal so much also of any act or acts as prohibit the importation of the products of British territories in neutral vessels, &c.—Agreed to.

Mr. BRADLEY, of Vermont, then moved to strike out the third section of the bill (which is recited below.) If he understood its object, it was to permit a commerce to be carried on in neutral vessels from which our own vessels were shut up. This he believed to be contrary to the true policy of the country.

Mr. CALHOUN opposed the motion. It was advisable, he said, as far as possible, to keep our own seamen engaged in our own vessels or in our marine.

Mr. PICKERING, of Massachusetts, advocated the motion. He thought the section might produce much inconvenience, by preventing our citizens from going out to bring home vessels detained abroad, and but little benefit—because the low wages given by neutrals would be no inducement to our seamen to leave the high wages given in our service.

Mr. POTTER, of Rhode Island, opposed the motion. If the bill passed, all our commerce would be carried on with British capital, though under neutral colors; and, if this section was struck out, besides taking the carrying trade, the British would get our seamen also.

Mr. MURFEE, of North Carolina, supported the motion, principally on the ground of the discretion given to the collectors as to passports, &c., and the difficulty they would find in discriminating. This section, if retained, would prohibit the exercise of the right of emigration, to which every citizen is entitled, and was so obnoxious to him, that, unless it were struck out, he must vote against the bill.

H. OF R.

Repeal of the Embargo.

APRIL, 1814.

Mr. OAKLEY moved to amend the third section, which he considered it important to retain, by inserting in it the words "during the continuance of the war between the United States and Great Britain." This motion was agreed to.

A motion was then made to strike out the latter clause of the section, which goes to prohibit neutral vessels from taking passengers without passports.

The motion was opposed by Mr. CALHOUN, on the ground that this clause was necessary to give efficacy to the preceding part of the section.

The motion to strike out the latter clause of the third section was negatived. For the motion 57, against it 81.

The question then recurred on striking out the whole of the third section, being, as amended, in the following words:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That no foreign ship or vessel, during the present war between the United States and Great Britain, shall receive a clearance, or be permitted to depart from the United States, whose officers and crew shall not consist wholly of the citizens or subjects of the country to which such ship or vessel shall belong, or of a country in amity with the United States; and no citizen of the United States shall be permitted to depart in such ship or vessel without a passport or permission therefor, furnished under the authority and direction of the President of the United States.

Mr. PITKIN, of Connecticut, advocated the motion to strike out this section, the provisions of which he considered impolitic, if not unconstitutional. It was contrary to the interest of our own people, which certainly favored the covering our property, during war, by the neutral flag, if it was practicable. The section proposed also to deprive the seamen of the United States of the right of going abroad, and would operate in the manner of impressment by forcibly detaining them in our service; and would also prove a hardship on neutral traders as well as on our own citizens.

Mr. FISK, of Vermont, said that though he should vote for this whole bill with much reluctance, for various reasons, yet if this section were stricken out, he must vote against the bill. He made a number of remarks in reply to Mr. PITKIN. He denied it to be any hardship to our seamen to prescribe the regulations under which foreign vessels should enter and depart from our ports, and expressed his surprise at finding the gentleman from Connecticut to have become so far a convert to the right of expatriation, as to believe it unconstitutional or objectionable to restrict our citizens from going abroad during war. If these seamen were to go out they would only be subject to capture by the enemy, and increase the number of American prisoners now in his possession.

Mr. POTTER, of Rhode Island, also opposed the motion for striking out the section, and made several appropriate remarks against the motion. If this section were stricken out, our commerce would not only be carried on with the capital and to the profit of British merchants, but would be carried on by the employment of American seamen; who, if the bill were to pass, would scud to sea in foreign vessels as rats desert a sinking ship.

Mr. BRADLEY, of Vermont, supported his motion on the ground of indulgence to our seamen. He said that the argument by which it was supported savored too much of the policy now about to be abandoned, of keeping our ships and seamen at home, to prevent their being captured. Since commerce was to revive, he did not wish to restrain our gallant seamen from partaking in its benefits.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, also spoke against striking out the section, taking occasion, however, positively to deny that our gallant seamen were, as Mr. POTTER seemed to suppose, rats who would desert their country in its time of need.

Mr. NEWTON, of Virginia, also opposed the striking out of the section; although he did not believe the provision about passports would have the effect attributed to it, because it could be easily evaded. The whole bill would have the effect to throw into the hands of Great Britain the carrying trade of the world, as most of the neutral vessels would be British bottoms, and navigated by British capital. The whole system of licenses would be revived, with its attendant fraud and collusion. But if this section were struck out, even our own seamen would be made subservient to the same interests.

The question on striking out this section was negatived—for the motion 60, against it 80.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, then moved to amend the section by substituting for the word "citizen," in the latter clause of the section, the words "seaman, being a citizen." The motion was negatived by a large majority.

The Committee being about to rise and report the bill—

Mr. CALHOUN said he wished, before the Committee rose, to make a few remarks in reply to what had fallen from the gentleman from New Hampshire. That gentleman had said that it was now proved that the policy of the restrictive system was not truly American. If the gentleman meant that the continuance of that system had not been dictated exclusively by a sense of the interests of this country as affected by the state of other Powers, he asserted that which materially differed from the fact. If the gentleman meant that it had grown out of the state of the world, he was right. The system most indubitably grew out of the state of the world. The gentleman had not made the discovery he appeared to suppose; because this circumstance had been repeatedly avowed and never concealed. The gentleman had said that our measures should not be governed by the state of affairs in Europe; that it was our true policy to be independent of her; in other words, that no man was fit to be a statesman who knew anything of England, of Russia, or of any other Power of Europe. Mr. C. said, that while he admitted we ought not to form "entangling alliances" with other Powers, yet not to regulate our conduct in relation to commercial matters by the state of affairs in Europe, would be a course of policy imprudent and unwise. Every measure adopted in respect to foreign commerce must be predicated on a knowledge of the state of Europe. If not, we had better at once adopt the terrapin policy gentlemen have so much reprobated, and have not a cock-boat or sail on the ocean. The whole fallacy of the gentleman's argument (said Mr. C.) consists in this: the gentleman considers our measures as co-operating with those of the Emperor of France, and desires to produce the impression that we have common views and the same object with France. Such is not the fact. But the people of the United States, in pursuit of their own interest, have a right to seize on circumstances, however produced, whether by England, France, or Russia, and suit their commercial policy thereto. This was a position which Mr. C. said he should never renounce; and he thought no man who should deliberately consider the subject would differ from him in opinion. In this point of view we have co-operated with France; we have seized on passing events, and adopted measures applicable to the circumstances of the times and adapted to the policy of the country. Whatever there may be criminal or foreign in such policy, Mr. C. said he would readily assume. As to the stale charge of French influence, again insinuated at this day, he could not be expected to notice it; he detested and contemned it. It was ridiculous; it had nothing to do with this or any other question in this House, or with the policy of the Government. The object of the Government had been to control the maritime and commercial policy of the enemy; in this respect, the war and the restrictive system were identified; they were merely different means of asserting the same end, the noble end of the liberty of the seas, free trade and sailors' rights. Whether the one or the other should be pursued, or both, was a matter of election, to be decided by the exercise of a sound discretion. No imputation of improper foreign influence can be sustained against the Government for seizing on circumstances arising from the state of either France or England to adapt our measures accordingly. Even England regulates her conduct by that of France. And when nations regulate their policy by the circumstances of their enemies, might not we, whilst neutrals, regulate our conduct according to the circumstances of the belligerents? The restrictive system and this war have a common policy—to maintain our rights and compel the enemy to respect our just claims. It was believed by politicians on all sides that, owing to the situation of the world, the restrictive system was one which had, prior to the war, saved our commerce from foreign control and subjection, which had prevented us from being in fact recolonized. Suppose the policy of the gentleman had been pursued, and we had forgotten Europe, and been indifferent to British exactions and oppressions. What would have been the result? Our commerce would have been placed under the direction of England; it would have been carried on for her benefit; she would have kept on monopolizing and monopolizing, until not only our carrying trade, but our direct trade, and even our coasting trade would have been destroyed. We had commenced resistance by the restrictive system. It would have been wiser, Mr. C. said; in his opinion, if we had begun with war, and if he had then been a member of this House he would have preferred that course. That the two systems of war and restriction were consistent with each other was all that he contended for. We were now, he said, in pursuit of the good old policy to which we have been compelled to resort, of resisting by war the maritime oppressions of Britain, which began with the rule of '56, and gained strength in the power and ambition with which the Administration of Chatham inspired the councils of England. It had continued growing until it had compelled this country to leave the sweets and ease of neutrality to encounter the hazards and hardships of war. What would be lost by giving up the restrictive system, Mr. C. said, would be made up by increased vigor to the war. We should still be able to coerce the enemy; we could still act and act more strongly on his provinces; we could commit depredations on his commerce by our privateers; and the very circumstance of war existing with Great Britain, together with the operation of the double duties, would still retain, as to her, two-thirds of the commercial restrictions which now exist. I hope (said Mr. C.) the gentleman will not assert that this House or the Government has co-operated in the views of France. I hope the gentleman believes us to be too honorable men for that, and that we stand on American ground. History will view the conduct of this Government in that light; and will record that we acted by ourselves, unconnected and uncontrolled by any foreign nation.

Mr. WEBSTER said, although the gentleman was very willing to part with this restrictive system, it was very natural that he should feel for it something like the feeling for a departed friend, and should desire to make it appear respectable when near its end. He now rose to correct an impression his former remarks appeared to have made on the gentleman's mind. The great objection which he had before offered to the restrictive system was, that it was a measure which for its success depended on the course of events in foreign nations. He had made no observation as to motives; the occasion did not call for it; but he contended that the system about to be abolished was a system of false policy altogether; in other words, that "the good old-fashioned policy" was that from which we should never have departed. We ought to have asserted our rights by our own strength, and not, even for the purpose of effecting a great object, have resorted to a course of measures which must be inoperative; we ought to rely for the maintenance of our rights and redress of our wrongs on our own power, and not adopt a policy depending on others to make it efficient. Of late our policy had been so wavering, one day voting this system good, another day bad, that our acts and statutes frown at each other on record in the most positive spirit of contradiction.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, in a few words explained his ideas of the embargo. He had believed it a wise measure, and had supported it. But the circumstances of Europe had essentially changed, and with them the grounds of the measure. Of such changes it was right for the Administration to take advantage; and he believed the Executive had, in recommending its repeal to Congress, no more than done its duty.

Mr. WILLIAM REED spoke as follows:—

Mr. Chairman: On no occasion, since I have had the honor of a seat in this House—which has been during the period of that awful transition of our country, from the enjoyment of the blessings of peace and prosperity, in a degree unexampled in the history of the world, to those scenes of imbecile, wasteful, disastrous, and distressing war, that have within this short period passed before us, and need not now be repeated; and which, but for the brilliant successes of our little navy, (that precious relic of better days,) would have sunk the mind of every patriot in the slough of despair—have I been called to act on any proposition of more doubtful expediency than is embraced by the bill now before us.

It has been no small relief to my mind, that the mistaken policy of converting the resources of our country, in the unrestrained enterprise of our citizens, into the weapons of offensive and defensive war, by restrictions as impolitic as unnatural, would find its grave in the consequences it would inevitably bring down upon its authors; who, while they hold the responsible station of "riding on the whirlwind, and directing the storm of war" they have raised, must be taught from experience, generally a dear school, those impressive lessons, which were urged with so much sensibility by that unfortunate but unheeded class of men, (the merchants,) whose interest anticipated so justly their impolicy and inefficacy; nor can I withhold entirely the expression of those feelings of honest triumph—sir, I mean not ostentatious boasting—at the dawn of that day which is to consign the last relic of a visionary and ruinous policy to the tomb of "all the Capulets." And did it appear to me, sir, said Mr. R., that more than the dawn of this glorious day had arrived, and that it had reached its meridian splendor, I should have felt much less, if at all, the necessity which now compels me reluctantly to abandon the course I have generally pursued, of giving a silent vote on the passage of this bill. But, sir, when I find in the Message of the President, recommending this new course of policy, and in the concurrent report which has been presented by the eloquent chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations, and also in the argument which he has urged to this committee for the adoption of this bill, no other reason assigned but the late changes in the circumstances of friendly European Powers; changes which, as far as I have been able to ascertain, are in every case unfavorable to the extension of American commerce. Let us briefly examine, sir, what these changes are—Russia and Sweden in the North, and Spain and Portugal in the South of Europe, are the same. Denmark, Holland, all Germany, and Italy, have, indeed, changed, from the paramount influence of France, our ally, to the same degree of influence on the part of England, our enemy. How these changes are considered favorable I am at a loss to discern. France has also changed her attitude, but it alters not her relative situation with this country, unless we connect this expiring system with the Continental system of Bonaparte, now exploding with the allies; which I presume is not intended by the friends of this bill. Therefore, sir, as I cannot trace the reasons assigned to any tenable basis, I am constrained to attribute this bill rather to the financial necessities of the day, than a correction of theory on the subject of commercial regulations. Indeed, sir, I tremble, lest the only benefit I had ever anticipated for the immense sacrifices on this experiment, viz.: a practical demonstration of the axiom "that interested individuals are the best judges of their own affairs, and that much legislation ever distracts and destroys commerce," which requires only the aid of steady laws for its protection, is about to be lost by a premature relinquishment of it. Lest, however, I should be misunderstood in the argument I shall presently urge against the expediency of repealing these laws at this moment—as having changed my views of their real character—I beg leave here to remark, that the impressions, which at the first resort to them were made upon my mind, have since been too strongly confirmed by their ruinous consequences on our country generally, as well as on the State I have the honor to represent, ever to be effaced, and, especially so, on most of my fellow-citizens dependent on the operations of commerce, whose distresses have long since sickened me to loathing of everything like commercial restrictions.

Yet, sir, while I feel this conviction so deeply, I cannot overlook the great number of respectable men, in and out of this House, whose influence has so long predominated in the councils of this nation, that are not yet satisfied with the experiment. I am disinclined to its removal at the moment when the correction of the public mind is in rapid progression, and when a short time, without any new sacrifice, will so far cleanse the body politic, as to leave no further hopes to the expedients of quackery.

Convinced, too, as I am, sir, that a firm adherence to a favorite policy, until satisfied of its true character, is not less an evidence of integrity in one class than its abandonment by others, also its former friends, I do expect that a short time will number all those who now adhere to it with the majority; whom I expect, on the final passage of this bill, to renounce, with genuine magnanimity, their once plighted faith. The conviction that is slowly made, is not the less deserving of confidence. Therefore, as in time of war with a great naval Power that blockades our whole coast, nothing more will be permitted to pass the enemy but what suits his own convenience, no essential relief can be given to the suffering citizens of this country. With all my convictions against the policy, I would rather endure a little longer than hazard so much by its repeal at this time.

But, sir, the half is not told you; and had it been the embargo only that was affected by this bill, the advantages to arise from the return of our coasting trade unshackled, and the comforts of our citizens, relieved from the pestering group of official pimps and informers, would have compensated for the repeal of that act alone, was it not connected with other very important considerations, and would also have saved me the pain of separation from my political friends on this question; with whom it is my pride and happiness generally to act, and whose candor and charity I solicit on this occasion. Differing from whom, nothing but the responsibility of my station, and the firm conviction of my own judgment, could sustain me in voting against a measure which is hailed by them, and I should rejoice to have it so prove, as the precursor of that millenium in the political and commercial world we have so long and ardently desired.

Sir, I have before alluded to other considerations that have still greater weight on my mind, than merely the danger of recurring, at a future day, to the embargo policy. I will proceed briefly to state them, and, in doing this, I shall attempt little more than an examination of the natural effects of our relative situation with the enemy, under the repeal now contemplated.

It is a fact well known, and is shown by the reports from the Secretary of the Treasury, that, in times of peace and free trade, our exportations to England fell several millions annually short of our imports of her manufactures; the balance of which was supplied from the excess of our exports to the Continent. It is also true, that since the enactment of the non-importation act against England only, that is, since the Proclamation of the President, of the 2d November, 1810, exchange has steadily been in favor of this country, from six to twenty per cent. This is stated to show what must be the natural and inevitable consequence of opening our ports for the unrestrained importation of her manufactures, which it will be for her interest to encourage. Is it not obvious, that while under the neutral flag (at this time another term for her own, whitewashed) they will permit the export, under the general blockade, only of such raw materials as may supply their own wants, and nothing for your benefit; and that the consequence must be the draining, to the last dollar, the specie of this country in payment of the balance for their manufactures? It is unavoidable. I am aware, sir, that I shall be answered, that we have on our table a bill to prevent the exportation of specie. But this does not satisfy me; until the nature of man is changed, it cannot be executed. It is but a remnant of this restrictive policy, and an awkward apology for its abandonment, when, from its former friends, none is necessary.

We have for years been stunned with the clamor of British monopoly. May it not now be asked, what has England attempted, that our measures for years past have not assisted her to accomplish? We complained that she dreaded us as rivals, and modestly retired, under an embargo of eighteen months, to husband our resources, and, by our state of war, have thrown into her hands the commerce of the world; and lest this should not satisfy her, we now propose to add thereto the trade of this country, with every facility in our power to give, for its accomplishment. What more can we do? What inducement can we hold out to her for peace with us? I know of none. Indeed, sir, it seems to me the pledge of interminable war, unless our enemy, in pity to the good people of this country, shall grant us peace in defiance of their own interest. And when, in addition to all this, they have tried the benefits of that trade, which, in the hands of the citizens of this country, yielded, in freight only, the annual value of more than thirty millions of dollars, I can see in it only a bonus to the enemy to continue the war, until they get our last dollar, and the last timber of our ships shall rot at the wharves.

These reasons are sufficient, sir, to induce me to vote against the bill at this time, and to urge this Committee not to adopt a measure fraught with such important consequences, but to wait until we shall hear from our Ministers of peace at Gottenburg, which we all hope will release our country of its greatest curse—this war; when we may hope to avoid not only these serious evils, but with them, too, the disgrace that inevitably attaches to any Government pursuing a policy so vacillating as we shall by passing this bill. I must beg the patience of the Committee, while I call their attention to the Message of the President on the 20th July, 1813. It is as follows:

"There being sufficient ground to infer that it is the purpose of the enemy to combine with the blockade of our ports special licenses to neutral vessels, or to British vessels in neutral disguises, whereby they may draw from our country the precise kind and quantity of exports essential to their wants, whilst its general commerce remains unobstructed; keeping in view also the insidious discriminations between different ports in the United States; and as such a system, if not counteracted, will have the effect of diminishing very materially the pressure of the war on the enemy, and encouraging a perseverance in it, at the same time it will leave the general commerce of the United States under all the pressure the enemy can impose, thus subjecting the whole to British monopoly, I recommend to the consideration of Congress the expediency of an immediate and effectual prohibition of exports, limited to a convenient day in their next session, removable, in the meantime, in the event of a cessation of the blockade of our ports."

With your leave, sir, I will finish reading the few authorities I feel constrained to bring to the attention of the House on this occasion. The next is the Message of the 9th December last, of which I shall only read the two first and the last paragraphs, viz:

"The tendency of our commercial and navigation laws, in the present state, to favor the enemy, and thereby prolong the war, is more and more developed by experience. Supplies of the most essential kinds find their way, not only to British ports and armies at a distance, but the armies in our neighborhood, with which our own are contending, derive from our ports and outlets a subsistence attainable with difficulty, if at all, from other sources. Even the fleets and troops infesting our coasts and waters are, by like supplies, accommodated and encouraged in their predatory and incursive warfare."

"Abuses having a like tendency take place in our import trade. British fabrics and products find their way into our ports, under the name and from the ports of other countries; and often in British vessels disguised as neutrals, by false colors and papers."

"To shorten, as much as possible, the duration of the war, it is indispensable that the enemy should feel all the pressure that can be given to it; and the restraints having that tendency will be borne with the greater cheerfulness by all good citizens, as the restraints will affect those most who are most ready to sacrifice the interest of their country in pursuit of their own."

Sir, I will not detain you nor the Committee long by a labored commentary on these two papers; they are in the hands of every one, and every one can understand them; nor shall I make professions of unbounded confidence in the President, it is not necessary for my present purpose; but if the facts stated in them were true when presented to this Congress for their consideration, and nobody ever denied the facts, they are equally true now, and if experience developed their necessity in December, reason teaches every man that the same necessity exists in greater force now than it did then; and if indispensable then, to bring the war to a speedy issue, they are more so now.

Sir, although as a partisan I feel no personal responsibility of the measures of the Administration, I cannot, nay, I would not but be an American, for, "with all her faults, I love thee," and I cannot separate myself, as such, from the disgrace that attaches to such vacillating conduct. Would to Heaven they were not on record, but since they are, and my vote must be so too, I'll have no share in an act so humiliating, so degrading to my country.

The Committee then rose, and reported the bill to the House.

Mr. BRADLEY renewed the motion he had made in Committee to strike out the third section of the bill. This bill, he said, whilst it would benefit the merchant and grower of produce, would prostrate the manufactures and seamen, to which two classes we were most indebted for what gave character to the country. What would be the impression of our seamen, he said, when they found themselves shut up, and our trade wholly carried on by foreigners? As the bill now stood, the interest of the seamen was openly abandoned.

Mr. CALHOUN said, he, as a grower of produce, should certainly feel an interest in striking out that section, as it was the interest of the planter to let commerce run in any channel it might wear for itself. But it was deemed advisable to retain our seamen as much as possible from foreign, and in our own, service. As to the manufacturing interest, it could not be considered as disregarded, when there existed a duty of fifty per cent. on the invoice duty of foreign goods. If this was not encouragement, he knew not what was. The vote of the House yesterday required a general tariff to be laid before it conveyed a pledge that the manufacturing interest should be protected. Double duties would not protect it properly; double duties on coffee and sugar offered no encouragement to the manufacture of broadcloth. He hoped to see manufactures encouraged by appropriate duties, and had no idea of their being left without such protection.

Mr. FORSYTH made a motion to strike out the last clause of the third section; which motion took precedence of the motion to strike out the whole, and was first decided.

This motion was opposed by Messrs. CALHOUN, POTTER of Rhode Island, WRIGHT, FISK of Vermont, and GHOLSON; and supported by Messrs. FORSYTH, GASTON, ROBERTSON of Louisiana, and MURFREE, on the grounds before briefly stated.

Mr. FORSYTH's motion was decided by yeas and nays—For the amendment 65, against it 75, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barnett, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Bradbury, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brigham, Caperton, Champion, Chappell, Cilley, Cooper, Cox, Cuthbert, Davenport, Ely, Forsyth, Gaston, Geddes, Hale, Hanson, Hawes, Howell, Hungerford, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kennedy, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, King of North Carolina, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Lowndes, Macon, Markell, McKim, Moffit, Moseley, Murfree, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, Post, John Reed, William Reed, Ridgely, Robertson, Ruggles, Seybert, Sheffey, Sherwood, Shipherd, Smith of New Hampshire, Smith of New York, Stanford, Stuart, Sturges, Tallmadge, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Webster, Wheaton, Wilcox, and Wilson of Massachusetts.

NAYS—Messrs. Alston, Anderson, Archer, Bard, Beall, Bowen, Brown, Butler, Caldwell, Calhoun, Clark, Comstock, Condict, Conard, Crawford, Crouch, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Earle, Eppes, Evans, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forney, Franklin, Gholson, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Grundy, Hall, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawkins, Humphreys, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irving, Jackson of Virginia, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, Lefferts, Lyle, McLean, Moore, Nelson, Newton, Ormsby, Parker, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Potter, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Ringgold, Roane, Sevier, Sharp, Skinner, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Udree, Ward of New Jersey, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wright, and Yancey.

So the House resolved not to strike out the last clause of the third section.

The question then recurred on Mr. BRADLEY's motion to strike out the whole section; and a motion for that purpose succeeding, the House adjourned.

Philadelphia, praying that Congress will take their situation into consideration, and adopt measures for their protection and encouragement.—Referred to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to augment the compensation of the Accountant of the War Department, and of the Paymaster General; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. EPPES also reported a bill for the relief of John D. Hay; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

The amendment of the Senate to the bill "for the relief of Mary Cheevers" was read, and concurred in by the House.

The bill from the Senate, "authorizing an augmentation of the marine corps, and for other purposes," was read twice and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The bill from the Senate, "directing the disposition of money paid into the Courts of the United States," was read twice and, committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "for the final adjustment of land titles in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri," with amendments; in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

REPEAL OF THE EMBARGO.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill to repeal the embargo and non-importation acts.

The motion to strike out the third section of the bill (prohibiting foreign vessels from taking on board American seamen) being still before the House—

The motion was opposed by Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, as opening the door to the enticement away of our seamen, &c.; and, if it were agreed to, our seamen would be taken off by neutrals, used by them as long as convenient, and then turned adrift without any provision for their return; that our seamen would besides be liable to impressment by the enemy; and that these evils were too great to be endured merely for the sake of conciliating neutrals.

The motion was supported by Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, Mr. DUVAL, of Kentucky, and Mr. MURFEE, of North Carolina, on various grounds, among which were the following: That it was in the nature of a sanction to the principle of impressment; that it would have an effect very different from that which was expected from it, because the appearance of restraint would tend to drive our seamen from our service; that it would in fact act oppressively on those seamen who, not being employed in our own marine, might be left destitute of employment by the retention of such a provision; that there was no occasion for this section to facilitate the manning of our public ships, because there would be no difficulty in manning them, nor ever had been of late, except for the fear in the seamen of being employed in the Lake service; and, that, if there were any difficulty, the very passage of such an act, going to make a prison of our country, would increase rather than diminish it.

Mr. GROSVENOR rejoiced at the two first sections of the bill; he regretted that when the restrictive system which had been productive of so much injury, was about to be abandoned, they should keep any vestige of it. Unless there was some great necessity for the third section, it ought to be stricken out; he doubted the power of Congress to pass the third section. He wished not to be misunderstood on this point; that a nation had a right to prohibit their citizens from emigrating, he had no doubt; it was an attribute of sovereignty; but the question was, where did the power lie? Our Government was a complicated piece of machinery, the General Government had certain powers delegated to them by the Constitution and Congress could not go beyond those powers. He wished to know where the power was given in the Constitution to Congress, to prohibit native Americans, from leaving the country in neutral vessels—he believed the power resided in the States and it had not been delegated to Congress. He would be glad if gentlemen would point out that part of the Constitution which allowed Congress to prohibit the departure of any American in neutral vessels, unless he be guilty of some crime. He had very serious doubts on the subject, and the section ought not to be retained, unless some great practical good could be effected by it. He had great objections to make the United States a great prison, and he should be sorry to see this anomaly unless it would be productive of some great benefit. Would this section, he asked, keep the sailors here? It would not. If the sailors were prohibited from going to sea in neutral vessels, whenever they went out in American vessels they never would return. What was the object of the bill? To open our commerce for the benefit of the sailors—"for free trade and sailors' rights." This section would drive those sailors from the country. As to the idea about manning our public ships, he did not believe we had sailors enough for our frigates. When at the Eastward, last Summer, he had been informed by Captain Stewart, the commander of the Constitution, that the only difficulty in obtaining sailors was their repugnance to be sent to the Lakes. Believing there were doubts as to the Constitutional power of Congress to pass the third section, and that as no benefit could occur from retaining it, he should vote in favor of the motion for striking it out.

The question on striking out the third section of the bill was taken by yeas and nays. There were for striking out 70, against it 78, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bard, Baylies of Massachusetts, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brigham, Champion, Chappell, Cilley, Cooper, Cox, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davenport, Duval, Ely, Farrow, Forsyth, Gaston, Geddes, Grosvenor, Hale, Hawkins, Howell, Hungerford, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kennedy, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, King of North Carolina,

So the House refused to strike out the said section.

Mr. McKim, of Maryland, then moved to strike out the second section of the bill (which repeals the several non-importation acts.)

The question having been stated—

Mr. McKim, of Maryland, said, after the vote of yesterday on this amendment in Committee of the whole House, he rose under circumstances of peculiar discouragement to offer a few observations on the subject. The bill contains two distinct principles—one to repeal the restrictions on exports, the other to repeal the restrictions on imports. All the arguments I have heard in support of the bill, said Mr. McK., went exclusively to the first part of it—to the repeal of the restrictions on exports—and these arguments are perfectly intelligible to my mind. The embargo puts a total stop to our exports; it locks up the entire of our produce. A few loads of lime and lumber, to rebuild a village that has been destroyed by fire, cannot be brought from another district in the same State, nor even a vessel be removed that has been caught in our waters by the embargo, although exposed to the most imminent danger of being destroyed by the enemy. The embargo paralyzes the industry and exhausts the resources of the nation. I can readily perceive the force of the arguments; and I admit, that a measure operating so severely on our citizens, ought not to be continued without some imperious necessity, or that some corresponding benefit be derived, to reward them for the sacrifice. And, although the embargo is producing all the benefit I ever expected from it, yet, if the second section be stricken out of the bill, it is probable I could make up my mind to vote for the repeal of the measure.

The embargo prohibits all exports, but the non-importation laws are of a different character; they prohibit the importation of goods the growth or manufacture of the enemy only. Our ports are open to the admission of the produce and manufactures of all the world, except those of the enemy; and I have heard no reason, nor can see any reason, why they should be admitted. I would be glad to know what extraordinary necessity has pressed this measure on us at this time. Do we suffer for the want of clothing, or any other necessary or comfort of life? Can we not obtain from our own industry, and from friendly foreign nations, all that our wants require, and all that our ideas of comfort have rendered necessary? I can see no necessity for calling in the products of the enemy to our aid; and I feel unwilling to make the acknowledgment to the enemy that we cannot exist without his products.

Seeing no reason why this restriction should be removed, and believing that no solid reason can be adduced in support of the removal, I will advert to some of the evils that, in my opinion, will result from it. From the numerous restrictions imposed on our commerce by the enemy, and those imposed by our own Government, a large portion of our citizens have been forced to relinquish their usual avocations, and been obliged to seek new modes of employing their industry and capital, for the support of their families. From these causes, their attention has been turned to manufacturing. Much of the capital and industry of our citizens, usually employed in commerce, have from the operation of these causes, been forced into manufacturing establishments; and although, in my opinion, the duties now imposed on imports are abundantly sufficient, in the ordinary course of things, for the protection of the manufacturing interest of the country, yet I doubt whether they will be sufficient to support that interest against the shock that will be produced by letting in upon them, without restraint, a flood of European manufactures. The manufactures of Great Britain have been, to speak metaphorically, dammed up for several years; and if this accumulated mass of foreign goods be let loose on our infant establishments, with the superior skill and capital of the European manufacturer, I fear our manufacturing establishments will be much disturbed, if not overthrown. I do not believe the double duties will be sufficient to guard them against this shock, although I admit they are sufficient, and more than sufficient, in ordinary times, to enable them to hold a competition with the European manufacturer. If there were any pressing necessity, however, for the proposed repeal of the existing prohibition of British products, I might think it expedient to vote for it; but I would be glad to know what is the necessity that calls for this provision in the bill. Are we suffering, I repeat it again, for any necessary whatever, that calls for such a concession to the enemy? I believe not. I therefore consider it unwise to run the hazard that may result from the experiment. I admit, that if it be necessary to the safety or the prosperity of the nation to pass the provision which I have moved to strike out of the bill, the interest of the manufacturers, being a subordinate interest, must yield to the general good. But I must remark, that the manufacturing interest, although not the greatest, is still an important interest of the nation. By the returns made by the marshals in the year 1810, which, however imperfect, are the best data to which we can resort on the subject, it appears that the domestic manufactures of the United States amounted, in that year, to about two hundred millions of dollars. The exports from the United States, in domestic produce, in favorable years, we know, has not exceeded about sixty millions of dollars. It thence results, that the manufacturing interest of the country is greater in amount than the commercial interest, and is subordinate only to the agricultural interest of the nation.

It may be presumed, that the raw materials employed in producing the two hundred millions, in value, of manufactured goods made in the year 1810, were not increased in value, by the manufacturing process, more than 100 per cent.; consequently it will appear, that one hundred millions of dollars, in value, of the raw materials and produce of the country, were in that year worked up into manufactured goods, and have found a market at our own doors, free from spoliation of enemies, and from vexation of any kind.

If my view of the subject be correct, even in principle, it ought to induce the agricultural interest in the House and in the nation to reflect well on the expediency of any measure that may have a tendency to injure our growing establishments, from which they derive such important benefits, in the supply of their wants, and in furnishing a market at their doors for so large a portion of their produce.

These considerations induce me to believe, that an enlightened policy does not require the Government, at this time, to remove the restrictions on the importation of the manufactures of the enemy. I hope the motion will prevail, and the second section of the bill be stricken out.

Mr. CALHOUN, of South Carolina, said he hoped the motion would not prevail. He thought the gentleman was mistaken in supposing that our infant manufacturing institutions would be embarrassed by this measure. What was the encouragement which they now received from the Government? The ad valorem duties now averaged about 33½ per cent. Most of the importations being in neutral bottoms, the discriminating duty of 10 per cent. on such importations in foreign vessels, would make it 43 per cent.; and, when were added to this the freight, and other expenses incident to a state of war, the actual duty on foreign and premium to domestic manufactures could not be less than fifty per cent. Was it wise to extend to our manufactures further encouragement than this? During a state of war, too great a stimulus was naturally given to manufactures—a stimulus so great that it could not be expected to be continued in a time of peace; and when peace comes, come when peace will, the vicissitude which manufacturers must experience will be much greater and injurious to them, if besides the double duties the restrictive system were retained, than it ought to or would otherwise be. The great requisite to the due encouragement of manufactures now was, that certain manufactures in cottons and woollens, which have kindly taken root in our soil, should have a moderate but permanent protection insured to them. He knew not how that object could be better effected than by the scheme of establishing a new tariff of duties, which this House had shown a determination to adopt. To continue the present non-importation system merely to protect manufactures, when they received already so much protection, would be dangerous instead of beneficial to them. Another circumstance, than those he had adverted to, now operated to encourage manufactures—the heavy expenditure for the clothing of our Army. The Government could and did regulate those expenditures, as far as possible, for the encouragement of manufactures. Having replied to the main point of the gentleman's argument, he would not follow him through the whole of his remarks. As to her manufactures, Mr. C. said that all Europe was open to the enemy. The very circumstance of this demand for her manufactures, which destroyed the efficiency of our non-importation system, by enhancing their price in the British market, would furnish additional encouragement to our manufactures. Could it be expected, under the present circumstances of the world, that our non-importation, violated as it constantly was by smuggling and simulated papers, could produce much effect? He believed not. All the arguments he had yesterday urged, applied as forcibly to this provision of the bill as to that which contemplated a repeal of the embargo. He hoped all the provisions of the bill would be permitted to share the same fate.

Mr. McKIM said he had admitted, when up before, that the double duties would be abundantly sufficient encouragement to manufactures in ordinary times; but, whenever British manufactures were let in, he believed they would not only break down the manufacturers, but the importers also. He had seen times like that which he apprehended, at the close of the last war, when an inundation of British goods flowed in. Mr. M. said he wanted to hear some of the reasons explained why we should declare to the enemy that we cannot live without her manufactures. The double duties, he repeated, were a sufficient protection in general to manufactures; but, until our manufactures acquired greater strength, he did not wish to see them subjected to the pressure they would experience from a repeal of the non-importation.

Mr. CALHOUN said, that to the last part of the gentleman's argument, the answer was decisive. It was well known that there was nothing more difficult to execute than a non-importation law, as well by direct smuggling as by false papers. This hazard ought not to be encountered, unless there was a prospect of very powerful good to result from it. Mr. C. contended that no such prospect existed now. Whatever it might have been formerly, there was no chance of decisive effect from this system now—all Europe being open to British manufactures. Such, besides, was the difficulty of executing such a system, that the President had, at the present session, recommended the prohibition entirely of certain articles known to be produced in Great Britain—the smuggling of which was so difficult to be prevented, that it could not be done unless their importation was also prohibited from all other parts of the world.

Mr. POST, of New York, said he did not rise at this time to enter into the general argument on this subject, but merely to remark, in reply to the two gentlemen who had spoken, that they labored under a material mistake in regard to the manufacturing interest, and that much pains had been taken to diffuse through the public prints ideas of the same kind as those they appeared to entertain. He barely wished now to say, that it never would be to the interest of the manufacturers generally for Government to take them under its fostering care. It was our true policy, in regard to them, to have laws of such a character as not to be subject to fluctuation, and then let industry take its own course. That manufacture which required the protection of high bounties, was not worth the attention of the Government. The experience of years past would support this remark, during which time our manufactures had grown rapidly without the aid of the Government. It never ought to have been expected that Government would lay protecting duties. When the subject of the general tariff came before the House, this subject might be fully discussed; he merely threw out these general remarks, as they might tend in some degree to do away a mistake which appeared to pervade the nation in regard to our manufactures.

The question on striking out the second section of the bill was decided in the negative—yeas 34, nays 110, as follows:

ges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Taylor, Telfair, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, Wilson of Pennsylvania, and Winter.

So the House determined against the motion.

On motion of Mr. BRADBURY, of Massachusetts, a fourth section was added to the bill, providing that the President should cause the collectors throughout the United States to be furnished with blank passports for the purpose described in the third section, with a view to save time to individuals desiring to procure the same.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, then moved to strike out the first section of the bill, which contemplates a repeal of the embargo. Being opposed to every part of this bill, he wished to record his vote against every section of it.

The question on this motion was taken without debate and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bard, Barnett, Caldwell, Clopton, Denoyelles, Desha, Earle, Franklin, Hall, Hawkins, Johnson of Kentucky, Lyle, Macon, Nelson, Newton, Ormsby, Parker, Roane, Strong, Troup, Whitehill, and Yancey—22.

So the House refused to strike out the said first section of the bill.

The question was then stated on engrossing the bill for a third reading.

A debate of considerable length now took place, an abstract of which, mainly, can only be given of the ground occupied by the respective speakers.

Mr. POTTER, of Rhode Island, said, as he represented a commercial and manufacturing State, and intended to vote against the bill under consideration, he felt it his duty to assign his reasons for so doing. He said if the motion made by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. McKIM,) to strike out the second section of the bill, containing the repeal of the non-importation act, had prevailed he should vote for the residue of the bill, although he considered the embargo of very little importance to this country in any other view than as it respected the coasting trade; he said it was the British blockade and the war, and not the embargo, from whence most of our difficulties originated. The embargo was recommended by the President with a view to get rid of the blockade, by compelling the British ships to leave our coast. But, Mr. P. said, if there were any reasons to put it on last Winter, there were now ten times as many to continue it. It had been on a little more than three months, and now it was to be abandoned upon very short notice. Why it was put on, or why taken off, we are left to conjecture. When it was put on, the British ships must have had plenty of provisions to last them until this time; it relieved their ships from very dangerous positions on their blockading stations during the inclement season of the year, and permitted them to retire into our bays and rivers to spend the Winter in safety and ease, while our vessels were safely locked up by the embargo.

Mr. P. said the only time that our vessels could have stood much chance to get to sea was in long dark nights, and stormy tempestuous weather, when the British ships were compelled to leave their stations; and now when the wintery storms are past, and the weather mild and pleasant; when the British ships can take their stations with ease and safety to themselves; when their provisions are exhausted, and a large fleet and army on our coast; when our vessels are completely and effectually blockaded, and the whole nation imprisoned within their territory, unless by the consent of the English, we are to take this embargo off, when it will be of great advantage to them, and very little to us, unless we had the power to remove the blockade, as we cannot go from one State to another, unless by their permission.

Mr. P. said, though not in the majority, he could but feel an interest in the character of the nation. What would the people think of such instability in the Government? When the British blockade, we lay an embargo; when they refuse to grant licenses, we make it penal to receive them; when they refuse to ransom any more of our vessels, we refuse to be ransomed. One day we talk of a National Bank, the next about taxes. We are continually changing from one expedient to another, like a man in pain, changing from one side of his bed to another for relief, without removing the pain; and it will be so with us, until we get rid of the ruinous war in which we are engaged. We are one day for continuing the restrictive system, and in a few days it is to be taken off by almost an unanimous vote. The supporters of the Administration in the several States have a very hard time to follow their leaders. By the time expresses are sent to the distant parts of the United States to notify the people that an embargo is laid, and the bustle and speculation that it occasions has a little subsided, and the friends of the Administration have exercised all their ingenuity to reconcile themselves to it, and have satisfied some who have doubts as to the propriety of the measure, and the Democratic newspapers begin to be a little uniform in their reasons why it was put on, they are again surprised with information that their favorite measure is abandoned. Their ingenuity is again taxed and put to trial to find reasons for such a sudden change, and in this respect their task is very hard, as they are not furnished with the reasons that may influence the Administration; and no change in the state of things to them known would warrant such versatility. Mr. P. said he was looking over a Kentucky paper a few days past, and he saw mentioned an extract of a letter from this place, saying, that the embargo was worth thirty frigates; now, the same person would have to appease them by saying, that its repeal will be worth thirty more. Mr. P. said he considered the embargo of but little importance, in the present situation of our affairs, as long as the war and blockade lasted. His objection was to the repeal of the non-importation act, the suspension of which he opposed on a former occasion, when recommended by Mr. Gallatin for the same purpose for which it is now to be repealed; at which time a majority of that House was found to reject it; but we are now told by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) if the whole restrictive system had expired, that there was not ten men in that House that would vote to revive it; or, if it never had been put on, that would now vote for it. Mr. P. said he could answer for no person but himself; but he said he believed if this war had been considered expedient by the nation generally, and the gentlemen on one side had not been so long opposed and prejudiced against this system, from its having been put on, in the first place, when the nation was at peace and its commerce flourishing, and the other side operated upon with a view to obtain revenue to continue this war, having the terrors of taxation always in view, that ten men would not be found in that House, but for the above reasons, that would vote to repeal the non-importation act under the present situation and circumstances of the country.

Mr. P. said, that in examining the President's Message of last Summer, he found his reasoning so well adapted at this time against the repeal of the non-importation act, that he should take the liberty to read it, in the following words, to wit: "There being sufficient ground to infer that it is the purpose of the enemy to combine with the blockade of our ports special licenses to neutral vessels, or to British vessels in neutral disguises, whereby they may draw from our country the precise kind and quantity of exports essential to their wants, whilst its general commerce remains obstructed, keeping in view also the insidious discrimination between different ports of the United States; and as such a system, if not counteracted, will have the effect of diminishing very materially the pressure of the war on the enemy, and encouraging a perseverance in it, at the same time that it will leave the general commerce of the United States under all the ‘pressure the enemy can impose, thus subjecting the whole to British regulation, in subservency to monopoly.’ For the above reasons the President recommended an embargo, removable when the British blockade should cease. How much more forcibly does the above reasons apply against repealing the restrictive system generally, as the embargo only prevented exports, when this bill permits exports and imports, while the blockade is not only continued, but is to be more rigorously enforced; and more than all, the consequences so well described by the President is to follow! But, Mr. P. said, as we could not disturb them much by restrictions and opposition, we were now to try another experiment to appease them—by submission, and by sacrificing our interest to theirs. But the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) says that great changes had taken place in Europe, and that nations, like individuals, must conform to circumstances. What a great pity it is that gentlemen had not made that discovery before; it would have saved much blood and treasure to the United States. The gentleman says he was always in favor of the war and against restrictions, and but for the war we should have lost all our European and carrying trade, and our East and West India trade. Mr. P. said he would be glad to be informed what had become of it all; was it not all destroyed, and even our coasting trade with it? And if we had prudently conformed to circumstances before the war, of choice, we could have enjoyed all the commerce the gentleman has so well described; but by having taken the honorable stand so frequently mentioned in this war, and by conforming to circumstances by compulsion, we now lose the whole trade of our country, and cannot enjoy any of the neutral trade the gentleman thinks so important to us, unless by the consent of the English, any more than if they were permitted to establish their custom-houses within our territory. But if this system is now to be given up to enjoy the trade of neutrals only, why are British manufactures admitted? We have been told that by excluding them we distressed that class of people in England, and encouraged ours in this country; it cannot be that we are now to admit them to appease and enrich them, and to ruin and destroy ours, but such was the inevitable effect; they certainly deserve a better fate. But the same gentleman says this war yet operates very hard upon the English, that it costs them much more than it does us; if it costs her more she is able to pay more. But Mr. P. said the expenses of this Government exceeded all others, considering what they had done for their money. He said he had heard of the debt of Great Britain ever since he could remember anything, and that they could not exist under it. Notwithstanding all those predictions, what was their situation at present? an undivided control of the seas, and as a nation, compared with all others, more elevated than at any former period. Let us now examine the situation of this country. Before we entered into this honorable warfare we enjoyed a lucrative commerce, while other nations were at war;

we were then as a nation too proud to permit one of our citizens when abroad to accept of a British license to protect him, it was considered a crime; we then enjoyed much of the carrying trade; our canvass whitened every sea; we had the privilege of doing our own business; the nation derived an immense revenue, and individuals great profit. What will be our situation, after being in war short of two years, if this bill passes, and the war continues? He said he considered it a death blow to the shipping interest of this country, and the commencement of the certain destruction of the manufacturing interest. You give all our commerce to the English; it will be carried on with their money, in their ships under neutral flags; we must purchase her manufactures of her at her own price, and she can obtain the raw material from the Southern States, and take it to Great Britain and manufacture it, and bring it back to this country and sell it cheaper than we can get it to the Eastern States and back again; she can take it by water without trouble; we must take it by land, or run immense risk. In that country labor is very cheap; in this it is increased by the war. By this bill you give to Great Britain advantages in war that she would not enjoy in times of peace, while we suffer all the evils of war. Our ships are rotting, and useless; they can neither be used by their present owners, or sold to neutrals. You remove from Great Britain every inducement to make peace with us; she takes the raw material from the South in her ships, in disguise, and in the same manner furnishes them with her goods in return. This furnishes the Southern States with a good market for their produce, and with such goods as they want in return, and in this manner they are entirely relieved from the pressure of the war, as it is a matter of little consequence to them in whose ships their produce is taken to market, or who manufactures for them, provided they can sell dear and buy cheap.

Mr. P. said, that if this bill passes, and war should continue for any great length of time, the consequence would be, that Great Britain would, in her ships, take all the heavy articles out of this country in a very little time that she wanted, and fill this country with her manufactures. The balance of trade will be very much against us; the consequence will be, she will soon get away all our money. Make as many laws, with as many and as severe penalties as you please to prohibit it, money is like water, it will find its level, it will go where it is worth most, and you can as well confine the one as the other; and when peace takes place, if our vessels shall be worth repairing, they will have very little to do. We are giving to Great Britain more than the most extravagant man in that nation would have thought of asking. Mr. P. said, however humiliating it must be to us as a nation, that we had sent five of our most distinguished citizens, in the opinion of the President, to treat with one Englishman, on a subject already exhausted, and on which very little more can be said or written, and with which almost every man in this nation is acquainted, yet, Mr. P. said, he believed if the President would now send another, with power to offer to the British Government the state of things growing out of this bill for fifteen years, that they would settle an annuity upon us of five millions of dollars. This bill gives them all our commerce—a market for their manufactures—a trading war, with the privilege of quartering upon us. And for what purpose is this sacrifice to be made? We can do without British goods during the war. When a nation is in war and difficulty they ought to be prudent and economical; they ought to sell all they can do without, and do with as little as possible; they cannot buy anything sufficiently cheap that they do not want.

Repeal of the Embargo.

Mr. P. said it was impossible for him to comprehend this sudden change in our affairs. We are now, in addition to all the disadvantages on our part, and advantages to the English, to humble ourselves to them, and ask forgiveness for the past, and promise to do better in future; and although we made this war for commerce and sailors' rights, we give them up our commerce, while the most of our sailors are confined in their prison ships; our ports, bays and rivers are blockaded; the nation imprisoned within its own territory, and we in the Capitol, in the centre of the nation, threatened and disturbed; and we are to ask them, under the smoke of their guns, if they will be graciously pleased to take from us our produce, and let us have in return some of her manufactures, in such manner and at such prices as she in her tender mercy may see fit. And for what purpose do we thus humiliate ourselves to them, and make this sacrifice? It is to purchase goods of them that we do not want, and can do very well without, in order to raise a revenue from the people in an indirect way.

Mr. P. said, the average duties on British goods, when imported in our own ships, was about 22½ per cent.; to which add 10 per cent. on the amount of that duty, if imported in foreign vessels, will make it a little short of 36 per cent.; so that, in order to raise eighteen millions of dollars (a little more than one year's revenue before the first embargo) for the use of Government, the people will have to pay the British nation fifty millions of dollars for their manufactures, with about 15 per cent. for freight and commission, making seven and a half millions more; making in the whole, about seventy-five millions, which our people have to pay for British manufactures, to enable the Government to get eighteen millions out of them by indirect taxation. This operates as an indirect tax upon the whole manufacturing and shipping interest of this country, and serves to enrich the English nation, in the same proportion as it serves to unite the two great manufacturing and shipping interests of that nation. And for what was this sacrifice made, but from an apprehension that it will not do to tax the people, for fear they may make some scrutiny into the extravagance and wastefulness of the Government. Mr. P. said he was at a loss to know what answer would be given by gentlemen, when they returned home, and were asked why an embargo was put on last Winter—and why it was taken off in the Spring? They would be told that the President recommended both measures. But when they should be asked why they repealed the non-importation act, destroying our navigation and agreeing to receive British manufactures, to the destruction of our own, that they had pretended to encourage?—this will be a little more difficult to answer. But if honest, as I presume they will be, in answering the question, they will say that our expenses had been enormous, our money almost exhausted, and our credit much impaired, and we were apprehensive if we taxed the people any more they would not like it; and if anything near our wants, they could not pay it; and that they had adopted this measure to get money at some future period, in hopes that it will give us credit to borrow for the present, rather than disturb you by taxes. They will be told by the people that they had done them manifest injustice; they did not merit such treatment from them; they had supported them at the elections, and had done and paid everything that had been required of them, without murmuring or complaining—and that they had no right to expect but they would support them in everything necessary to prosecute the war to its termination, without depending upon the will and pleasure of the enemy, for the means to carry it on. Mr. P. said, if we consider this bill, as it is really intended, to aid our revenue, what is its effects? It will take six months to get goods from England, the duties on them payable in eight, ten, and twelve months; so that it will be fourteen months before the first bonds for duties will be payable. Mr. P. said, to those gentlemen who view this as a financial measure, and who have been the means of placing this country in its present situation, he would ask them if they were willing to return home, and depend entirely upon the magnanimity of the enemy for the means of maintaining public credit, supporting the Government, and carrying on the war? This, bill, with no other dependence, puts it entirely in their power, as soon as they see that we depend upon the introduction of her manufactures to raise a revenue for the purpose of carrying on the war, to prevent their introduction, and those of all other nations, by a vigorous blockade; and we are disappointed in all our expectations from that source. Mr. P. said, if they permitted importation, and continued the war, it was ruin to the best interests of this country. Mr. P. said, that we now began to discover what many nations had experienced before us—that we could not contend with the British naval power, and we may as well conform to circumstances, in that respect, first as last. Mr. P. said, it seemed as though we had just found out that it was necessary, not only to have fleets and armies to carry on war, but that money was of some importance; and it seemed to be difficult to procure the sum wanted. Mr. P. said we had everything to lose and nothing to gain by this war, and nothing but peace would relieve us, which he hoped would soon take place, when we may be permitted to sail in our own ships and carry our own produce to market, and bring back what we may want in return, and otherwise manage our own affairs in our own way. Mr. P. said he was aware that many people might suppose he was interested in manufactures, but he was not, nor did he wish the double duties extended; he wished them, and the non-importation act, to expire with the war.

Mr. P. said, as he took the liberty to oppose and find fault with this measure, he would point out what, in his opinion, would be a better course for the Administration to pursue, to answer the purposes they seemed to have in view; but he supposed they would much rather have his opposition than his advice. Mr. P. said, before he would pass this bill, and let it follow our Commissioners to Gottenburg, giving up everything we had supposed would have had any operation upon the English nation, and even more than she would think of asking, if he wished not only to support the honor and interest of the nation, but even the present party in power, and to enable them to make an honorable peace, or to continue the war, he would immediately lay taxes and postpone the collection of them until the next meeting of Congress, and pledge them to pay the interest of the money that should be borrowed this year, provided the war continued; he would then borrow all the money wanted for the service of this year; he would then make a sincere exertion to make an honorable peace, and in such manner as, if it failed, he should be able to demonstrate to the people that we had done everything that ought to be required of us to put an end to this ruinous war. If we should have peace the taxes would not be wanted, the collection of them could be suspended, and the laws repealed; but if we were obliged to continue the war, we should have the money to carry it on, and the people would thus pay their taxes cheerfully to support the honor and credit of the country; and those who have money, under such a state of things, would loan it to the Government.

Mr. P. said he knew very well, as his constituents were a navigating and manufacturing people, at first view the Message of the President would seem to favor their interest, and it would have been gratifying to him if he could have so considered it. To those concerned in navigation the repeal of the non-importation act was held out, the repeal of which would be of very little advantage to them, unless we could have peace with it; which would then, and not until then, put it in the power of those concerned in commerce, by their enterprise and industry, again to use their own capital and ships to transact their own business, and in that way to enrich themselves and the nation, by employing our own people to transact our own business, rather than to enrich foreigners, while our own are suffering for the want of their usual business. To those concerned in manufactures, the extension of double duties are held out; they never were put on to aid them, nor would they ever be extended for their benefit; it would only deceive them—it is not intended.

Mr. P. said, when he saw his friends nearly all in favor of this bill, and but a small minority opposed to it, he was almost led to doubt the correctness of his vote; but he said he had made up his mind, from the best consideration he had been able to give the subject, and that he could not bring his mind to vote for a measure, in his opinion, so destructive to the best interests of his country, so humiliating to us as a nation, and so submissive and gratifying to Great Britain. Mr. P. said, if this was the last vote he should ever give, and that he should be alone in it, he should have the consolation of having acted according to the best of his judgment, and in the full belief that the more this subject was examined, if the war continued, the more the majority would doubt the correctness of the vote they had given on this subject.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, briefly replied to Mr. POTTER, in a strain of good humored retort.

Mr. CLOPTON, of Virginia, in a decided and impressive manner, deriving additional interest from the debility with which a tedious illness has afflicted him, and under which he yet labors, vehemently opposed the bill, contending that to pass it would be to react the farce, as he termed it, of the repeal of the first embargo; that it would protract the war forty years, and degrade the character of the nation for firmness, energy, and consistency.

Mr. SHEPHERD, of New York, supported the bill on the ground of his general detestation of the restrictive system; and congratulating the House and the nation on the effect which he hoped this measure would have to blunt the asperities of party, and unite the country, &c.

When Mr. S. concluded—

The question on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time, was decided in the affirmative—yeas 115, nays 38, as follows:

Ingham, Johnson of Kentucky, Lyle, Macon, McKim, McLean, Moore, Murfree, Nelson, Newton, Ormsby, Parker, Potter, William Reed, Roane, Strong, Tannehill, Troup, Whitehill, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wood, and Yancey.

So the bill was passed to a third reading.

On the question when it should be read a third time, some conversation took place. Mr. CALHOUN advocated this day, and Messrs. NEWTON and WRIGHT, to-morrow.

The House determined it should be read a third time to-day.

The engrossed bill was then accordingly read a third time, and the question stated, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. HALL, of Georgia, stated the reasons why he should vote against the bill. He believed its real object to be, notwithstanding what was avowed, to raise money for the service of the Government. He did not think this would be a proper or beneficial mode of doing it; and such was the system now pursued, that nothing but the interposition of Providence in producing a speedy peace could save the nation from disgrace.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, stated the reasons why he should vote in favor of the bill, which were substantially the same as those assigned by Mr. CALHOUN yesterday, viz: the late change in those circumstances which rendered the restrictive system an efficient weapon of war. He hoped the time now approached when, as in the days of the Revolution, all parties would rally round the standard of the country, and support the Government in the prosecution of the war.

A motion was then made to adjourn, and negatived.

Mr. NEWTON next took the floor, and in a neat and forcible speech of half an hour, spread before the House the reasons, founded on the utility of the restrictive system as a war measure, and the necessity of stability in the measures of Government, which induced him to vote against the bill. The causes which produced the embargo he conceived to operate imperiously at this moment, when the campaign in the North was about opening, and our supplies, which would certainly fall into the hands of the enemy, would be more useful to him than at any moment.

When Mr. NEWTON concluded, the question on the passage of the bill was decided as follows:

Ordered, That the title be, "An act to repeal an act, entitled 'An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States,' and so much of any acts as prohibit the importation of goods, wares, and merchandise, of the growth, produce, or manufacture, of Great Britain or Ireland, or of any of the colonies or dependencies, or of any place or country in the actual possession of Great Britain, and for other purposes."

FRIDAY, April 8.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the committee appointed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a National Bank, were discharged from the further consideration of that subject.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill "for the final adjustment of land titles in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri," were read, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, the Commissioner of the General Land Office was required to procure, for the use of the Committee on the Public Lands, all such maps, plats, and surveys, as, in his opinion, may aid the said committee in the discharge of their duties.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill fixing the time for the next meeting of Congress.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON's motion to amend the bill by substituting the first Monday of November for the third Monday in October, being still under consideration, he modified said motion so as to substitute the last Monday of October thereof.

The amendment was accepted by the House, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill "to define more explicitly the duties of the Judges of the General Court of the Territory of Illinois and Indiana;" and the amendments reported by the Judiciary Committee thereto were disagreed to.

The question was then taken that the bill be engrossed and read a third time, and after considerable debate, in which Mr. JENNINGS supported and Mr. EPES principally opposed the bill, it was decided in the negative; so the bill was rejected.

On motion of Mr. PLEASANTS, of Virginia, the Speaker of this House was instructed to inform the Executive of Virginia of the death of JOHN DAWSON, one of the Representatives of said State.

The House took up the resolution submitted by Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, the day before yesterday, viz: "That no amendment by way of rider be hereafter received to a bill on its third reading;" and, after some explanations from Mr. W. on the ground of uniformity in the proceedings of the House, the motion was agreed to by a large majority.

The engrossed bill for the relief of J. P. Williamson and Thomas Rice; and the engrossed bill for the relief of B. W. Crowninshield, were read a third time and passed.

The engrossed bill to amend the act entitled "An act for ascertaining titles to lands in that part of Louisiana which lies east of the Mississippi and Island of New Orleans;" and the engrossed bill supplementary to an act "to provide for the widows and orphans of militia disabled in the service of the United States," were also read a third time and passed.

The bill for the relief of John Cahoon and others, was read a third time and passed; as also was the bill for the relief of Lewis Cutler.

The engrossed bill to provide for the collection, preservation and exhibition of such standards as have been or may hereafter be taken by the Army and Navy of the United States from their enemies, was read a third time and passed.

The engrossed bill fixing the time for the next meeting of Congress (last Monday in October next) was read a third time and passed.

The bill extending relief to certain purchasers of public lands in the Mississippi Territory, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to authorize the subdivision of the lands of the United States passed through a committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the more effective protection of the Northwestern frontier, by granting donations of land to actual settlers, passed through a Committee of the Whole, where it was amended and reported to the House. But the House refused to proceed to consider the report.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "to incorporate a company for the purpose of supplying Georgetown with water;" also, a bill "authorizing the appointment of certain officers for the flotilla service;" in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

CONTROVERSIES BETWEEN STATES.

The order of the day on the bill to prescribe the mode of prosecuting and deciding controversies between two or more States, being called up by Mr. DESHA of Kentucky,

Mr. GHOLSON, of Virginia, moved that the order of the day be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MONTGOMERY, of Kentucky, opposed the postponement, and read the memorial of the Legislature of Kentucky, requesting that such a law may be passed.

A warm debate took place thereon, which occupied the House till 4 o'clock; in the course of which the motion for postponement was supported by Mr. GHOLSON, Mr. HUMPHREYS, Mr. GRUNDY, Mr. RHEA of Tennessee, Mr. ALSTON of North Carolina, and Mr. WRIGHT of Md.—and warmly opposed by Mr. HAWKINS, Mr. MONTGOMERY, Mr. DESHA, and Mr. SHARP of Kentucky, and by Mr. JACKSON of Virginia, and Mr. FARROW of South Carolina.

It appeared, in the course of this debate, that the necessity which had produced the memorial of Kentucky, and, in consequence thereof, the introduction of the bill before the House, arose from the existence of a controversy between the States of Kentucky and Tennessee, in relation to the boundary line, which dispute had commenced between the mother States of Virginia and North Carolina before the birth of the two first named States, and which it appears the two States cannot accommodate; but, on the contrary, a settlement of which becomes every day less practicable, from the lapse of time, irritation by repeated collision, and the increased value of the land which is in dispute, having been granted to different individuals at the same time by both States.

The discussion was not confined to the abstract expediency of legislating on the subject of the bill, but more or less connected itself with the merit of the conflicting claims of Tennessee and Kentucky to the land, the titles to which are jeopardized and unsettled in consequence of this dispute. An opinion was expressed by the members of Tennessee that the question may be amicably settled, without the intervention of such a law.

On the question there were for indefinite postponement 56, against it 27.

A quorum not being present, of course the question could not be decided on. And the House adjourned.

— SATURDAY, April 9.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported the agreement of that committee to the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "for the final adjustment of land titles in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri." The amendments were concurred in by the House.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to amend the act laying duties on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. EPPES, also, reported a bill for the relief of George Hamilton, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

On motion of Mr. EPPES, the Committee of Ways and Means were discharged from the further consideration of the several petitions which have been presented to this House, during the present session, and referred to them, from sundry inhabitants of the States of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New York, who are non-resident proprietors of land and houses in the State of Ohio; and the said petitions were laid on the table.

Mr. FISH, of New York, from the select committee appointed to inquire into the manner of making contracts for supplying the Army of the United States, and to what extent general officers have interfered in such contracts prejudicial to the public interest, and to rights of individuals, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Comptroller of the Treasury, accompanied with sundry statements prepared in obedience to an act establishing a Mint and regulating the coins of the United States; which were ordered to lie on the table.

The bill from the Senate, "authorizing the appointment of certain officers for the flotilla service," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The bill from the Senate, "to incorporate a company for the purpose of supplying Georgetown with water," was read twice, and ordered to be read the third time on Monday next.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendment of the Senate, to the bill "declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, therein mentioned;" and the said amendment being again read, was disagreed to by the House.

An engrossed bill to extend relief to certain purchasers of public lands in the Mississippi Territory was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill to authorize the subdivision of the quarter sections of the lands of the United States, was read the third time, and passed.

The resolution for making an allowance to the person employed to superintend the post office of this House, was again taken up; and two dollars per day having been fixed upon as the compensation, the resolution was agreed to.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, viz: the bill prescribing the mode of commencing and prosecuting and deciding controversies between two or more States; and Mr. HUMPHREYS, of Tennessee, having withdrawn his motion to postpone the further consideration thereof indefinitely, the question was taken for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the said bill, and decided in the negative.

The bill authorizing the Secretary of State, during the continuance of the present war, to make an additional allowance to the owners and masters of vessels for bringing back to the United States destitute and distressed American seamen, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of Augustus McKinney and Laysel Bancroft, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and, after being amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of Arthur Tappan, John Frothingham, and Ithamar Eaton, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and, after an unsuccessful motion by Mr. EPPES to postpone the same indefinitely, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senat insist on their amendment to the bill "declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, therein mentioned," and ask a conference on the subject-matter of the said amendment. The Senate have concurred in the resolution sent from this House, to fix the time for the adjournment of the present session of Congress, with amendments. The Senate have passed a bill "fixing the salary of the Paymaster of the Army of the United States, and allowing a sum for the employment of additional clerks in his office, for the year 1814, and providing for the appointment of assistant district paymasters;" in which bill and amendments they ask the concurrence of this House.

The House spent some time in Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of Thomas Cutts, which excited much debate, on account of the principle involved in it. And the Committee having risen without deciding on it, the report was, on motion of Mr. SEYBERT, recommitted to the Committee of Claims.

The House took up the message from the Senate announcing their agreement to adjourn on Monday the 18th instant.

Mr. GHOLSON, of Virginia, moved to substitute the 14th for the 18th instant, which motion was negative.

And the decision of the Senate in this respect was concurred in.

REVISION OF THE REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. McKIM presented a petition of sundry manufacturers in the city and neighborhood of Baltimore, praying that the revenue laws may be amended so as to ascertain, with greater certainty, the amount of duties payable on importations of goods; and, that the importation of cotton goods, from ports beyond the Cape of Good Hope, may be prohibited.

The petition is as follows:

To the honorable, the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, your petitioners, manufacturers of the city and neighborhood of Baltimore, and others, who feel interested in the promotion of domestic manufactures, respectfully represent:

That they have long understood, it is the opinion of many merchants engaged in the importation of foreign manufactured merchandise, that the mode at present used to ascertain the duties thereon is, in many respects, very defective, not calculated either to protect the interests of the United States in a full receipt of revenue, or the honest importer from the practices of the fraudulent one, and that some amendment to the present collection law is absolutely necessary. They are now under the impression, that a law will soon be passed, which will have the effect to produce an entire change in the usual manner of introducing such manufactures, at least those which are of British origin, through the medium of neutrals, and, therefore, it is more desirable than ever, that such an amendment should be made without delay, because, if this law should pass, an immense importation of goods will no doubt take place in the course of a few weeks, and if the proposed amendment to the collection law should not be made previous thereto, the United States will no doubt suffer a great loss of revenue, and an injury proportional thereto will be done to domestic manufactures. It is of little moment to the importer what is the rate of duty which he has to pay, because he always calculates on its reimbursement; but it is of vital importance to him, and to the security of the revenue, that the same duty is paid on the same kind and quality of goods by every importer in the United States. To endeavor to obtain such an amendment to the present collection law as will have this effect, is the principal object of this petition, and your petitioners are the more solicitous for it from a full belief, that while it will protect the interests of the fair trader, and increase the revenue, it will also support the manufactories already established in the United States and forward and encourage the erection of many others now in contemplation.

Your petitioners further represent, that they believe a prohibition of the importation of cotton goods the manufacture of countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope, would very materially tend to benefit the agricultural interest of the country, by creating a constant and steady demand for raw cotton, and that, while it would encourage the manufacture of coarse cotton fabrics, it would serve as an important check to the exportation of specie.

Your petitioners therefore pray that an act or acts may be passed for the purposes stated, or that such other relief may be granted in the premises as to both Houses of Congress may appear to be right, and your petitioners, as in duty bound, shall ever pray, &c.

Signed by the subscribers, a committee appointed for this purpose, at a meeting held at the Merchants' Coffee House, in Baltimore, the 6th day of April, 1814.

The petition was referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

MONDAY, April 11.

The bill from the Senate, "fixing the salary of the Paymaster of the Army of the United States, and allowing a sum for the employment of additional clerks in his office, for the year 1814, and providing for the appointment of assistant district paymasters," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The House proceeded to consider the message from the Senate, asking a conference upon the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the bill "declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, therein mentioned." Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House do agree to the conference asked by the Senate, and that Mr. GRUNDY, Mr. EPPES, and Mr. TELFAIR, be the managers at the same on their part.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of raising the floor and completing the House of Representatives' Chamber for the accommodation and health of the members. Mr. WRIGHT, Mr. SHEPHERY, Mr. PITKIN, Mr. FORSYTH, and Mr. SHARP, were appointed the committee.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill "authorizing the payment for property captured or destroyed whilst in the public service by the enemy of the United States;" and the bill was, on motion of Mr. FISK, of New York, recommitted to a Committee of the whole House.

The engrossed bill for the relief of Augustus McKinney and Laysel Bancroft, and the engrossed bill, "authorizing the Secretary of State, during the present war, to make an additional allowance to the owners and masters of vessels for bringing back to the United States destitute and distressed American seamen," were each read a third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate "to incorporate a company for the purpose of supplying Georgetown with water" was read three times, slightly amended, and finally passed.

The bill authorizing the President of the United States to cause certain parts of the coast of the United States to be surveyed, passed through a Committee of the Whole, was amended, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill "granting pensions to officers and seamen serving on board of revenue cutters in certain cases," was passed through a Committee of the whole House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for quieting and adjusting claims to lands in the Mississippi Territory, passed through a Committee of the Whole, was amended, and then, on motion of Mr. McCoy, of Virginia, the further consideration of the bill was postponed indefinitely.

The bill concerning certificates of claims to lands in the State of Louisiana, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, April 12.

Mr. MURFREE, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, reported a bill to revive and continue in force an act declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the State of Georgia passed on the 12th day of December, 1804, establishing the fees of the harbor master and health officer of the ports of Savannah and St. Mary's in Georgia.—Twice read and committed.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported the bill from the Senate, "authorizing an augmentation of the marine corps, and for other purposes," without amendment; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. LOWNDES also reported the bill from the Senate "authorizing the appointment of certain officers for the flotilla service;" and the bill was committed to the Committee of the whole House last mentioned.

Mr. LOWNDES also reported a bill authorizing the purchase of the vessels captured on Lake Erie; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole last mentioned.

Mr. TROUP, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the bill from the Senate "fixing the salary of the Paymaster of the Army of the United States, and allowing a sum for the employment of additional clerks in his office, for the year 1814, and providing for the appointment of additional district paymasters," without amendment.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the managers appointed by this House, to confer with the managers appointed by the Senate, on the subject-matter of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill "declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, therein mentioned," made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

An engrossed bill authorizing the President of the United States to cause certain parts of the coast of the United States to be surveyed was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill granting pensions to officers and seamen serving on board of revenue cutters, in certain cases, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill concerning certificates of confirmation of claims to lands in the State of Louisiana was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McKIM, the order of the day on the bill authorizing the President of the United States, during the continuance of the present embargo, to allow the transportation, by water, of lime from Thomastown and Hampden, in the District of Maine, to Portsmouth, in New Hampshire, was postponed indefinitely.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to authorize the President of the United States to accept the service of such volunteers as shall organize themselves for the public service.

Mr. TROUP explained the object of the bill, which appears to have been predicated on a letter from the Secretary of War, suggesting the propriety of giving such an authority to the Government, in consequence of certain offers of service made by corps of this description from more than one section of the country. No objection being made to the bill, the Committee rose and reported the bill; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, called up the bill for making good the land promised by Virginia in the Revolutionary war, which the House refused to take up by the following vote: For taking it up 42, against it 52.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of David Porter, officers, and crew, (for seizing and prosecuting, at his own cost and risk, certain vessels, smugglers or pirates, at New Orleans, some years ago,) was called up by Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read a third time, and finally passed.

The bill authorizing two lotteries in Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, having been called up by Mr. LEWIS, the House refused to take it up. The Committee of the Whole were then discharged from the further consideration of the bill, which is now immediately before the House.

The House, on motion of Mr. McKIM, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to continue in force an act declaring the assent of Congress to two acts of the Legislatures of Georgia and Maryland. [These acts, to which the assent of Congress is proposed to be renewed, impose certain port duties on tonnage, applicable to the improvement of ports in said States.]

To this bill considerable opposition was made by Mr. DAVENPORT and Mr. TALLMADGE, of Connecticut, and Mr. REED and Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, to which Messrs. McKIM and WRIGHT, of Maryland, and TROUP, CUTHBERT, and HALL, of Georgia, replied. The bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow, by the following vote: For the bill 56, against it 44.

The bill for the relief of Archibald McCall (on motion of Mr. SEYBERT, of Pennsylvania,) passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. CHAPPELL, of South Carolina, the bill for the relief of Joseph Brevard passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be read a third time, and was accordingly read a third time, and finally passed.

On motion of Mr. FISK, of Vermont, the bill to fix the compensation of the clerks in the office of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was reported to the House. On the question that the bill be read a third time, there were for the third reading 38, against it 43.

A quorum not having voted on the first count, before the second count was had, a motion was made by Mr. FISK, of Vermont, to lay the bill on the table, and agreed to.

The bill to incorporate the Columbian Manufacturing Company of the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "to repeal the act, entitled 'An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and so much of any act or acts as prohibit the importation of goods, wares, and merchandise, of the growth, produce, or manufacture, of Great Britain or Ireland, or of any of the colonies or dependencies thereof, or of any place or country in the actual possession of Great Britain, and for other purposes," with amendments; in which they request the concurrence of this House. The Senate have so far receded from their amendment to the bill "declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, therein mentioned," as to accept of the modification proposed by the committee of conference, and they have modified the bill accordingly. The Senate have also passed a bill "for the relief of Israel Thorndike;" in which bill they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the message from the Senate, informing this House of their agreement to the modification proposed by the joint committee of conference, on the subject-matter of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses to the bill "declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, therein mentioned;" and the report of the same being read: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House do so far recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the said bill as to accept of the modification proposed by the joint committee of conference.

The bill from the Senate "for the relief of Israel Thorndike," was read twice, and committed to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

EXCISE ON LIQUORS.

The bill to change the tax on domestic distilled liquors from the capacity of the still to the quantity distilled, having been called up, a motion was made by Mr. ALSTON, of North Carolina, in pursuance of a decision of the Committee of Ways and Means subsequent to the bill's being reported, to postpone the further consideration of this order of the day indefinitely; which motion was supported by the mover, Mr. GRUNDY and Mr. HUMPHREYS, of Tennessee, Mr. CREIGHTON, of Ohio, and Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, principally on the ground of the lateness of the session, and the propriety of ascertaining more accurately the operation of the present system before it should be changed; and was opposed by Mr. McKIM, of Maryland.

The question on indefinite postponement was decided in the affirmative by the following vote by yeas and nays. For the postponement 61, against it 59, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Bard, Beall, Bowen, Brown, Butler, Caperton, Calhoun, Chappell, Clark, Clopton, Condict, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Culpeper, Davis of Pennsylvania, Desha, Duvall, Findley, Gaston, Geddes, Griffin, Grundy, Hanson, Hawes, Hawkins, Humphreys, Ingersoll, Johnson of Kentucky, Kennedy, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, Law, Lefferts, Lewis, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McLean, Montgomery, Ormsby, Pearson, Pickering, Pickens, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Roane, Sevier, Sharp, Sheffield, Stanford, Tannehill, Thompson, Udree, and Wilson of Pennsylvania.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barnett, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Bradley, Champion, Cilley, Comstock, Cooper, Cox, Cuthbert, Davenport, Ely, Fisk of Vt., Fisk of N. Y., Forsyth, Gholson, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Hale, Hall, Hungerford, Irving, Jackson of Rhode Island, Johnson of Va., Kent of Md., King of Massachusetts, King of North Carolina, Lowndes, Markell, McKim, Moffitt, Moore, Moseley, Murfree, Nelson, Oakley, Parker, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Rich, Ridgely, Robertson, Sage, Seybert, Sherwood, Smith of New York, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Taylor, Telfair, Vose, Ward of New Jersey, Wheaton, Wilcox, Winter, and Wright.

EXPORTATION OF GOLD AND SILVER.

The order of the day on the bill for prohibiting the exportation of gold and silver coin and bullion, having been called up by Mr. CALHOUN, of South Carolina, chairman of the Committee who reported it—

Mr. WILLIAM REED, of Massachusetts, moved to postpone indefinitely the said order of the day, on which motion the vote was as follows: For the postponement 43, against it 72.

The motion for indefinite postponement being negatived, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on said bill.

The bill having been read through—

Mr. CALHOUN said that in relation to the subject of this bill he had not much to say, not being conversant in this matter. Its object, however, was to protect our moneyed institutions from drains from abroad. Whether the bill would have this effect or not, he could not say; his opinion must be regulated by that of those who were conversant on it. Candor required him to say he had some doubts of the entire efficacy of this bill, and feared that the facility of exporting an article of so small a bulk as specie or bullion would evade the most strenuous efforts of our custom-house officers.

Mr. McKIM, of Maryland, moved to amend the bill by striking out the fourth section, which permits, under strict regulations, the exportation of specie coastwise. His idea was that specie would never be transported by sea, because of the risk, unless intended to be conveyed to the enemy; and, therefore, though he felt no great solicitude about this bill, he was desirous, if it passed, that this section should be struck out.

The motion to strike out the section was negatived by a large majority.

Mr. WILLIAM REED, of Massachusetts, objected to this bill because likely to be inefficient; and as a remaining feature of the restrictive system, which, if it was to go down, he wished to go down altogether. The bill would have no other effect than to put the exportation of specie into the hands of smugglers instead of honest merchants; and would rather increase than diminish it.

Mr. INGERSOLL, of Pennsylvania, moved an amendment to the bill, the object of which was to allow the exportation, in vessels bound to ports beyond the Cape of Good Hope, of specie in sufficient amount to pay the duties on the cargo of the vessel on its arrival at its port of destination, &c. Without such an amendment, the effect of the bill would be, he conceived, to prohibit all trade to ports in China or India, as the duties were there required to be paid in specie immediately on the arrival of the vessel.

This amendment was opposed by Mr. CALHOUN, and negatived by a large majority.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill to the House.

Mr. POTTER, of Rhode Island, moved to strike out the first section of the bill, and spoke in support of his motion. He said you might as rationally and almost as certainly expect a law to be effectual to prevent the ebb and flow of the tide, as a law to prevent specie from finding its level.

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, spoke in favor of the motion. His objection was not to the principle of the bill, but to the futility of such a law to accomplish the object in view. Such an act, he contended, must be ineffectual, and was further objectionable in his view as a remaining feature of a system for which he felt almost an instinctive abhorrence. The provisions of the bill were of an odious character, and, as the bill could have no effect, he hoped it would not pass.

Mr. CALHOUN said that no gentleman, he believed, conceived that this bill, if passed, would be completely effectual. The only question was, would it deaden the current of exportation of specie? Some appeared to think it would; and this was the opinion of many of the banks in the country. Others thought differently, however, and, for himself, he had not made up his own mind on the subject, though at present inclined to support the bill.

Mr. TALLMADGE, of Connecticut, spoke in favor of striking out the first section of the bill. If the measure had not been recommended by the President, it would never have been thought of by any member of either House. He objected to the details of the bill, which were of the same odious character as the provisions of the embargo laws. He stated several other objections to the bill; among which were, that it was trifling with the solemnity of oaths, and demoralizing the people of our country, to exact oaths in relation to trivial matters; and that it was a continuation of the system of arming citizen against citizen, and setting neighbors as spies upon each other, &c. Especially he objected to these provisions, when he believed they could not produce any possible beneficial effect.

Mr. POTTER again spoke in support of his motion, and

Mr. HALE, of New Hampshire, also spoke against the bill. He said the bill, although it would not prevent the exportation of specie, would have the effect to prevent its importation, and thus diminish instead of increasing the specie capital of the country.

The question on striking out the first section of the bill was decided as follows: For striking it out 50, against it 59.

So the House refused to strike out the first section.

Mr. INGERSOLL renewed the motion which he had made in Committee of the Whole, which was again negatived.

Mr. WILLIAM REED then moved to amend the bill so as to strike out that part of the bill which limits its duration to two years or the close of the present war, and insert "to the end of the next session of Congress;" which motion, being acceded to by Mr. CALHOUN, was agreed to.

Mr. HALE moved to lay the bill on the table.—Negatived.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, moved to strike out the fifth section of the bill. Negatived—ayes 36.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

REPEAL OF THE EMBARGO.

The House took up the message of the Senate announcing their passage of the act repealing the embargo, &c., with amendments (to strike out the third and fourth sections.)

Mr. CALHOUN moved that the House do agree to the amendments.

This question was decided without debate by yeas and nays—For the amendments 68, against them 52, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alston, Anderson, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Bradley, Brigham, Caperton, Calhoun, Champion, Chappell, Cilley, Clark, Comstock, Cooper, Cox, Creighton, Culpeper, Davenport, Duvall, Ely, Forney, Forsyth, Gaston, Geddes, Grosvenor, Hale, Hanson, Hungerford, Ingersoll, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kennedy, Kerr, King of Massachusetts, King of North Carolina, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Lowndes, Macon, Markell, Miller, Moffit, Montgomery, Moseley, Murfree, Oakley, Pearson, Pleasants, John Reed, William Reed, Ridgely, Robertson, Seybert, Sheffey, Sherwood, Stanford, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Taylor, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Winter, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Archer, Bard, Barnett, Beall, Butler, Caldwell, Condict, Conard, Crawford, Crouch, Davis of Pennsylvania, Desha, Eppes, Findley, Fisk of New York, Franklin, Gholson, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Grundy, Hall, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Humphreys, Irving, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kershaw, Kilbourn, Lefferts, Lyle, McCoy, McLane, Moore, Nelson, Ormsby, Parker, Pickens, Piper, Potter, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Ringgold, Roane, Sage, Sharp, Tannehill, Udree, and Wilson of Pennsylvania.

WEDNESDAY, April 13.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making additional appropriations for the service of the year 1814; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

Mr. MURFREE, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, reported the bill from the Senate, "for the relief of Israel Thorndike," without amendment; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the select committee appointed on the 11th instant, reported a bill making an appropriation for completing the Chamber of the House of Representatives; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

The following resolution was submitted by Mr. HUNGERFORD, for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy, to whom was submitted, by a resolution of this House, on the 15th day of March past, the petition and documents accompanying the same, of John T. Courtney and Samuel Harrison, and a report and resolution of the Committee on Naval Affairs relative to the same, be, and he is hereby, instructed to make a report thereon to this House.

And, on the question to consider the said resolution, it was determined in the negative.

A motion was made by Mr. FISK, of New York, to refer to the Secretary of War the documents accompanying the report of the committee appointed to inquire in what manner contracts for supplying the Army of the United States have been made, and to what extent general officers have interfered in such contracts, prejudicial to the public interest or to the rights of individuals.

Mr. GHOLSON moved that the said motion do lie on the table; and the question being taken, it passed in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, the three following bills, viz: A bill authorizing the increase of the marine corps; a bill to authorize the purchase of the vessels captured on Lake Erie; and a bill from the Senate to authorize the appointment of officers for the flotilla service, were passed through a Committee of the Whole, slightly amended, and severally ordered to be read a third time without opposition.

The engrossed bill to authorize the President of the United States to accept the service of such volunteer corps as shall organize themselves for the defence of the United States; the engrossed bill continuing in force the act declaring the assent of Congress to two acts of the States of Maryland and Georgia; the engrossed bill for the relief of Archibald McCall; and the engrossed bill to incorporate the Columbian Manufacturing Company of Alexandria in the District of Columbia, were severally read a third time and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "for the relief of James Lloyd," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the consideration of the bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to subscribe, on behalf of the United States, for 750 shares of the capital stock of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company.

Mr. BOND, of Illinois, having called up the bill to authorize the opening a road from Shawanoe-town in Illinois Territory, &c., the House refused to take it up.

The bill for the relief of Richard Mitchell passed through a Committee of the Whole, but on the question to pass the said bill to a third reading, it was decided in the negative.

PROTECTION OF THE FRONTIER.

A motion was made by Mr. KILBOURN, that the House do now proceed to the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill for the better protection of the North-western frontier of the United States, by granting donations of land to actual settlers.

And, the question being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 36, nays 71, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alston, Bowen, Caldwell, Chappell, Creighton, Davis of Pennsylvania, Desha, Ely, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Forney, Gholson, Goodwyn, Griffin, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kent of New York, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of North Carolina, Macon, McLean, Miller, Murfree, Nelson, Ormsby, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Shipherd, Smith of New York, Sturges, Taggart, Taylor, Thompson, and Troup.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Bard, Barnett, Baylies of Massachusetts, Boyd, Breckenridge, Brigham, Brown, Caperton, Champion, Cilley, Clark, Cooper, Cox, Crawford, Crouch, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Eppes, Fisk of New York, Forsyth, Franklin, Gaston, Goldsborough, Grosvenor, Hale, Hall, Hanson, Hawes, Hungerford, Ingersoll, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Lowndes, Lyle, Markell, McCoy, McKim, Moffit, Montgomery, Moore, Moseley, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, Potter, William Reed, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rich, Ridgely, Robertson, Ruggles, Sage, Seybert, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Tallmadge, Tannehill, Telfair, Udree, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Wheaton, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Winter.

RELATIONS WITH FRANCE.

Mr. GASTON, of North Carolina, rose to offer a motion, which he prefaced by a word or two of explanation. The period of adjournment, he said, was approaching, and an interval of six months would elapse before Congress would again convene. Mr. G. said he thought it very important, if the Executive was in possession of any information respecting our relations with France, not already in possession of the public, that it should be laid before the House. He was desirous of such information for another reason. The House was called upon to legislate in relation to France, on a bill which has been reported in this House, but not yet acted on, to open our ports to the cruisers of France. The House had been informed, too, by the President in his late Message, that the most astonishing changes had taken place on the continent of Europe. It was important to know how far these changes affected our relations with France, and the policy of that measure he had alluded to. These were his reasons, and his only reasons, for offering the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House any information in his possession touching our relations with France, which in his judgment it is not improper to disclose.

This motion having been assented to by Mr. CALBOURN, of South Carolina, and modified, on the suggestion of Mr. GRUNDY, of Tennessee, by

APRIL, 1814.

Exportation of Specie—Militia, &c.

H. OF R.

the insertion of the words "not heretofore communicated," was agreed to without a division.

EXPORTATION OF SPECIE.

The engrossed bill "to prohibit the exportation of specie, gold, or silver coins, or bullion," was read a third time.

Mr. PICKERING, of Massachusetts, said he was too hoarse to make himself heard, and therefore did not rise to oppose the bill, but merely to require the yeas and nays, that he might at least record his vote against this remnant of folly and mischief.

Mr. PITKIN, of Connecticut, opposed the passage of the bill, for various reasons. Specie, he said, would always regulate itself. No Government, even the most despotic, had ever been successful in prohibiting the exportation of specie. He stated it as a fact generally believed by those acquainted with the subject, that more specie had gone from this country during the last embargo, than in any like term of time before, notwithstanding the existence of provisions much more severe than those contained in this bill against exportation, &c. He therefore moved that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. GRUNDY, of Tennessee, conceived this bill to be one of doubtful expediency, and on which it would perhaps be better that the House should not legislate too hastily. In the present situation of things, it did not appear to him that such a bill was necessary to prevent the drain of specie; and no great evil could arise from postponing the subject till the next session. He should therefore vote for the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. FARROW, of South Carolina, was of opinion with Mr. GRUNDY, that this was a measure of questionable expediency, and entertaining strong doubts of the propriety of such a law, he also should vote to postpone it.

The yeas and nays having been ordered on the question of postponement at the instance of Mr. NELSON of Virginia—

Mr. GRUNDY, of Tennessee, moved to lay the whole subject on the table, with a view, however, not to call it up again at the present session. His object was to avoid a total rejection of the bill.

Mr. NELSON required the yeas and nays on this motion also. This was a bill reported by the Committee of Foreign Relations, in pursuance of a recommendation from the Executive of the United States. If the bill was important at all as a mean of arresting the exportation of specie, it ought to pass; if not, it ought to be rejected at once, and not acted on sideways, and disposed of by an indirect vote.

Mr. GRUNDY then, with a view to permit gentlemen to give a direct vote on the bill, withdrew his motion; and the question on the indefinite postponement was decided by the following vote: For the postponement 63, against it 60:

YEAS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brigham, Butler, Caperton, Champion, Chappell, Cilley, Cooper, Cox, Culpeper, Ely, Farrow, Forney, Forsyth, Gaston, Geddes, Goldsborough, Grosvenor, Grundy, Hale, Hanson, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kennedy, Kent of New York, Kerr, Kershaw, King of Massachusetts, Lewis, Lovett, Lowndes, Markell, Miller, Moffitt, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Rich, Ridgely, Ruggles, Seybert, Sheffey, Smith of New York, Stanford, Stuart, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Thompson, Troup, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Wheaton, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Winter.

13th CON. 2d SESS.—64

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Bard, Barnett, Beall, Bowen, Brown, Calhoun, Clark, Clopton, Comstock, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Cuthbert, Davis of Pennsylvania, Desha, Duvall, Eppes, Findley, Gholson, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hawes, Hawkins, Humphreys, Hungerford, Ingersoll, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kent of Maryland, Kilbourn, Lefferts, Lyle, McCoy, McLean, Montgomery, Moore, Nelson, Ormsby, Parker, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Roane, Sage, Sharp, Smith of Virginia, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Udree, Ward of New Jersey, Wilson of Pennsylvania, and Wright.

So the House determined that the said bill be postponed indefinitely.

COMPENSATION TO MILITIA, &c.

On motion of Mr. DESHA, of Kentucky, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill allowing compensation for horses owned by militia or volunteers killed in the service of the United States.

Mr. DESHA moved to amend the bill by striking out its general provision, and inserting sections limiting its operation to Gov. Shelby's volunteers and Colonel Johnson's mounted infantry. His reason was, that the horses in these corps had been regularly appraised, and the roll of appraisal returned to, and now in the War Office, and therefore stood on higher ground than like claims generally.

This amendment was opposed by Mr. FARROW, of South Carolina. Mr. BEALL, and Mr. CREIGHTON, of Ohio, on objection to the speciality of the provisions, and by Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, on the ground that there were others as well entitled to relief as the mounted infantry which was under his command, though in his opinion the case of the horses in Shelby's command formed an exception from the general rule, and was particularly entitled to relief.

Mr. DESHA, whose object would be perfectly obtained by the general provision, if that should meet the wishes of the Committee, relinquished the support of his proposed amendment, and the amendment was rejected.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill to the House.

A motion was then made by Mr. RICH, of Vermont, to amend the bill by inserting a new section in the following words:

"And be it further enacted, That the several persons employed in removing the Army from Plattsburg and Burlington to Sackett's Harbor, in the month of March, 1813, be allowed and paid the amount of such damages as they shall have sustained by the loss or injury of sleighs and horses while employed in that service, said damages to be ascertained in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct."

And after debate, this motion was negatively; and the bill was then farther amended and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

THURSDAY, April 14.

Mr. ARCHER, of Maryland, reported a bill for the relief of Joseph S. Hughes; which was twice read and committed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a revised statement of the debt of the United States; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The bill from the Senate, for the relief of James Lloyd, was twice read and committed.

Mr. WILLIAM REED, of Massachusetts, advertising to the appointment of a committee on the 17th March last, to inquire into the expediency of making a reform in the Naval Establishment, and the impracticability, during the short time which has since elapsed, of maturing a report on the subject, moved that the said committee be authorized to act in the recess, and report at the next session; not with a view to their actually sitting during the recess, but to keep the committee alive until the next session.

After some conversation on the subject, the motion was adopted.

The unfavorable report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of John Pitchlyn, passed through a Committee of the Whole, was, on motion of Mr. ARCHER, of Maryland, reversed, so as to make the report favorable to the petition, and referred to the Committee of Claims, to report a bill for his relief.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they have passed the bill "confirming certain claims to land in the Illinois Territory, and providing for their location," with amendments. The Senate have also passed a bill, "in further addition to an act, entitled 'An act more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing an uniform militia throughout the United States,'" also, a bill "to lessen the compensation for marshals, clerks, and attorneys, in certain cases therein mentioned;" in which bills and amendments they ask the concurrence of this House.

An engrossed bill, authorizing the purchase of the vessels captured on Lake Erie, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill, allowing compensation for horses owned by militia or volunteers, and killed or lost in the service of the United States, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate, "authorizing an augmentation of the Marine corps, and for other purposes," was read the third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate, "to authorize the appointment of certain officers for the flotilla service," was read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTION OF REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. FISK, of Vermont, moved "that a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the Judicial system as to give to the Courts of the United States exclusive jurisdiction in all cases arising under the Revenue laws; with leave to report by bill or otherwise."

Mr. F. said, that very lately a new practice had arisen in some of the States. Whenever the collectors were making seizures the States were interfering, so as to interrupt the operation of the revenue laws. He knew one instance, where fifty-six writs had been served on one of the collectors in one week; and, in the State which he had the honor in part to represent, the collectors had been much harassed. If this system could be persisted in with impunity, the revenue laws would be a dead letter. The State courts might levy on property seized for taxes, and, where such a disposition prevailed, entirely defeat the operation of the laws of the United States. It was never the design, certainly, of the framers of the Constitution, to leave the country in such a state.

After some incidental conversation, not affecting the principle involved in it, the motion was agreed to by a majority of 20 or 30 votes; and Mr. FISK of Vermont, Mr. GRUNDY, Mr. INGERSOLL, Mr. GROSVENOR, and Mr. GASTON, were appointed the said committee.

FOREIGN LICENSES.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, rose to make a motion on the subject of the law now in existence, prohibiting the use of foreign licenses. He thought that it ought to be repealed, for several reasons, which he assigned, viz: That as, in pursuance of the recommendation of the President, every feature of the restrictive system had been abolished, it was important to put our own vessels at least on an equality with those of neutral nations trading with us; that for this purpose a repeal of this law was necessary; that there were absent from the United States, and shut up in European ports, many American vessels, which could not return except under the protection of foreign licenses. He had heard but one objection to this repeal; it was suggested that, to repeal the law in question, would be a kind of submission to the enemy. He thought not. It was the practice of nations generally in time of war, and even in the present war of extermination between France and England, those nations traded directly with each other. Another consideration which ought to induce the House to accede to the motion, was the opinion of American merchants generally, which was in favor of the repeal of the prohibition, &c. Mr. K.'s motion was as follows:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing an act passed on the 2d day of August, 1813, entitled 'An act to prohibit the use of licenses or passes granted by authority of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.'"

When Mr. K. submitted this motion, it contained also a clause including the act to prohibit the ransom of vessels captured by the enemy; but, it being suggested that the bill which passed the House on this subject had not yet become a law,

APRIL, 1814.

Proceedings.

H. OF R.

Mr. K. erased that part of his motion which related to ransoms.

The House agreed to consider the motion, by a vote of 53 to 44.

This resolution gave rise to an animated and extended debate, in the course of which it was modified, on suggestion of Mr. GASTON of North Carolina, by inserting, after the word "Ireland," the following words:

"Or so modifying the said act, as to permit licenses granted by the authority of the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland to be used, under such regulations and restrictions as may be deemed expedient by the President of the United States."

Those gentlemen who opposed the resolution were, Messrs. CALHOUN of South Carolina, FISK of Vermont, INGERSOLL of Pennsylvania, MURFREE of North Carolina, SHARP of Kentucky, RHEA of Tennessee, McKIM of Maryland, PORTER of Rhode Island, and DUVALL of Kentucky; and those who advocated it were the mover, Messrs. WRIGHT of Maryland, GROSVENOR of New York, SHEFFEY of Virginia, and GASTON of North Carolina.

The debate having rather degenerated into a personal from a national character before its close—that is to say, after the debate had consumed considerably more than four hours—

Mr. MACON, of North Carolina, observing that it was time an end was put to this sort of debate, moved to proceed to the orders of the day.—Negatived, 58 to 57.

Mr. CONARD, of Pennsylvania, requested the previous question; in which he was not supported by a majority of the House.

After a few explanatory remarks from Mr. FISK, of Vermont, in reply to Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, the question on the adoption of the resolution was decided by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Boyd, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brigham, Caperton, Chappell, Gilley, Cooper, Cox, Culpeper, Davenport, Ely, Gaston, Goldsborough, Grosvenor, Hale, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of Maryland, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Markell, Miller, Moffitt, Moseley, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, William Reed, Ridgely, Ruggles, Sheffey, Smith of New Hampshire, Smith of New York, Strong, Stuart, Sturges, Tallmadge, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Winter, and Wright—49.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Barnett, Bowen, Bradley, Butler, Caldwell, Calhoun, Clark, Comstock, Conduct, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Cuthbert, Davis of Pennsylvania, Desha, Duvall, Eppes, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Goodwin, Gourdin, Griffin, Grundy, Hall, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hawkins, Humphreys, Hungerford, Ingersoll, Irving, Irwin, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kennedy, Kerr, Kershaw, King of North Carolina, Leferts, Lowndes, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKim, McLean, Montgomery, Moore, Murfree, Nelson, Ormsby, Parker, Piper, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Ringgold, Roane, Robertson, Sage, Sevier, Seybert, Sharp, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Troup, and Udree—81.

[Mr. Beall of Ohio, who was accidentally out of the House when the vote was taken, declared his intention to have voted in the negative.]

So the House rejected the said resolution.

And on motion, the House adjourned until to-morrow.

FRIDAY, April 15.

The bill from the Senate, "to lessen the compensation for marshals, clerks, and attorneys, in the cases therein mentioned," was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

The bill from the Senate, "in further addition to an act, entitled 'An act more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing an uniform militia throughout the United States,'" was read twice, and referred to the committee for revising the Militia laws.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "confirming certain claims to land in the Illinois Territory, and providing for their location," were read, and concurred in by the House.

On motion of Mr. ARCHER, the Committee of the Whole were discharged from the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims on the memorial of the Governors of the New York Hospital.

On motion of Mr. INGERSOLL, the Committee of the Whole were discharged from the consideration of the bill prescribing the mode of authenticating the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings, of the several States, and for declaring the effect of certain judicial proceedings.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "in addition to the act, entitled 'An act to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, and to repeal the act now in force for those purposes,'" with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

On motion of Mr. ARCHER,

Ordered. That the Committee of the whole House be discharged from the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Zachariah Roberts.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of Israel Thorndike was passed through a Committee of the Whole, and reported to the House, where it was debated at length; Messrs. MURFREE, BAYLIES, REED, GROSVENOR, and PICKERING, being the principal supporters of the bill, and Messrs. ROBERTSON, McKIM, TAYLOR, WRIGHT, IRVING, LOWNDES, CALHOUN, EPPES, and GHOLSON, its principal opponents.

The case presented by this bill was that of a cargo of foreign produce exported for New Orleans in the year 1808, and of course without the formalities necessary to secure to the exporter the drawback on exportation, but driven by stress of weather into a foreign port, Havana. The bill proposes to allow to Mr. Thorndike drawback on the cargo which was sold at Havana, its re-exportation being prohibited by the municipal regulations in that port, notwithstanding the non-compliance with the formalities required by law previous to exportation.

The bill was indefinitely postponed by a majority of 20 or 30 votes.

The engrossed bill making additional appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1814; and the engrossed bill to amend the act laying duties on licenses to retailers (which this day passed through a Committee of the Whole) were read a third time, and passed.

The House then, by a very close vote of 47 to 45, refused to take up the bill respecting Evans's steam engine patent.

The bill to incorporate the stockholders of a National Bank (reported several weeks ago, and which has since slumbered on the table) having been named among the orders of the day, was, on motion of Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, who reported it, indefinitely postponed.

On motion of Mr. LEWIS, of Virginia, that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to establish the Bank of the Metropolis, it was determined in the negative, yeas 31.

The bill for the relief of John D. Hay (relieving him from the payment of three hundred and fifty-five dollars, being the amount of money belonging to the Post Office, which was, together with all his other property, consumed by a fire, in which he lost also three infant children) passed through a Committee of the Whole, was ordered to be read a third time, read accordingly, and passed.

A number of orders of the day were called up, which the House refused, by large majorities, to take up until they came to the bill respecting the Office of Attorney General.

ATTORNEY GENERAL.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill establishing the permanent residence of the Attorney General of the United States at the Seat of Government.

A motion was made by Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, to strike out the section providing for increasing the compensation of the Attorney General; and, being assented to by Mr. INGERSOLL, (the chairman of the committee who reported the bill,) was agreed to without a division.

On motion of Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, the bill was further amended by striking out that part of the bill requiring the Attorney General, when required, to make reports, &c., to Congress on cases submitted to him; on the ground that the laws already made such a provision.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill, and the amendments were concurred in by the House.

The bill now containing no other provision than that requiring the permanent residence of the Attorney General at the Seat of Government—

Mr. POTTER, of Rhode Island, moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill indefinitely.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, moved an amendment to limit the requisition of the bill to a residence at the Seat of Government during the sessions of Congress and of the Supreme Court.—Negatived.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was subsequently read a third time, and passed.

PAYMASTER GENERAL.

The bill from the Senate fixing the salary of the Paymaster General of the Armies of the United States, making an allowance for clerk hire, and for the appointment of Assistant District Paymasters, passed through a Committee of the Whole, on motion of Mr. TROUP, of Georgia.

The provision for augmenting the salary of the Paymaster General from $1,440 to 2,400, gave rise to considerable discussion. It was opposed by Messrs. EPPES, of Virginia, ALSTON, of North Carolina, and warmly supported by Messrs. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, LEWIS, of Virginia, GHOLESON, of Virginia, McKIM, of Maryland.

The objections made to this provision were, not that an increase might not reasonably be made, but that this was not a time to increase salaries of officers generally, and that no particular increase ought to be made. The discussion resulted, however, in amending the bill so as to allow the Paymaster General two thousand dollars per annum during the war, and, thus amended, the bill passed to a third reading.

SATURDAY, April 16.

The following resolution was submitted by Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky:

Resolved, That the Committee of Accounts be, and they are hereby, authorized to pay to Elexius Spalding, George N. Thomas, Richard Stewart, Isaac Phillips, and George Cooper, one dollar and fifty cents per day, for their attendance on the House of Representatives during the present session of Congress, as the entire compensation for their services; and that Oswald Dunn be allowed for his services one hundred dollars.

The resolution was read, and referred to the Committee of Accounts.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "granting pensions to officers and seamen serving on board the revenue cutters, in certain cases;" also, the bill "concerning the pay of officers, seamen, and marines, in the Navy of the United States;" with an amendment to each, in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The bill from the Senate, "fixing the salary of the Paymaster of the Army of the United States, and allowing a sum for the employment of additional clerks in his office for the year 1814, and providing for the appointment of assistant district paymasters," was read the third time, as amended, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "to alter and establish certain post roads, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. ARCHER, of Maryland, reported a bill for the relief of John Pitchlyn; which was twice read, and committed.

The Committee of Claims were then, on motion of the same gentleman, discharged from the further consideration of all matters referred to them, and not yet acted on.

A like order was, on motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, adopted in relation to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FRISK, of Vermont, from the select committee appointed on Thursday, reported a bill providing for the removal of causes in certain cases therein specified, and for other purposes; which was twice read.

A motion was made by Mr. GASTON, of North Carolina, to postpone the said bill indefinitely, and negatived.

A motion was made by Mr. POTTER, of Rhode Island, that the bill do lie on the table, and negatived.

The bill was then referred to a Committee of the Whole.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill, which went from this House, to amend the law relating to calling out the militia, &c., were taken up and concurred in.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, from the Militia Committee, reported certain amendments to the bill from the Senate, "in further addition to the act more effectually to provide for the national defence by establishing an uniform militia throughout the United States," which amendments were concurred in, and the bill ordered to be read a third time, and was subsequently read a third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate "providing for the distribution of money paid into the courts of the United States," passed through a Committee of the Whole, was ordered to a third reading; and was read a third time, and finally passed.

The Committee of the Whole were discharged from the consideration of the bill supplementary to the act for the regulation of the Post Office, on motion of Mr. INGERSOLL, who stated that the lateness of the period in the present session, and the variety of details likely to be inserted in such a bill, rendered it necessary to postpone the consideration till the next session.

The House spent some time in Committee of the Whole on the bill authorizing payment for property captured or destroyed while in the public service by the enemy of the United States; and the bill being reported to the House was ordered to lie on the table.

The bill "for the relief of George Hamilton," and the bill "for the relief of John Whitney and Joseph H. Dorr," passed through Committees of the Whole, were engrossed for third readings, read a third time, and passed.

The House spent some time in Committee of the Whole on the bill to revive and continue in force the act declaring the assent of Congress to two acts of Georgia and Maryland; which being reported to the House, were, on motion of Mr. PITKIN, of Connecticut, ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "to amend the act laying duties on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise, and for other purposes," with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The bill from the Senate "for the relief of James Lloyd," passed through a Committee of the Whole, was ordered to a third reading, and read a third time; when, on motion of Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting his report on the petition of John T. Courtney and Samuel Harrison, which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill "granting pensions to the officers and seamen serving on board the revenue cutters in certain cases," were read and concurred in by the House.

Sundry amendments made by the Senate concerning the pay of the officers, seamen, and marines, in the Navy of the United States, were taken up. [These amendments go to fix specifically the payment of officers, &c., instead of appropriating an aggregate amount, to be distributed according to the discretion of the Executive.]

Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, having stated that the amendments which had been made were in conformance with the object of the bill as it passed this House; that the pay specified was the same as now given, and always has been, to these officers, moved a concurrence in the amendments, which was agreed to.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill for establishing certain post roads were read, and agreed to.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they have passed the bill "authorizing the purchase of the vessels captured on Lake Erie," with amendments, in which they desire the concurrence of this House. The said amendments were read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "concerning invalid pensioners;" also, the bill "making additional appropriations for the service of the year 1814," with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill "concerning invalid pensioners," were read, and concurred in by the House.

The amendment of the Senate to the bill authorizing the purchase of the vessels captured on Lake Erie, (allowing to Captain Perry $5,000, in addition to the share of the prize money allowed him by law,) passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was concurred in.

[The reason of this amendment was stated by Mr. LOWNDES to be, that although Captain Perry was in fact commander of the fleet on Lake Erie, he would, according to the construction given to the law, only be entitled to his share as commander of the particular vessel on board of which he fought.]

The bill from the Senate to lessen the compensation of marshals, attorneys, and clerks of court, in certain cases, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and, after an unsuccessful attempt by Mr. INGERSOLL to except those officers in Pennsylvania from the operation of the bill, it was reported to the House, and ordered to be read a third time; and it was read a third time accordingly, and finally passed.

Several very important amendments of the Senate to the additional appropriation bill, going to change entirely the mode of settling certain accounts at the Treasury, and making additional appropriations, were, on motion of Mr. EPPES, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

An order passed the House, on motion of Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, for paying out of the contingent fund of the House the funeral expenses of G. W. Lindsay, late a Clerk of this House.

The bill from the Senate to incorporate the directors of the Washington Library Company, was taken up by the casting vote of the Speaker, passed through a Committee of the whole House, ordered to a third reading, read a third time accordingly, and finally passed.

The bill for the relief of John Pitchlyn was passed through a Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. FISK, of Vermont, called up the bill "providing for the removal of causes in certain cases therein specified, and for other purposes;" which the House refused to take up by the following vote—For the motion 50, against it 52.

RELATIONS WITH FRANCE.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report of the Secretary of State, complying with their resolution of the 13th instant.

JAMES MADISON.

APRIL 16, 1814.

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 13th instant, requesting information touching our relations with France, has the honor to submit to the President an extract of a letter from the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris, which contains the latest, and the only material, information received by this Department on that subject.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 16, 1814.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Crawford to the Secretary of State:

"PARIS, January 16, 1814.

"On the 29th ultimo, I had an interview with the Minister of Exterior Relations, who informed me that he had made to the Emperor a detailed report of the negotiation, and that he would inform me of His Majesty's decision, the moment it should be made known to him. His conversation during this interview was as conciliatory as it could be, and his expressions, though still general, admitted that indemnity was determined upon. The address of the Senator Count Segur to the inhabitants of the eighteenth military division of the Empire, published in the Moniteur of the 15th instant, stated that His Majesty was going to place himself at the head of his troops. Knowing that I should not be able to advance a single step in the negotiation during his absence, unless he should, before his departure from Paris, decide upon the classes of cases for which indemnity should be made, I determined to address a note to the Duke of Vicenza, with a view to impress more strongly upon his mind the necessity of an immediate decision.

"The day on which I intended to present this note I was informed that the Duke of Vicenza had set out from Paris, at 4 o'clock, A. M., for the headquarters of the two Emperors, which was then said to be in Switzerland. The general impression in Paris that day was that the Emperor would set out immediately for Metz, where his army of reserve has been forming ever since he crossed the Rhine. This circumstance induced me to believe that the note would not produce any good effect. I, therefore, determined not to present it. The Emperor is still in Paris, and I regret extremely that I did not adhere to my first determination, notwithstanding the absence of the Minister of Foreign Relations. From the situation of affairs here, it is impossible to foresee the delays to which this perplexing business will yet be subject. In the first and only interview which I had with the Duke of Bassano, he said expressly that the obstacles which his absence had thrown in the way of the negotiation should not occur again. Two months have not elapsed before the same obstacles are presented."

PROPERTY LOST IN PUBLIC SERVICE.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, the House took up the bill authorizing payment for property captured or destroyed by the enemy while in the public service—in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was amended, on motion of Mr. JOHNSON, by the addition of several new sections.

A motion was made by Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, also to amend the bill, by striking out such parts thereof as provide for the indemnification of persons who may hereafter sustain loss of property in the public service.

This motion was opposed with some warmth by Mr. MONTGOMERY, of Kentucky, and Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, and supported as warmly by the mover; after which the question was taken, and the motion negatived without a division.

The Committee then rose, and reported the bill as amended; but before a decision took place on the report, a motion was made to adjourn and carried—57 to 45.

MONDAY, April 18.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "to authorize the Secretary of State to liquidate certain claims therein mentioned," in which they ask the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed the bill "concerning certificates of confirmation of claims to the lands in the State of Louisiana," with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed a bill "making an appropriation for repairing the President's house," in which they also ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. EPPES made a report on the amendments made by the Senate to the bill "making additional appropriations for the service of the year 1814," which was read, and, together with the said amendments, committed to a Committee of the whole House to-day.

Mr. MOORE, from the Committee of Accounts, to whom was referred the resolution submitted on Saturday last, on the subject of the compensations of the attendants of the House, made a report; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House, amended to read as follows:

Resolved, That the following named persons, employed by the Doorkeeper to aid him in the execution of the duties of his office, to wit: Elexius Spalding, Richard Stewart, George N. Thomas, Isaac Phillips, George Cooper, and Oswald Dunn, be, and they are hereby, allowed two dollars per day during the present session, and for four days after the same; and that, for the service of three horses which have been employed in the service of the House, there be allowed one dollar per day each, during the same time; which shall be the entire compensation for the above services: and that the same be paid out of the fund appropriated for the contingent expenses of this House.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "to amend the act laying duties on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise, and for other purposes," were read, and concurred in by the House.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, "concerning certificates of confirmation of claims to lands in the State of Louisiana," were read, and concurred in by the House.

The bill from the Senate, "making an appropriation for repairing the President's house," was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, on the amendments of the Senate to the bill "making additional appropriations for the service of the year 1814."

The unfinished business, relative to the bill for payment for property destroyed by the enemy, was laid over by general consent.

The bill from the Senate to authorize the Secretary of State to liquidate certain claims therein mentioned, (of those who took possession of West Florida before the United States interposed its arm to occupy the same,) was twice read, and then, at the instance of Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, was read a third time, and passed.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill making further appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1814, were taken up.

Those amendments going to change the manner of settling accounts at the Treasury were opposed by Mr. EPPES and Mr. SHEFFEY, because of the lateness of the period of the session precluding a deliberate investigation of the subject. The merits of the amendments were not brought into the discussion. These amendments were rejected by a great majority, as also were one or two other amendments.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, moved to amend the bill making an appropriation for repairs to the President's house, (which had been referred to the same committee,) a new section going to appropriate ten thousand dollars for ventilating and raising the floor of the Chamber of the House of Representatives, so as better to adapt it to the transaction of business, to the health of the members, and the convenience of the public.

This motion was supported by the mover, opposed by Mr. FARROW, of South Carolina, and negatived. The bill was lost.

An engrossed bill for the relief of John Pitchlyn was read the third time and passed.

Some time elapsed, and the House being without a quorum, means were taken to procure a sufficient number of members to be present. With this view, a motion was made, at 1 o'clock, to adjourn, and decided by yeas and nays as follows—For the motion 50, against it 89.

Ninety-four members being present, and constituting a quorum, the House proceeded to do some business of little moment.

The bill from the Senate to ascertain and fix the compensation of clerks in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, and the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, was again taken up, and read a third time.

[The bill proposes a small increase of these salaries.]

The question on its passage having been required to be taken by yeas and nays, on the motion of Mr. HALL, of Georgia, was determined as follows—For the passage of the bill 48, against it 47.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "for the renewal of a land warrant to George Shannon," with an amendment, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill for the renewal of a land warrant to George Shannon, was read, and concurred in by the House.

CONDUCT OF THE WAR.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, rose to submit a motion on the subject of an inquiry into the manner in which the war has been conducted. He would not now say anything in favor of this motion, in addition to what had already been urged on this subject during the present session, unless merely to add, that the recent occurrences on the Northern frontier offered an additional reason why the inquiry should take place. The motion he made was in the following words:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of our arms on the Northern and Northwestern frontier; and that said committee have leave to sit during the recess of the House, and that they have power to send for persons and papers.

On the question of proceeding now to consider the resolution, the vote having been taken by yeas and nays, on suggestion of Mr. TROUP, of Georgia, was as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradbury, Bradley, Cooper, Gaston, Geddes, Grosvenor, Hale, Hall, Hanson, Hungerford, Jackson of Rhode Island, Lewis, Lovett, Macon, Miller, Montgomery, Oakley, Parker, Pearson, Potter, Ridgely, Ruggles, Sheffield, Sherwood, Smith of New York, Stanford, Vose, White, and Wilcox—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Bard, Beall, Bowen, Butler, Caperton, Calhoun, Cilley, Clark, Clopton, Comstock, Creighton, Crouch, Culpeper, Davis of Pennsylvania, Desha, Eppes, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Grundy, Harris, Hawes, Hawkins, Humphreys, Irving, Johnson of Kentucky, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kilbourn, King of North Carolina, Lefferts, Lowndes, Lyle, McCoy, McLean, Moore, Nelson, Ormsby, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Roane, Robertson, Sage, Sevier, Seybert, Sharp, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Treup, Wilson of Pennsylvania, and Wright—68.

So the House refused now to proceed to consider the said resolution.

ADJOURNMENT.

The usual order was then adopted to appoint a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States, to inform him both Houses, having completed the business before them, were about to adjourn. Mr. ANDERSON and Mr. WHARTON were appointed on the part of the Senate, and Messrs. EPPES, OAKLEY, and ROBERTSON on the part of this House.

Mr. EPPES, from the committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, reported that they had performed the duty assigned to them, and received for answer, that he had no further communications to make to the House.

And the House, after receiving back all the bills which had been laid before the President, adjourned until the last Monday in October next.

A SUPPLEMENTAL JOURNAL

Of such proceedings of the Second Session of the Thirteenth Congress, as, during the time they were depending, were ordered to be kept secret, and respecting which the injunction of secrecy was afterwards taken off by order of the House.

THURSDAY, December 9, 1813.

The following confidential Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The tendency of our commercial and navigation laws, in their present state, to favor the enemy, and thereby prolong the war, is more and more developed by experience. Supplies of the most essential kinds find their way, not only to British ports and British armies at a distance, but the armies in our neighborhood, with which our own are contending, derive from our ports and outlets a subsistence attainable with difficulty, if at all, from other sources. Even the fleets and troops infesting our coasts and waters are, by like supplies, accommodated and encouraged in their predatory and incursive warfare.

Abuses, having a like tendency, take place in our import trade. British fabrics and products find their way into our ports, under the name and from the ports of other countries; and often in British vessels, disguised as neutrals, by false colors and papers.

To these abuses it may be added, that illegal importations are openly made, with advantage to the violators of the law, produced by undervaluations, or other circumstances involved in the course of the judicial proceedings against them.

It is found, also, that the practice of ransoming is a cover for collusive captures, and a channel for intelligence advantageous to the enemy.

To remedy, as much as possible, these evils, I recommend:

That an effectual embargo on exports be immediately enacted.

That all articles, known to be derived, either not at all, or in any immaterial degree only, from the productions of any other country than Great Britain, and particularly the extensive articles made of wool and cotton materials, and ardent spirits made from the cane, be expressly and absolutely prohibited, from whatever port or place, or in whatever vessels, the same may be brought into the United States; and that all violations of the non-importation act be subjected to adequate penalties.

That, among the proofs of the neutral and national character of foreign vessels, it be required that the masters and supercargoes, and three-fourths at least of the crews, be citizens or subjects of the country under whose flag the vessels sail.

That all persons concerned in collusive captures by the enemy, or in ransoming vessels or their cargoes from the enemy, be subjected to adequate penalties.

To shorten, as much as possible, the duration of the war, it is indispensable that the enemy should feel all the pressure that can be given to it; and the restraints having that tendency, will be borne with the greater cheerfulness by all good citizens; as the restraints will affect those most, who are most ready to sacrifice the interest of their country in pursuit of their own.

JAMES MADISON.

DECEMBER 9, 1813.

The Message was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

FRIDAY, December 10.

EMBARGO.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-day.

A motion was made by Mr. POST, that the bill be printed; and the question being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 52, nays 82, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Bard, Barnett, Beall, Bowen, Brown, Burwell, Butler, Caldwell, Calhoun, Chappell, Clopton, Comstock, Condict, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Eppes, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forney, Franklin, Gholson, Glasgow, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Grundy, Hall, Harris, Hubbard, Humphreys, Ingham, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Lefferts, Lowndes, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKee, McKim, Moore, Murfree, Nelson, Newton, Ormsby, Parker, Pickens, Piper, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Roberts, Robertson, Sage, Sevier, Seybert, Sharp, Skinner, Smith of Pennsylvania, Strong, Tannehill, Taylor, Troup, Udree, Ward of New Jersey, Whitehill, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wright and Yancey.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the said bill; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

SATURDAY, December 11.

The order of the day, on the bill laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, being called for, Mr. OAKLEY moved that the said order be postponed until Monday next; and the question being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 45, nays 70, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Brigham, Caperton, Champion, Cilley, Cooper, Cox, Culpeper, Davenport, Dewey, Duvall, Ely, Gaston, Geddes, Grosvenor, Hanson, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Markell, Miller, Moffit, Moseley, Oakley, Pickering, Pitkin, Post, John Reed, Ruggles, Schureman, Shipherd, Stanford, Stockton, Stuart, Sturges, Taggart, Thompson, Vose, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, and Winter.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Barnett, Bowen, Bradley, Calhoun, Cheves, Comstock, Condict, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Davis of Pennsylvania, Dawson, Denoyelles, Desha, Eppes, Farrow, Fisk of New York, Forney, Franklin, Gholson, Glasgow, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Grundy, Hall, Harris, Hubbard, Humphreys, Hungerford, Ingham, Irwin, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Lefferts, Lowndes, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKim, McLean, Murfree, Nelson, Newton, Parker, Pickens, Piper, Rich, Roberts, Robertson, Sevier, Seybert, Sharp, Skinner, Smith of Pennsylvania, Strong, Tannehill, Taylor, Troup, Udree, Whitehill, Wilson of Pennsylvania, and Yancey.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the said bill; and, after some time spent therein, Mr. SPEAKER resumed the Chair, and Mr. NELSON reported that the Committee had again had the said bill under consideration, and made amendments therein; which were delivered in at the Clerk's table, where they were again read, and concurred in by the House.

A motion was made by Mr. GASTON to strike out the fourth section of the bill, and in lieu thereof to insert:

“SEC. 4. That the Collectors of the Customs be and they are hereby authorized and required to grant a general permission to vessels or boats whose employment has uniformly been confined to the navigation of bays, sounds, rivers, or lakes, within the jurisdiction of the United States, to take on board, at any time, any articles of domestic or foreign growth, bond with one or more sureties being previously given to the United States by the owner or owners, consignees, or factors, of such vessel or boat, in an amount equal to one hundred dollars for each ton of said vessel, that such vessel shall not, during the continuance of this act, depart from any district of the United States without having previously obtained a clearance, nor until the master or commander shall have delivered to the collector or surveyor of the port of departure a manifest of the whole cargo on board; and that such vessel shall not, during the continuance of this act, be in any manner engaged in a violation of this act.”

And the question being taken, it passed in the negative—yeas 51, nays 80, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Brigham, Caperton, Champion, Chappell, Cheves, Cilley, Cooper, Cox, Creighton, Dewey, Duvall, Ely, Gaston, Geddes, Grosvenor, Hanson, Hufty, Hungerford, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Markell, Miller, Moffit, Montgomery, Moseley, Murfree, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, Post, John Reed, Robertson, Ruggles, Schureman, Shipherd, Smith of New York, Stanford, Stockton, Sturges, Vose, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Wilson of Pennsylvania, and Winter.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Bard, Barnett, Beall, Bowen, Burwell, Butler, Caldwell, Calhoun, Clopton, Comstock, Condict, Conard, Crawford, Crouch, Davis of Pennsylvania, Dawson, Denoyelles, Desha, Eppes, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forney, Franklin, Gholson, Glasgow, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Grundy, Hall, Harris, Hubbard, Humphreys, Ingham, Irwin, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Lefferts, Lowndes, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKee, McKim, McLean, Moore, Nelson, Newton, Ormsby, Parker, Pickens, Piper, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Roberts, Sage, Sevier, Seybert, Sharp, Skinner, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Tannehill, Taylor, Troup, Udree, Ward of New Jersey, Whitehill, Wright, and Yancey.

A motion was then made, by Mr. STOCKTON, to strike out the first section of the bill; on which,

Mr. STOCKTON addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman: Being utterly opposed to this bill in all its principles and details; believing that its provisions are not only destructive of the prosperity, but hostile to the liberties of this people; I deem it an indispensable duty to call for the solemn decision of the Committee upon its merits, by moving that the first section be stricken out. It is with unfeigned and extreme reluctance that I have imposed this task upon myself; it is always irksome to me to take a part in debates here, because I know but too well that any interference of this side of the House, in measures agreed upon by the other, is useless. It is, moreover, manifest to me, that it has been resolved by the majority that this bill, in all its deformity, shall pass; that no exertion of ours can arrest its progress or amend its defects. It is just, however, that responsibility should attach to those gentlemen by whose votes it may be enacted. I consider myself bound to protest against its passage, and to defend, however unsuccessfully, the rights and interests of those who sent me here, now most unjustly and unnecessarily attacked; I shall not, however, detain you long, but will endeavor to express myself in as few words as I can use, so as to be understood. This measure is now brought forward as a war measure; as such it has been recommended to us by the President; as such it has been defended by the gentlemen of the majority in the very limited explanations which they have condescended to give us. It is asserted, that our citizens, forgetful of the duty which they owe to their country, now engaged in war, traitorously supply the enemy with provisions, and thereby enable him to carry on the war; that, by the aid of this bill, the war will be shortened, and brought to a speedy close; that, if it is not enacted into a law, the enemy will continue to be supplied, and thereby be enabled to continue the war as long as he shall see fit. This, sir, is specious reasoning; and if I believed the premises upon which it rests, or had any confidence in the conclusion drawn, I would vote for all those parts of the bill that I consider to be Constitutional; for there is nothing which I could legally do, that I would not do, to bring this war to a speedy close. But I do not believe the fact asserted, nor the deduction made from it, supposing it to be true. Let us then examine this subject as it is placed before us, first in point of fact, and then consider whether the professed object "to shorten the war" will probably be effected by it. I understand the assertion to be, that our citizens supply the enemy with provisions, directly and criminally; it is not simply that the enemy are fed by the provisions from this country, in the course of its neutral commerce, but that they are supplied by a direct, illegal, and corrupt traffic, kept up with them in defiance of the law. This is a high and weighty charge, and before we find our constituents guilty of it, and proceed to judgment and punishment, we ought to require, and be furnished with palpable proof of its truth. Now, there is not a particle of testimony before us to support the assertion. Does any member know the fact to be so, on his own knowledge? If he does, let him say so. No gentleman has pretended to have any personal knowledge of the fact; we must, therefore, look to some other quarter for the evidence of its existence. But I may be answered, that the President has given us the necessary information; true it is, that in his confidential Message, he has assumed the fact; but he has not deigned to furnish this House with the proof upon which he has hazarded the assertion. And yesterday, when an honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. OAKLEY,) moved that we should respectfully apply to the President to lay before us the evidence in his possession, this request, though highly proper and reasonable, was denied by the majority. Shall, then, Presidential assertion stand for full proof in a case like this? Does it comport with the justice, with the honorable independence of this House, to proceed to condemnation and punishment, to be inflicted on the community whom we represent, and of whose rights and character we are the guardians, upon no other ground than Executive communication? I think not. There was a time when the gentlemen on the other side taught and acted differently. Then, jealousy of Executive power and influence, carried even to the extreme, was a civic virtue; but now, the satisfaction which full information on so interesting a matter would have given to us and to our constituents, has been held not worth the delay of a few hours; and when we return to our people, and it shall be demanded of us upon what proof we convicted them—the only answer which we shall be able to render will be, that the President told us that they were trading with the enemy.

Information on this point was all-important, to enable us to ascertain the extent and character of the alleged traffic. For myself I must say, that I do not believe that it has ever been carried on to such an extent as would have any operation on the war. On a small scale, contributing perhaps to the comfort of the naval commanders of the enemy on our coast, it may have been done. That the enemy should entice the poor people who inhabit the seacoast, to furnish him with vegetables, poultry, and small articles of this sort, was to be expected. Nor can the act of yielding to the temptation of a high price be justly considered either unnatural or highly criminal, when we reflect upon the unprotected state in which those people have been left. And remember, that if such articles are not furnished voluntarily, they might and certainly would be taken forcibly. And shall we destroy what remains of the commerce of this great community for such a cause as this? If, then, there is no evidence before us of the fact, shall we presume it? No, we ought not. I do not believe, I will not suffer myself to believe, (in the absence of testimony and personal knowledge,) that the citizens of this country supply the enemy with the means of carrying on the war on our coasts. I consider the accusation as unfounded; and instead of acting upon it as a truth, will, unless I have further information, repel it as false.

Let me ask, if this unlawful traffic has been carried on to the enormous extent contended for, why have the laws been permitted to slumber over it? Why has not the criminal (as my honorable friend from New York, Mr. GROSVENOR, said yesterday) been exposed, arraigned, punished and disgraced? There has not been a conviction to my knowledge, for this offence, within the limits of the United States. Surely our Government, with its tribe of officers and dependents, would have discovered the guilty. Had the guilt have been committed, our independent courts and jurymen would have punished the offender. The offence then must have been rarely committed, if it ever has been committed.

In New Jersey, there are as many facilities for carrying on this commerce as anywhere. We have a seaboard extending from the Capes of Delaware to Sandy Hook, inhabited by many poor people, along which the British squadron has been cruising from the time when war was first declared. But I have never heard, nor do I believe, that the enemy has received from New Jersey any supplies important in the war. Though it is very likely that he may have obtained some accommodation of the trifling nature I have alluded to. But, even of this, I have no direct information or personal knowledge. This bill then wants the fundamental fact on which it has been recommended to us. If this ostensible cause furnishes the real motive for this procedure, it is enough to induce us to vote against it, that we have neither evidence, knowledge, or well-founded belief of the existence of that cause as a fact. But suppose that we, too, assume the fact, that our people do trade largely and criminally with the enemy, furnishing him with provisions for his fleet and army. Is embargo the proper remedy? Is the fruit to be expected from it worth the mighty sacrifice which will attend it? Will it, as is asserted, "shorten the war?"

The proper reward of guilt is punishment—but it is the guilty man only who should be punished. If your laws are inefficient, revise and amend them. If your officers are careless, remove them and appoint those who are more vigilant. But do not punish a whole people because of a few sinners. In regard to its operation on the war—is there any foundation for the supposition that the enemy cannot sustain it without the aid they receive from our citizens? What great warlike nation, armed at all points, was ever starved into a peace? It is true, that it might be put to additional trouble and expense; but that this war will be carried on against us as extensively and effectually, after the passage of this bill as before, until we abandon the system, a few months will I fear abundantly evince. All history, as well as our own observation, must convince us that such projects produce effects directly the reverse of what their authors intend. Such an attempt was made on France by Britain, in an early stage of the French Revolution. Then a great scarcity prevailed in France, and the British Minister attempted to coerce her into submission by cutting off her foreign supplies. But what was the consequence? Did it "shorten the war" and bring France to terms? The very reverse actually happened; the spirit of the nation was roused; every foot of ground was cultivated; plenty returned; the plan was rendered abortive, and has been justly considered the weakest that was ever attempted by the Minister who conceived it. The British is the last nation to be materially affected by this scheme, and it is vanity itself to imagine that she will yield to such a pressure. The time also that we have selected, is the most unfortunate that could have been chosen for the experiment. Britain is now allied against France with all the other great continental Powers; her fleets still command the ocean; the granaries of Europe are open to her; through the Baltic she may command the wheat of the North; the isles and countries bordering on the Mediterranean offer an abundant supply, upon as good terms as those at which it could be obtained here; her own harvests have been for the last year most abundant; and can we reasonably expect to "shorten a war" began by ourselves, with such a nation, by such means? No! it is mere delusion. Distress our own people we may, and certainly will, by such expedients; but if we do not end this war until the embargo gives us peace, we shall wage it ad Græcas Calendas. We shall not even take our enemy by surprise. He is not only apprized of our disposition to starve him, but has already felt what our restrictive energies can perform, and past experience should have taught us how worthless and destructive such a policy is. We began this sort of warfare in 1806. Then we prohibited the importation of certain articles, selected very wisely, expecting to distress her great manufacturers, but it produced nothing. In 1808 we called to our aid embargo; that was to starve her islanders; we kept it up until we were tired of it, then abandoned it, and were laughed at by the British Minister. We next resorted to non-intercourse, both with England and France. This neither coerced England, nor satisfied France; and finally we were obliged to declare war. Let us no longer be deceived. If we mean to conquer peace, (as the fashionable phrase is;) if we mean to attempt to "shorten the war" by any efforts of our own, let them be noble and manly. Let us cherish (as far as we get any) our commerce; to replenish our treasury; to enable our citizens to support the burdens imposed, and to be imposed upon them; unrestrained by too much regulation it will take care of itself. Let us sacredly obey the Constitution and laws, in war as well as in peace, whatever we may think of their justice or policy. Let us face the enemy like men. Meet an invading foe on the shore of our seas, and let that be the field of battle. Let those who made this war; those who delight in a war of invasion and conquest; those who aspire to the honor of being the founders of the great Western Commercial Empire, which will reach from Halifax through the Canadas and Lakes to New Orleans; let these men shorten the war on the ramparts of Quebec. Thither let the brave Western militia (who have covered themselves with unfading glory) resort. Happily, on their route, they may fall in with their brethren of the standing army; be able to inspire its Generals with wisdom and concord, and infuse into the men a portion of their own martial spirit. Then may our people forget the errors which have attended our career; this army redeem itself from disgrace, and the American name be as famous for deeds of valor on the land, as it is already for those performed on the ocean.

It is worthy the grave attention of this Committee to consider what will be the operation of this measure upon ourselves; for if its tendency is to injure us more than the enemy, we ought not to adopt it. By this measure, we shall give a most severe blow to the farming interest from Supplemental Journal—Embargo.

Carolina to New England. Yes; the interest of that large and valuable portion of our community—the bone and nerve of the body politic—is sacrificed by this bill. The wheat and corn market will be destroyed. Wheat now commands from one hundred and fifty to two hundred and fifty cents a bushel. After this law shall have been in operation a few months, the price will be merely nominal. The crops of the next season will find no market. All our trade, internal as well as external, is by this act placed under the Presidential ban. Even one part of our country in want, will not be able to obtain its supplies from another, where the article may be rotting in warehouses. The member from Louisiana informed us yesterday, that this would probably be the condition of the people in the neighborhood of Mobile. But he was gravely answered by the honorable Speaker, that if such cases occurred, the people must remove to a more plentiful country! What I have said of wheat, and of the middle States, applies to every other article of country produce, and to every farmer in the United States. We shall take from him the fair price of his labor, which has enabled him hitherto to maintain and educate his children. You take it from him, too, at a time when he is taxed almost for the air which he breathes. But the mischief is still greater in particular States. By this fatal measure, you unite with the enemy in depriving many in the Eastern States of their living, of their employments, without which they can scarcely exist. A large portion of that community live by commerce; their land is cold and sterile, but their minds and bodies active and strong; they live by the ocean. Is it an object of this bill to take from them their all, because the enemy have not yet done so?

By this bill we shall reduce them from affluence to poverty; we place before them the sad alternative of breaking through the restraints of this law or starving; and are we not about to incur a most fearful risk? It appears to me, that this measure leads to consequences the most alarming; and of which I will not permit myself to speak. But I do conjure the gentlemen of the majority to pause for one moment and reflect; I conjure all who, with me, consider the Union of these States as the ark of our political safety, and therefore to be cherished beyond all other objects; I conjure every patriotic man to take care how he adopts so rash an expedient. There is a point beyond which freemen will not be compelled to go; but I forbear.

This fatal measure will not only destroy the whole of the export trade which the enemy may leave us, but also our import trade. We impoverish the Treasury, and tax most enormously every citizen in his consumption of foreign articles of the first necessity. What neutral will come to our ports when he cannot take away a return either in specie or produce? None. He will desert these inhospitable shores, and betake himself to other markets. The current of trade will be essentially and perhaps permanently changed. Our already exhausted Treasury will be deprived of millions of dollars now so much wanted for the public exigencies. And articles, by long habits, become necessities of life—such as sugar, tea, &c., will, like your penalties, be quadrupled in price. Let us not destroy our own children, that we may inflict a light stroke upon the enemy.

What I have said, in regard to the alleged trade with the enemy, and its probable operation on the war here, had no reference to the provision trade carried on through neutral ports, and which may ultimately be applied to the use of the armies serving against the French in the Peninsula. By prohibiting this trade, (as this bill does,) we may perhaps distress the allied army, and for a short time paralyze its efforts. But let me ask gentlemen whether this is the real object, masked under a charge against our citizens of illegally trading with the enemy? Have we indeed been conducted by the invisible hand to this point? Do we really wish to be the open aiders and abettors of the Iron King in his wicked war against Portugal and Spain? Do we really desire to throw our mite, our little spiteful mite, into the scale of the tyrant, against nations fighting for their native land to repel an usurping invader? I hope not, sir. This is not the sentiment of the nation, yet this bill will effect all that can be covertly done by this Government in aid of the French. But even this effort, unwise as it is, will be ineffectual. The cause of Spain and Portugal will succeed; we may embarrass their operations for a moment, but other nations will gladly supply what we shall withdraw. And is this the time to unite our efforts with those of the French? The cause of the tyrant is on the wane; Europe has arisen from her slumbers, and is in arms. Whilst we are adding another knot to the "magic cord" with which he has encircled us—which was to have been cut, but has not been cut by the sword of war—whilst we are affixing our empty rattling "canister to the tail of the beast," the huntsmen are in sight; the extended spear may reach him; he dies, or he lives to devour us. Mistaken, disastrous policy! Thus to throw the weight of a free people into the scale of the oppressor of the world, who has forever returned our caresses by injustice and insult! It does really appear to me, that the passage of this bill, connected with other matters recommended for adoption, in the President's confidential Message, (for this is only the first act of the drama,) we are to be made principal actors in the great continental plan of conquering England by destroying her commerce. And shall we meanly come in at the expiring end of this abortive scheme, to receive and to merit the chastisement of a world? This embargo is only a part of the Executive plan; this bill was brought into the House by the Committee of Foreign Relations as a report in part. The President has advised us to prohibit the importations from neutral ports, of such fabrics as are usually made in England. When this recommendation shall also become a law, he need only add a power in the collectors to burn all goods which they suspect to be of English manufacture, and we have the French system in its very essence.

But, sir, it is not merely to the general principles and policy of this bill that I object; its details, also, present to my mind most serious grounds of complaint. They are strange and alarming, overturning principles fundamental to our free institutions, and exposing the persons and property of the citizens to arbitrary sway. Having had no opportunity to examine this bill, (the House refusing yesterday to print it,) my recollection of its particular provisions may not be precisely correct. I can therefore only present to the view of the Committee a few general objections to the form which has been given to it. In the first place, the penalties appear to me to be unreasonably severe, and disproportionate—making no discrimination between different degrees of guilt—taking from the courts the common power to graduate the degrees of punishment, and apportion them to the circumstances of each case, involving all who transgress one "tittle" of the law in indiscriminate ruin. Every law should have a proper sanction to secure its execution; every crime should be punished so as to reclaim the offender, or deter others from doing the like. All beyond this is abuse of power. The American people have shown much concern on this important point. They have expressed their disapprobation of severe punishment by generally ameliorating their criminal codes. This bill confiscates the vessel and cargo, the carriage and goods of every man who infringes its provisions; and superadds a penalty of four-fold the value of the whole! This is the rule even in cases where the vessel, or carriage and goods, are seized and confiscated. This is enormous, and beyond all bounds of justice and reason. Besides, there is no discrimination between the case of him who shall break this law with the criminal intent to aid the enemy, and him who may attempt to send away his goods to a neutral port, to save himself from ruin. And yet no one can pretend that the grade of criminality is the same. This bill also invests the President, and through him the custom-house officers, with powers of vast extent, affecting the personal rights and property of our citizens, contrary to the spirit and letter of our Constitution and laws. Custom-house officers may enter houses and seize the property of any man whom they shall see fit to suspect. They may even interrupt the transportation by land, of the produce of the country from one place to another, within the United States, (a branch of business now of the utmost importance,) under pretence that a wagon is going towards a port from which the goods might be exported—or towards a place in the possession of the enemy. The President's orders constitute the law of the land, going as far as a law of Congress can give full and entire protection to the person executing such orders.

The good old rule which we received from our ancestors, and to be found in Magna Charta, that no freeman shall be passed upon either in person or property but by due course of law, is lost sight of, and the American people are placed under the dominion of a single man. But this is not the most deformed picture of the bill; the means by which these formidable powers are to be executed, are still more dangerous and alarming. The collectors and custom-house officers (famous in history for acts of oppression) may call to their aid military force, whenever they see fit, without control or responsibility. This prostrates at once the liberty of the people; it is executing civil process by military power, where no actual resistance has been made to the civil authority. There is no shield interposed between the breast of the citizen and the bayonet of the soldier; all depends on the discretion of a custom-house officer. A host of petty tyrants will desolate the land, and woe be to him who shall incur their resentment; they have only to point out an individual as an object of suspicion, and the military force raised to defend his rights may assault his castle and seize his person. This strikes at the root of our free institutions; it is proclaiming martial law; it is repugnant to the Constitution and laws of this nation. The Constitution invests Congress with power "to call forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union." Military force cannot be resorted to originally, not even the militia force; much less can a mercenary army be at once called in. Within this section a military force can only be used when the civil power has been found to be incompetent. The act of Congress passed during the first Administration, to give effect to this Constitutional provision, expressly requires a judicial certificate from a judge of the United States that the civil authority is incompetent, before the militia can be "called forth." But the bill before us contains no such provision; military force may be resorted to in all cases at the discretion of the collectors. And let me ask, if it has been reserved for these gentlemen, formerly so watchful of the liberty of the people, so alarmed at every extension of Executive power, to do more to destroy the one and extend the other, than they have ever accused their opponents of intending? I move, sir, that this bill be amended, by striking out its first section.

Mr. PITKIN said, he was highly gratified that his honorable friend from New Jersey, had moved to strike out the first section, for the express purpose of trying the principle of the bill.

From the tenor of the President's Message recommending this measure, as well as from the bill itself, he was satisfied that an embargo was now to be laid, to continue during the present war; and that, so far as it depended on the power of the Government, all intercourse was to be stopped between the United States and the rest of the world, during that period. As to the duration of the war, it was beyond the reach of ordinary calculation. If, as some gentlemen have declared, both in and out of this House, peace is not to be made until the Canadas and Nova Scotia are conquered and ceded to us by treaty, the period of the termination of the war is far distant indeed.

The embargo is recommended by the President, as a measure necessary, in order to prevent all intercourse with the enemy, not only on our frontiers and along our coasts, but also to prevent any indirect trade with them, by means of neutrals, in all parts of their dominion, and thereby distressing them to that degree as to induce them to make peace.

He had thought that this new system of warfare, by embargo and non-intercourse, had been tried and found wanting. He well remembered, when war was in fact declared, it was stated by its advocates that the restrictive system was to be abandoned.

We are now, however, said Mr. P., not only to have war, with all its calamities, but, during the continuance of it, we are also to superadd all the evils of an embargo, and a complete non-intercourse with all the world.

He begged the Committee to consider, in the first place, whether the effects and operation of this measure upon the enemy, would be such as was contemplated; and, in the next place, to reflect upon the effects and operation of it upon ourselves.

That the enemy in Canada, and along our coast, have been furnished by our citizens, as well as by neutrals, with some articles of provisions, was not to be doubted; but, would it for a moment be believed, if those supplies could be entirely prevented, that the armies of the enemy would be obliged to leave Canada, or their fleets compelled to abandon our coasts?

They might not, indeed, have all the conveniences, but they would have all the necessities of life. Their ships have always a large supply of beef, pork, and ship bread, sufficient for almost any length of time they might remain here. But if the laws now in force are insufficient to prevent these supplies, will an embargo produce this effect? Mr. P. said, he would never approve or justify the conduct of any of our citizens in trading with the enemy. Those who are thus guilty are now punishable, not only with the loss of their property, but are also liable to a fine and imprisonment. Let the law be enforced upon the offenders with the utmost rigor, but do not punish a whole community, on account of the criminality of a few individuals. You may pass what laws you please, this intercourse cannot be entirely prevented. When the temptation from a prospect of gain is so great, and this temptation will be much greater from the effects of the embargo itself, individuals will always be found, whose patriotism will be unable to resist it.

In favor of this measure it is also urged that, by permitting our provisions and raw materials to depart from our ports, they find their way either directly or indirectly to the ports of the enemy, and that British manufactures also, through various channels, find their way into our ports, by which means the enemy are, in a great measure, relieved from the pressure of the war.

To prevent this, and thereby to compel the enemy to listen to overtures of peace, on our own terms, all intercourse with any part of the world is to be prohibited.

It is unfortunate, said Mr. P., that past experience has not taught us lessons of political wisdom on this subject. For many years, England and America have been the only considerable commercial nations in the world. With a tonnage almost equal to that of Great Britain, superior to that of all the rest of Europe besides, our merchants, when neutral, were almost without a rival in every market. The vessels of the United States are driven from the ocean, and locked up in our own ports. Great Britain has the commerce of the world at her command, with the exception of that of the United States, and of those countries under the immediate control of the Emperor of France. The North of Europe, by way of the Baltic, is now open to her. The extensive countries bordering on this sea, furnish a market for a large proportion of her manufactures, and from whence also she is able to draw large supplies; and, whatever opinions may be formed as to the result of the present campaign in the North of Europe, we may safely calculate that the "frightful climate" of Russia will not again soon be encountered by the French armies. While Russia, therefore, is open to British commerce, her manufactures will find their way, not only into that country, but into the interior of Europe.

The Mediterranean and the Black Sea are also open, and from the countries bordering on these, she can, and does, obtain large quantities of wheat flour. Whatever trade Africa may have, it is at the command of the British; and the whole trade of the East Indies, the East India Islands and China, are entirely in her possession, and under her control. Add to these, the Brazils, the Spanish West Indies, and the whole of Spanish America. With this extensive commercial range, who can seriously believe that our embargo, even though enforced at the point of the bayonet, can bring such distress upon her fleets and armies, or upon her West India Islands, or can so injure her manufactures, as that Great Britain will be compelled to sue for peace? But, said Mr. P., the effects and operation of this measure upon our own country, and upon our citizens, ought not to escape our attention. With an embargo, limited in duration to the end of this war, what, in the meantime, is to become of the rest of the surplus produce of our soil? It must rot upon our hands, or our citizens must be driven to different objects of pursuit. There are three great interests in this country—the agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing. Such interests, instead of being opposed, do, in fact, mutually support, and are supported by, each other; and it is the duty of a wise Legislature to give all proper encouragement and protection to them all. Neither should be sacrificed to promote the prosperity of the other. Spread, as our citizens are, over an extensive country, reaching almost from the polar to the tropical regions—a country, differing materially in soil, in climate, and in productions; these different interests, in different sections, have more or less predominated among them. Cut off from all intercourse with the rest of the world, the agricultural as well as the commercial interest of our citizens, will, in a great measure, be sacrificed. What is to become of the great staples of our country? The cotton, tobacco and rice, of the South; the wheat and flour of the Middle States; and the lumber, beef, pork, corn, corn meal, and (he was about to add, said Mr. P., the fisheries, but these the war has already annihilated) of the North and East. The price of all these, as well as others, the produce of our soil, must be greatly reduced, or the quantity diminished to that of our own consumption, while, at the same time, the price of all those articles for which we are, and must be dependent upon foreign nations, such as sugar, coffee, teas, &c., which are now considered as necessities of life in every family, must be enhanced beyond all calculation.

Although the effects of this embargo and non-intercourse will be felt severely in almost every part of the United States, yet, said Mr. P., it must fall with peculiar hardship on those States where a great proportion of our shipping is owned, and which have sometimes been called the navigating States. The war, it is true, has already, in a great measure, destroyed their navigation; and the embargo now comes in to complete the destruction of that part which the war had left them. In 1810, the whole tonnage of the United States was estimated to be 1,424,781, and of this the New England States and the State of New York owned 881,840, leaving, for all the other States, but 542,944, and of this whole tonnage, Massachusetts alone owned 495,203.

In nearly two hundred years have the people of Massachusetts and the East been accustomed to obtain a subsistence for themselves and families, by commerce. Situated, as many of them are, along the seacoast, on a hard, sterile soil, and in a severe climate, their ships are their all. Deprived of these, they have nothing left. Can you expect, said Mr. P., to change the habits of these people, or to stop them in those pursuits to which they have so long been accustomed? As well might you attempt to change the regular succession of Summer and Winter, of day and night; as well might you attempt to stop the ebbing and flowing of the sea.

But, said Mr. P., let gentlemen also seriously reflect upon the effects this measure must necessarily have upon the revenue of the country. All exportation being prohibited, importations, of course, must soon cease. Indeed, the President's Message recommends what will amount almost to a total prohibition of imports as well as exports.

Additional direct taxes and internal duties, to a large amount, are the only sources of revenue to which we can resort. The late Secretary of the Treasury, as well as the Committee of Ways and Means, have hitherto considered it as indispensably necessary to raise a sum annually, which should be sufficient to pay the interest and reimbursement of the public debt, to defray the ordinary peace expenses of the Government, and also to pay the interest of the war loans. The sums necessary for the two first objects have been estimated at between nine and ten millions of dollars; and the interest of the war loans, at the close of the present year, cannot be less than three millions. The amount of the double duties on imports was estimated at five millions of dollars; the residue was to be derived from the direct tax, and from the internal duties imposed during the last session of Congress, together with the proceeds of the public lands.

To make good the deficiency of the imports, and to pay the increasing interest of the war loans, an additional sum of not less than five millions of dollars must be raised, either by direct taxes, or from other internal resources. How, it may be asked, can the people of this country, with little or no market for their produce, and with the enhanced prices of all foreign articles, pay annually by internal taxes the enormous sum of from ten to twelve millions of dollars?

The President, in his Message at the opening of the present session, has told us that "the war is illustrating the capacity and the destiny of the United States, to be a great, a flourishing, and a powerful nation."

That the United States, if left to themselves, are destined to be great, flourishing, and powerful, few, perhaps, will doubt. But, sir, they are not to become so by embargoes and non-intercourse. They are not to become so by a system which goes to paralyze and destroy the energies of the nation. They are not to become either great or powerful, by the exercise of the passive, but by calling into operation the active virtues of their citizens.

As this war is said to be waged for free commerce and sailors' rights, let the merchants employ their vessels in the trade, which is still left open to them; and let our sailors fight their way to a market, on that element where their rights have been infringed.

Mr. WHEATON said: The motion now under consideration being to strike out the first section of the bill before you, a decision upon which is to involve the fate of the whole, any observations touching its merits or demerits generally, it is presumed, will not be deemed to be out of order. Copies of it not having been laid upon our tables, as has been usual in all cases of considerable importance, I have had no opportunity of examining its details, nor do I want any. The sound of its very name is so grating to the ear, as to induce the belief that its picture cannot be very pleasing to the eye. The object contemplated by its projector, and which those that are determined to vote for it now have in view,—for advocates, it has none, no one having spoken in its favor—may not be very difficult to conjecture; and I really want no prophet to inform me what will be its consequences and effects; and were practising upon the principle of doing evil that good might come reconcilable to conscience, I am not certain that my voice would not be in support of it. But, doubting of the correctness of such a principle, and believing any aid from me will be unnecessary, with whatever cheerfulness I may acquiesce in the decision of the majority, I may excuse myself from being one of them. It ought not to be presumed that this measure is designed to relieve the enemy from the trouble and expense of blockading our ports, but to press him into a compliance with our wishes. That it will press hard upon the enemy, or harder upon ourselves, cannot be questioned; and, if it shall make him willing to offer us terms of peace, or us willing to accept of them, the fondest wish of my heart will have been attained. In the result of the former, I have no belief; in that of the latter, I entertain a strong hope. How is this to occasion any considerable pressure upon the enemy? Will it either frighten or starve them? Can it for a moment be believed, that a nation accustomed to war, and never forgetting what will be necessary in its progress, with the ocean at her command, and the resources of the world at her disposal, could ever have trusted to the scanty supplies that our citizens, however disposed, could, in the existing state of things, by any possibility, have afforded her? It would seem that the project of restricting commerce had been sufficiently tried, and that, by this time, we might be ready to shake off its shackles; but, as if trial could not teach us, nor proof convince us, we are still called upon implicitly to confide in that in which we have been confounded. Our Government may boast the original invention of this mode of warfare, and, though unpatented, there is no danger of its being pirated. From the experience we have had of the benefits resulting from its adoption, we need not be apprehensive that any other nation will follow the example. But, if its effects should not be felt by the enemy, none need fear that they will not be severely felt by us; and the consideration that no great good is to be attained, but through much tribulation, may induce an acquiescence in the measure. The war in which we are so unhappily engaged, though attended with some brilliant incidents, gives us no promises, by its successes hitherto, on which we can rely, of the attainment of any valuable object in relation to our foreign relations. And yet, strange to tell, it has acquired some degree of popularity with the very men originally opposed to it, while those of another class, the most clamorous for it at its commencement, are beginning to be tired of it. This madness wants a cure; and if we explore the causes of it, it can be little doubted that an effectual embargo will afford an effectual remedy. The war having opened a wide field for speculation, the men of property originally opposed to it, impatient of remaining in that idle situation into which it had thrown them, have at last made adventures of their money in a war state of things; they therefore cannot wish its termination till they find a beneficial result to their speculation. The farmers in the country, by the very high price which their produce has commanded, have been able to watch the holders of foreign goods, as well as those engaged in manufacturing them at home. Therefore it is, that they also, feeling very little inconvenience from the war at present, have no great objection to its continuing a little longer. But an embargo, by raising the price of all foreign articles as well as home manufactures at once, will soon put a stop to these speculations. The dealers in these goods will have made a delusive profit, not being able to replace the same by the money they have got. The farmers, in consequence of the very reduced price of everything they have to sell, will become poor, besides being exposed to an enormous tax, by the use of everything they may have occasion to buy; and the manufacturer, by reason of the very high price of his stock, occasioned by the heavy expense of land transportation, cannot sell low; and the people, reduced to poverty, will be unable to buy. And thus the whole will unite in condemning the war and everything leading to it, as well as every measure adopted to aid and protract it, and will be willing once more to acquiesce in that high and honorable state of prosperity which they enjoyed before the dismal day in December, 1807, when the first mad project like unto this was attempted to be put in execution. But if war, taxes, and embargo, at once in operation, will not bring the people to their senses, there is every reason to fear that the good genius that has presided over this country, desponding of his charge, will give it over to absolute ruin.

The question was taken on striking out the first section, and negatived—yeas 52, nays 83, as follows:

Ordered, That the title be, "An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States."

Mr. GRUNDY and Mr. LEWIS were appointed a committee to carry the said bill to the Senate, and desire their concurrence therein.

THURSDAY, December 16.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the committee appointed to carry to the Senate the engrossed bill, entitled

"An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States," reported that the committee did, on Monday last, perform the duty assigned to them.

FRIDAY, December 17.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. BIBB, of Georgia, and Mr. BLEDSOE, a committee from that body, as follows:

Mr. Speaker: We are directed by the Senate to bring to this House the bill, entitled "An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States," which bill they have passed with sundry amendments, and in which we are directed to ask the concurrence of this House.

The said amendments were read at the Clerk's table: On which, the first of the said amendments was concurred in by the House.

And a motion was made by Mr. PITKIN to amend the second of the said amendments, by striking out these words: "and which shall not have nor take on board, for the voyage, any citizen of the United States, except such as may produce a passport therefor, to be furnished under the authority and direction of the President of the United States."

And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 51, nays 89, as follows:

Several propositions were submitted to the House by way of amendment to the said amendments of the Senate, all of which were rejected by the House: Whereupon, the said amendments of the Senate were severally concurred in by the House; and Mr. FISK, of New York, and Mr.

COOPER, were appointed a committee to give information thereof to the Senate.

[While the above bill was under discussion, Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, submitted the following observations upon his propositions to amend the bill; which were negatived:]

Mr. KING observed that it was not his intention or wish to consume much of the time of the House; that indeed from the silence of the majority he had a right to conclude that the arguments of his friends in the minority were unanswerable; that the majority were thereby convinced of the inexpediency of the measure, and would abandon it. However, as this silence is equivocal, and as I may have drawn too favorable a conclusion therefrom, I will add a few observations to those already advanced by my friends; but I shall not go over the ground which they have with such ability occupied; vain indeed would be the attempt to add to the general arguments which they have advanced; mine, therefore, shall be of a local nature, as to the probable bearing and effect of this measure upon that part of our country with which I am more particularly acquainted.

Since you have stricken from the bill, as originally reported, the seventh and eleventh sections, which permitted a limited coasting trade, it has become more harsh in its features, and its operation must be infinitely more oppressive. Pass the bill, sir, as it now stands, and it will not be possible for the inhabitants on the seaboard, in the Eastern section of the Union, to subsist for six months. The interior of that country may have, at the last very productive season, raised sufficient for their immediate support, but this is not the case on the seaboard; there they are in want of articles of the first necessity. A part of that country has been recently settled—other parts are not suitable for cultivation. The inhabitants have always been accustomed to draw their principal support from the ocean, from their fisheries, lumber, and coasting trade. It is thus they have been compelled to obtain their weekly and monthly supplies. I fear that gentlemen are not sufficiently acquainted with that part of our country, and do not realize the calamities they will, by this measure, inevitably bring upon it. With our extended seacoast, our rough, and in many parts, sterile country, it will, sir, be impossible by land to carry sufficient supplies into every part of the District of Maine; the state of our roads and the face of our country forbid it. You may with some facility proceed as far as the Kennebec; there, on the seaboard, you meet with a natural barrier to land carriage. Suppose you pass that river, and with difficulty proceed to the Penobscot; you must then transport your wagons thirty miles by water, or drive them for a long distance upon the margin of that river, over a broken and mountainous country; but if, with all this hazard, labor, and trouble, you pass the Penobscot, what will you then encounter? After leaving the vicinity of the river, you meet with few settlements, a thinly inhabited country, extensive wildernesses, with scarcely a track of the human foot through them. It is impossible, I repeat it, sir, that you should thus supply the wants and exigencies of that part of our country.

But an honorable gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) has said, if provisions cannot be transported by land to a people thus situated, they must go to the provisions; they must even quit their country, their farms, and their endeared firesides, and go to a more hospitable, more favorable climate.

[The gentleman from Kentucky here explained his observations, as having been confined to the thinly inhabited country near Mobile; that it was better that the inhabitants there should suffer some deprivations, or even be compelled to leave that part of the country, than that the enemy should receive essential supplies through them, or that the effective operations of an important measure should be prevented.]

Mr. KING continued: As, Mr. Chairman, a part of the District of Maine is, and other parts of our country may be, like Mobile, thinly inhabited and exposed to the same inconveniences in point of situation, the principle of the gentleman was equally applicable to the inhabitants of those parts of our country, and they fell of course under the same condemnation and proscription. At all events, sir, such must be the operation of this measure upon them. Pass this bill into a law, and enforce it in all its rigors and horrors, and they must emigrate or starve. But, indeed, sir, I do not think they will do or suffer either, until they shall have made use of all the means which God and nature have put into their hands for redress.

I know the people of Maine well. I was born among them. I am one of them, and feel a conscious pride in representing their interest, their feelings, and their views. Yes, sir, I well know their hardy sons; rough as their climate, unpolished as their country; treat them as freemen, and they are like their own ocean in a calm; but oppress them, treat them as slaves, and "the tempestuous sea of liberty" is not more violent and unmanageable. What must you expect from such a people when you attempt, with the stroke of a pen, to cut them off from all their accustomed modes of industry and enterprise? I suggest not this as a threat, but as a solemn caution to gentlemen how they raise a storm, which it will not be in their power to calm or direct.

I well remember the slander which has been industriously propagated against this people—of want of attachment to the Union—of a disregard of its Constitution and laws. But believe me, sir, if that Union ever be dissolved, it will not be for want of their attachment to it, but because this Government, the bond of that Union, discards them, and sacrifices their interest and their happiness, and turns protection into oppression. They do not disregard our Constitution or laws, but they do in vain look to them for that protection in the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property, which they have a right to expect and demand. Of most of their external commerce they have been for a long time deprived; their vessels, by thousands, are now rotting at their wharves, their sailors abandoned to misery and want; their fisheries, for which they are indebted to God and their own industry only, are ruined; and all by the restrictive and war acts of their rulers; and now the scanty, the miserable remnant of their once extensive and flourishing commerce, even their friendly coasting trade, from port to port and State to State, by which they earn their daily bread, is by this bill to be taken from them. Under your Constitutional right to regulate commerce, you will destroy all commerce, and drive our seamen into foreign service. Instead of free trade and sailors' rights, we have no trade and sailors' wrongs.

Permit me here, sir, as a necessary caution to gentlemen, as a solemn warning to this country, as an impressive lesson to the American people, to read a catalogue of these restrictive, not to say oppressive laws; I could wish deeply to engrave them on the hearts of my fellow-citizens, in perpetual remembrance of the causes of their sufferings.

No. 14. Mr. Madison.—And now, “A bill laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States.”

Here, sir, you have a catalogue of the restrictive acts of an American Congress, enacted ostensibly for the benefit of a free commercial people! If, sir, a parallel can be found in all the annals of ancient or modern despotism, (always excepting that of France,) of equal commercial oppression, let her abettors show it. Would to God I could erase from your statute books this record of oppression, with the same facility as I now cast this schedule of the acts from me, and tread it under foot. Sir, the American people cannot, they will not submit to be thus oppressed. You tempt them too far; you abuse their noble and generous nature; clouds and thick darkness may, for a time, rest upon their spirit and their patriotism, but, like the sun of heaven, they will burst forth with renovated splendor.

As an attempt to gain a partial relief for such of our fellow-citizens as are likely greatly to suffer by the suspension of the coasting trade, Mr. King moved to amend the fourth section of the bill so as to permit coasting vessels to go from one port in any State to another port in the same State.

And in favor of neutrals, who had been, or should be induced to visit our ports, Mr. K. also moved to amend the amendment of the Senate, by striking therefrom the following words, in the first section of the bill:

“Whose officers and crews shall consist wholly of such foreigners as did belong to nations in amity with the United States, at the time of the arrival of said ship or vessel in the United States, and which shall not have, nor take on board for the voyage, any citizen of the United States, except such as may produce a passport therefore, to be furnished under the authority and direction of the President of the United States.”

DECEMBER 17.—Four o'clock, P. M.

Mr. SKINNER, from the Joint Committee for Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined an enrolled bill, entitled "An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States," and had found the same to be truly enrolled: On which, the SPEAKER signed the said bill.

Ordered, That the said Committee of Enrolment do take the said bill to the Senate for the signature of their President.

MONDAY, December 20.

Mr. SKINNER, from the Joint Committee for Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee did, on Friday last, present to the President of the United States, for his approbation, an enrolled bill, entitled "An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States."

A Message was received from the President, of the United States, by Mr. Coles, his Secretary, notifying that the President did, on Friday last, approve and sign the abovementioned enrolled bill.

On motion of Mr. OAKLEY,

Ordered, That the injunction of secrecy imposed upon the Message from the President of the United States, of the 9th instant, as well as upon all the proceedings of this House, growing out of the said Message, be taken off; and that the said Message and proceedings be published.

To the House of Representatives :

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report of the Secretary of State, containing the information requested by their resolutions of the 21st of June last.

JAMES MADISON.

JULY 12, 1813.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
July 12, 1813.

The Secretary of State, to whom were referred several resolutions of the House of Representatives of the 21st ultimo, requesting information on certain points relating to the French decree of the 28th of April, 1811, has the honor to make to the President the following report :

In furnishing the information required by the House of Representatives, the Secretary of State presumes that it might be deemed sufficient for him to state what is now demanded, what part thereof has been heretofore communicated, and to supply the deficiency. He considers it, however, more conformable to the views of the House, to meet, at this time, without regarding what has been already communicated, every inquiry, and to give a distinct answer to each, with the proper explanation relating to it.

The House of Representatives has requested information when, by whom, and in what manner, the first intelligence was given to this Government of the decree of the Government of France, bearing date on the 28th of April, 1811, and purporting to be a definitive repeal of the decrees of Berlin and Milan; whether Mr. Russell, late Chargé d'Affaires of the United States to the Government of France, ever admitted or denied to his Government the correctness of the declaration of the Duke of Bassano to Mr. Barlow, as stated in Mr. Barlow's letter of the 12th of May, 1812, to the Secretary of State, that the said decree had been communicated to his (Mr. Barlow's) predecessor there; and to lay before the House any correspondence with Mr. Russell on that subject which it may not be improper to communicate; and also any correspondence between Mr. Russell, in possession of the Department of State; whether the Minister of France to the United States ever informed this Government of the existence of the said decree, and to lay before the House any correspondence with the said Minister relative thereto, not improper to be communicated, with any other information in possession of the Executive, which he may not deem it injurious to the public interest to disclose, relative to the said decree, tending to show at what time, by whom, and in what manner, it was first made known to this Government, or to any of its representatives or agents; and lastly, to inform the House whether the Government of the United States has ever received from that of France any explanation of the reasons of that decree being concealed from this Government and its Minister, for so long a time after its date; and if such explanation has been asked by this Government, and has been omitted to be given by that of France, whether this Government has made any remonstrance, or expressed any dissatisfaction to the Government of France at such concealment?

These inquiries embrace two distinct objects. The first relates to the conduct of the Government of France, in regard to this decree. The second, to that of the Government of the United States. In satisfying the call of the House on this latter point, it seems to be proper to meet it in a two-fold view: first, as it relates to the conduct of this Government in this transaction; secondly, as it relates to its conduct towards both belligerents, in some important circumstances connected with it. The resolutions do not call specially for a report of such extent; but as the measures of the Executive, and the acts of Congress founded on communications from the Executive, which relate to one of the belligerents, have, by necessary consequence, an immediate relation to the other, such a report seems to be obviously comprised within their scope. On this principle the report is prepared, in the expectation that the more full the information given on every branch of the subject, the more satisfactory will it be to the House.

The Secretary of State has the honor to report, in reply to these inquiries, that the first intelligence which this Government received of the French decree of the 28th of April, 1811, was communicated by Mr. Barlow, in a letter bearing date on the 12th of May, 1812, which was received by this Department on the 13th of July following; that the first intimation to Mr. Barlow of the existence of that decree, as appears by his communications, was given by the Duke of Bassano in an informal conference on some day between the 1st and 10th day of May, 1812, and that the official communication of it to Mr. Barlow was made on the 10th of that month, at his request; that Mr. Barlow transmitted a copy of that decree, and of the Duke of Bassano's letter announcing it, to Mr. Russell, in a letter of May 11, in which he also informed Mr. Russell that the Duke of Bassano had stated that the decree had been duly communicated to him; that Mr. Russell replied, in a letter to Mr. Barlow of the 29th of May, that his first knowledge of the decree was derived from his letter, and that he has repeatedly stated the same since to this Government. The paper marked A is a copy of an extract of Mr. Barlow's letter to the Department of State of May 12, 1812;* B, of the Duke of Bassano's letter to Mr. Barlow of the 10th of the same month;* C, of an extract of Mr. Barlow's letter to Mr. Russell of May 11th; D, of an extract of Mr. Russell's answer of the 29th of May; and E, of Mr. Russell's letter to the Department of State of the 30th.

The Secretary of State reports, also, that no communication of the decree of the 28th of April, 1811, was ever made to this Government by the Minister of France, or other person than as above stated, and that no explanation of the cause of its not having been communicated to this Government, and published, at the time of its date, was ever made to this Government, or, so far as it is informed, to the representatives or agents of the United States in Europe. The Minister of France has been asked to explain the cause of a proceeding apparently so extraordinary and exceptionable; who replied, that his first intelligence of that decree was received by the Wasp, in a letter from the Duke of Bassano of May 10, 1812, in which he expressed his surprise that a prior letter, of May, 1811, in which he had transmitted a copy of the decree, for the information of this Government, had not been received. Further explanations were expected from Mr. Barlow, but none were given. The light in which this transaction was viewed by this Government was noticed by the President in his Message to Congress, and communicated also to Mr. Barlow in the letter of the 14th of July, 1812, with a view to the requisite explanation from the French Government. On the 9th of May, 1812, the Emperor left Paris for the North, and in two days thereafter the Duke of Bassano followed him. A negotiation for the adjustment of injuries and the arrangement of our commerce with the Government of France, long depending, and said to have been brought nearly to a conclusion at the time of Mr. Barlow's death, was suspended by that event. His successor, lately appointed, is authorized to resume the negotiation, and to conclude it. He is instructed to demand redress of the French Government for every injury, and an explanation of its motive for withholding from this Government a knowledge of the decree for so long a time after its adoption.

It appears, by the documents referred to, that Mr. Barlow lost no time, after having obtained a knowledge of the existence of the French decree of the 28th of April, 1811, in demanding a copy of it, and transmitting it to Mr. Russell, who immediately laid it before the British Government, urging, on the ground of this new proof of the repeal of the French decrees, that the British Orders in Council should be repealed. Mr. Russell's note to Lord Castlereagh bears date on the 20th of May; Lord Castlereagh's reply on the 23d, in which he promised to submit the decree to the consideration of the Prince Regent. (See papers marked F.) It appears, however, that no encouragement was given at that time to hope that the Orders in Council would be repealed in consequence of that decree; and that, although it was afterwards made the ground of their repeal, the repeal was, nevertheless, to be ascribed to other causes. Their repeal did not take effect until the 23d of June, more than a month after the French decree had been laid before the British Government; a delay indicating in itself, at a period so momentous and critical, not merely neglect, but disregard of the French decree. That the repeal of the British Orders in Council was not produced by the French decree, other proofs might be adduced. I will state one which, in addition to the evidence contained in the letters from Mr. Russell herewith communicated, marked G, is deemed conclusive. In the communication of Mr. Baker to Mr. Graham, on the 9th of August, 1812, marked H, which was founded on instructions from his Government, of as late date as the 17th of June, in which he stated that an official declaration would be sent to this country, proposing a conditional repeal of the Orders in Council, so far as they affected the United States, no notice whatever was taken of the French decree. One of the conditions then contemplated was, that the orders in Council should be revived at the end of eight months, unless the conduct of the French Government, and the result of the communications with the Government of the United States should be such as, in the opinion of the British Government, to render their revival unnecessary; a condition which proves uncontestedly that the French decree was not considered by the British Government a sufficient ground on which to repeal the Orders in Council. It proves, also, that, on that day the British Government had resolved not to repeal the Orders on the basis of that decree; since the proposed repeal was to depend, not on what the French Government had already done, but on what it might do, and on arrangements entered into with the

Relations with France.

United States, unconnected with the French repeal.

The French decree of the 28th of April, 1811, was transmitted to the United States by the Wasp, a public vessel, which had been long awaiting, at the ports of Great Britain and France, despatches from our Ministers relating to these very important concerns with both Governments. It was received at the Department of State on the 13th of July, 1812, nearly a month after the declaration of war against Great Britain. Intelligence of the repeal of the Orders in Council was not received until about the middle of the following month. It was impossible, therefore, that either of these acts, in whatever light they might be viewed, should have been taken into consideration, or have had any influence in deciding on that important event.

Had the British Government been disposed to repeal its Orders in Council, in conformity with the principle on which it professed to have issued them, and on the condition which it had itself prescribed, there was no reason to delay the repeal until such a decree as that of the 28th of April, 1811, should be produced. The declaration of the French Government of August 5, 1810, had fully satisfied every claim of the British Government, according to its own principles on that point. By it the decrees of Berlin and Milan were declared to be repealed, the repeal to take effect on the 1st of November following; on which day it did take effect. The only condition attached to it was, either that Great Britain should follow the example, and repeal her Orders in Council, or that the United States should carry into effect against her their non-importation act. This condition was, in its nature, subsequent, not precedent; reserving a right in France to revive her decrees, in case neither alternative was performed. By this declaration it was put completely in the power of Great Britain to terminate this controversy in a manner the most honorable to herself. France had yielded to her the ground on a condition with which she had declared her willingness to comply. Had she complied, the non-importation act would not have been carried into effect, nor could the French decrees have been revived. By refusing to comply, she has made herself responsible for all that has since followed.

By the decree of the 28th of April, 1811, the decrees of Berlin and Milan were said to be definitively repealed, and the execution of the non-importation act against Great Britain was declared to be the ground of that repeal. The repeal, announced by the declaration of the 5th of August, 1810, was absolute and final, except as to the condition subsequently attached to it. This latter decree acknowledges that that condition had been performed, and disclaims the right to revive it in consequence of that performance; and, extending back to the 1st of November, confirms, in every circumstance, the preceding repeal. The latter act, therefore, as to the repeal, is nothing more than a confirmation of the former. It is in this sense that those two acts are to be understood in France. It is in the same sense that they are to be regarded by other Powers. In repealing the Orders in Council on the pretext of the French decree of the 28th of April, 1811, the British Government has conceded that it ought to have repealed them on the declaration of the 5th of August, 1810. It is impossible to discriminate between the two acts, or to separate them from each other, so as to justify, on sound and consistent principles, the repeal of the Orders in Council on the ground of one act, and the refusal to repeal them on that of the other. The second act makes the repeal definitive; but for what reason? Because the non-importation act had been put in force against Great Britain, in compliance with the condition subsequently attached to the former repeal, and her refusal to repeal her Orders in Council. That act being still in force, and the decree of the 28th of April, 1811, being expressly founded on it, Great Britain repeals her Orders in Council on the basis of this latter decree. The conclusion is therefore irresistible, that by this repeal, under all the circumstances attending it, the British Government has acknowledged the justice of the claim of the United States to a repeal on the former occasion. By accepting the latter repeal, it has sanctioned the preceding one. It has sanctioned also the conduct of this Government in carrying into effect the non-importation act against Great Britain, founded on the preceding repeal.

Other important consequences result from this repeal of the British Government. By fair and obvious construction, the acceptance of the decree of the 28th of April, 1811, as the ground of the repeal of the Orders in Council, ought to be construed to extend back to the 1st of November, 1810, the day on which the preceding repeal took effect. The Secretary of State has full confidence that, if this question could be submitted to the judgment of an impartial judicial tribunal, such would be its decision. He has equal confidence that such will be the judgment pronounced on it by the enlightened and impartial world. If, however, these two acts could be separated from each other, so as that the latter might be made the basis of the repeal of the Orders in Council, distinct from the former, it follows that, bearing date on the 28th of April, 1811, the repeal ought to have relation to that date. In legal construction, between nations as well as individuals, acts are to be respected from the time they begin to operate; and where they impose a moral or political obligation on another party, that obligation commences with the commencement of the act. But it has been urged that the French decree was not promulgated or made known to the British Government until a year after its date. This objection has no force. By accepting an act bearing date a year before it was promulgated, it is admitted that, in the interval, nothing was done repugnant to it. It cannot be presumed that any Government would accept from another, as the basis on which it was to found an important measure, an act of anterior and remote date, pledging itself to a certain course of conduct, which that Government had, in the interval, departed from and violated. If any Government had violated an act, the injunctions of which it was bound to observe, by an anterior one in relation to a third party, and which it professed to have observed before its acceptance by the other, it could not be presumed that it would cease to violate it after the acceptance. The conclusion is irresistible, that, if the other Government did accept such act, with a knowledge of its antecedent violation, as the foundation of any measure on its own part, such act must have been the ostensible only, and not the real, motive to such measure.

The declaration of the Prince Regent of the 21st of April, 1812, is in full confirmation of these remarks. By this act of the British Government, it is formally announced, on the authority of a report of the Secretary of Foreign Affairs to the Conservative Senate of France, that the French decrees were still in force and that the Orders in Council should not be repealed. It cannot fail to excite considerable surprise that the British Government should immediately afterwards, that is, on the 23d of June, repeal its Orders in Council, on the ground of the French decree of the 28th of April, 1811. By this proceeding the British Government has involved itself in a manifest inconsistency. It has maintained by one act that the French decrees were in full force, and by another that they were repealed during the same space of time. It admits, also, that by no act of the French Government, or of its cruisers, had any violation of the repeal, announced by the declaration of the French Government of the 5th of August, 1810, been committed, or, at least, that such violation had not had sufficient weight to prevent the repeal of the Orders in Council.

It was objected that the declaration of the French Government of the 5th August, 1810, was not such an act as the British Government ought to have regarded. The Secretary of State is thoroughly satisfied that this objection is altogether unfounded. It was communicated by the Emperor through his highest official organ, the Secretary of Foreign Affairs, to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris. It is impossible to conceive an act more formal, authentic, or obligatory on the French Government than that alluded to. Does one Government ever ask or expect from another to secure the performance of any duty, however important, more than its official pledge, fairly and fully expressed? Can better security be given for its performance? Had there been any doubt on this subject, the conduct of Great Britain herself, in similar cases, would have completely removed it. The whole history of her diplomatic intercourse with other Powers, on the subject of blockade, is in accord with this proceeding of the French Government. We know that when her Government institutes a blockade, the Secretary of Foreign Affairs announces it to the Ministers of other Powers at London, and that the same form is observed when they are revoked. Nor was the authenticity of either act, thus announced, ever questioned.

Had a similar declaration been made by the Minister of France in the United States to this Government, by the order of his own, would it not have been entitled to respect, and been respected? By the usage of nations such respect could not have been withheld. The arrangement made with Mr. Erskine is a full proof of the good faith of this Government, and of its impartiality in its transactions with both the belligerents. It was made with that Minister on the ground of his public character, and the confidence due to it; on which basis the non-intercourse was removed as to England, and left in full force against France. The failure of that arrangement was imputable to the British Government alone, who, in rejecting it, took on itself a high responsibility, not simply in regard to the consequences attending it, but in disavowing and annulling the act of its Minister, without showing that he had exceeded his authority. In accepting the declaration of the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, in proof of the French repeal, the United States gave no proof of improper credence to the Government of France. On a comparison of both transactions it will appear, that if a marked confidence and respect was shown to either Government, it was to that of Great Britain. In accepting the declaration of the Government of France, in the presence of the Emperor, the United States stood on more secure ground than in accepting that of a British Minister in this country.

To the demand made by the United States of the repeal of the British Orders in Council, founded on the basis of the French repeal of August 5, 1810, the British Government replied, by demanding a copy of the orders issued by the French Government for carrying into effect that repeal; a demand without example in the intercourse between nations. By this demand it ceased to be a question whether the French repeal was of sufficient extent, or was founded on justifiable conditions. The pledge of the French Government was doubted; a scrutiny was to be instituted as to the manner in which it was to be discharged, and its faith preserved, not by the subsequent conduct of its cruisers towards the vessels of the United States, but by a copy of the orders given to its cruisers. Where would this end? If the French Government intended a fraud by its declaration of repeal, announced to the Minister of the United States, and afterwards to this Government, might it not likewise commit a fraud in any other communication which it might make? If credit was refused by the British Government to the act of the French Government, thus formally announced, is it probable that it would have been given by it to any document of inferior character, directed to its own people? Although it was the policy, and might be the interest of the British Government to engage the United States in such a controversy with the French Government, it was far from comporting with their interests to do it. They considered it their duty to accept the repeal already made by the French Government of its decrees, and to look to its conduct, and to that of its cruisers, sanctioned by the Government, for the faithful performance or violation of it. The United States having been injured by both Powers, were unwilling, in their exertions to obtain justice of either, to become the instrument of the other. They were the less inclined to it in the present instance, from the consideration that the party making the pressure on them maintained in full force its unlawful edicts against the American commerce, while it could not deny that a considerable advance at least had been made by the other towards a complete accommodation; it being manifest to the world, not only that the faith of the French Government stood pledged for the repeal of its decrees, but that the repeal did take effect on the 1st of November, 1810, in regard to the United States; that several American vessels taken under them had been delivered up; and judicial decisions suspended on all, by its order; and that it also continued to give the most positive assurances that the repeal should be faithfully observed.

It has also been urged that the French repeal was conditional, and for that reason could not be accepted. This objection has already been fully answered. It merits attention, however, that the acts of the British Government relating to this subject, particularly the declaration of the 21st April, 1812, and the repeal of that of the 23d June of the same year, are equally and in like manner conditional. It is not a little surprising that the British Government should have objected to a measure in another Government to which it has itself given a sanction by its own acts. It is proper, however, to remark, that this objection has been completely waived and given up by the acceptance of the decree of the 28th of April, 1811.

The British Government has urged, also, that it could not confide in the faithful performance by the French Government of any engagement it might enter into relative to the repeal of its decrees. This objection would be equally applicable to any other compact to be entered into with France. While maintained, it would be a bar to any treaty, even to a treaty of peace, between them. But it also has been admitted to be unfounded by the acceptance of the decree of the 28th April, 1811.

The Secretary of State presumes that these facts and explanations, supported as they are by authentic documents, prove: First, that the repeal of the British Orders in Council was not to be ascribed to the French decree bearing date on the 28th April, 1811; and, secondly, that in making that decree the basis of their repeal, the British Government has conceded that it ought to have repealed them on the ground of the declaration of the French Government of the 5th August, 1810, so as to take effect on the 1st November following. To what cause the repeal of the British Orders in Council was justly attributable cannot now remain a doubt with any who have marked, with a just discernment, the course of events. It must afford great consolation to the good people of these States to know that they have not submitted to privations in vain. The discussion of other wrongs, particularly that relating to impressment, had been closed some time before the period alluded to. It was unworthy the character of the United States to pursue the discussion on that difference, when it was evident that no advantage could be derived from it. The right was reserved to be brought forward and urged again when it might be done with effect. In the meantime, the practice of impressment was persevered in with rigor.

At the time when war was declared against Great Britain, no satisfactory arrangement was offered, or likely to be obtained, respecting impressment; and nothing was more remote from the expectation of this Government than the repeal of the Orders in Council. Every circumstance which had occurred tending to illustrate the policy and views of the British Government rendered such an event altogether improbable. From the commencement of that system of hostility which Great Britain had adopted against the United States, her pretensions had gradually increased, or at least become more fully unfolded, according to circumstances, until, at the moment when war was declared, they had assumed a character which dispelled all prospect of accommodation. The Orders in Council were said to have been adopted on a principle of retaliation on France, although at the time when the order of May, 1806, was issued, no measure of France had occurred on which it could be retaliatory; and at the date of the next order, (January, 1807,) it was hardly possible that this Government should have even heard of the decree of Berlin to which it related. It was stated at the time of their adoption, and for some time afterwards, that they should be revoked as soon as France revoked her decrees, and that the British Government would proceed with the Government of France pari passu in the revocation. After the declaration, however, of the French Government of the 5th August, 1810, by which the Berlin and Milan decrees were declared to be repealed, the British Government changed its tone, and continued to rise in its demands to the moment that war was declared. It objected, first, that the French repeal was conditional and not absolute; although the only condition attached to it was, that Great Britain should follow the example, or the United States fulfil their pledge, by executing the non-importation act against her. It was then demanded that France should repeal her internal regulations, as a condition of the repeal of the British Orders in Council; next, that the French repeal should be extended to all neutral nations as well as to the United States; and, lastly, that the ports of her enemies, and all ports from which the British flag was excluded, should be opened to British manufactures in American vessels; conditions so extravagant as to satisfy all dispassionate minds that they were demanded, not in the expectation that they would or could be complied with, but to terminate the discussion.

On full consideration of all circumstances, it appeared that the period had arrived when it became the duty of the United States to take that attitude with Great Britain which was due to their violated rights, to the security of their most important interests, and to their character as an independent nation. To have shrunk from the crisis would have been to abandon everything valuable to a free people. The surrender of our seamen to British impressment, with the destruction of our navigation and commerce, would not have been its only evils. The desolation of property, however great and widely spread, affects an interest which admits of repair. The wound is incurable only which fixes a stigma on the national honor. While the spirit of the people is unsubdued, there will always be found in their virtue a resource equal to the greatest dangers and most trying emergencies. It is in the nature of free Government to inspire in the body of the people generous and noble sentiments; and it is the duty of the constituted authorities to cherish and to appeal to those sentiments and to rely on the patriotic support of their constituents. Had they proved themselves unequal to the crisis, the most fatal consequences would have resulted from it. The proof of their weakness would have been recorded; but not on them alone would its baneful effect have been visited. It would have shaken the foundation of the Government itself, and even of the sacred principles of the Revolution, on which all our political institutions depend. Yielding to the pretensions of a foreign Power, without making a manly effort in defence of our rights; without appealing to the virtue of the people or to the strength of our Union, it would have been charged, and believed, that in these sources lay the hidden defects. Where would the good people of these States have been able to make another stand? Where would have been their rallying point? The Government of their choice having been dishonored; its weakness, and that of their institutions demonstrated, the triumph of the enemy would have been complete. It would also have been durable.

The constituted authorities of the United States neither dreaded nor anticipated these evils. They had full confidence in the strength of the Union, in the firmness and virtue of the people, and were satisfied, when the appeal should be made, that ample proof would be afforded that their confidence had not been misplaced. Foreign pressure, it was not doubted, would soon dissipate foreign partialities and prejudices, if such existed, and unite us more closely together as one people.

In declaring war against Great Britain, the United States have placed themselves in a situation to retort the hostility which they had so long suffered from the British Government. The maintenance of their rights was the object of the war. Of the desire of this Government to terminate the war on honorable conditions, ample proof has been afforded by the proposition made to the British Government, immediately after the declaration of war, through the Chargé d'Affaires of the United States at London, and by the promptitude and manner of the acceptance of the mediation of the Emperor of Russia. It was anticipated by some that a declaration of war against Great Britain would force the United States into a close connexion with her adversary, much to their disadvantage. The Secretary of State thinks it proper to remark, that nothing is more remote from the fact. The discrimination in favor of France, according to law, in consequence of her acceptance of the proposition made equally to both Powers, produced a difference between them in that special case, but in that only. The war with England was declared without any concert or communication with the French Government; it has produced no connexion between the United States and France, or any understanding as to its prosecution, continuance, or termination. The ostensible relation between the two countries is the true and only one. The United States have just claims on France for spoiliations on their commerce on the high seas, and in the ports of France; and their late Minister was, and their present Minister is, instructed to demand reparation for these injuries, and to press it with the energy due to the justice of their claims, and to the character of the United States. The result of the negotiation will be communicated to Congress in due time. The papers marked I contain copies of two letters, addressed from this Department to Mr. Barlow; one of the 16th June, 1812, just before the declaration of war; the other, of the 14th July following, which show distinctly the relation existing between the United States and France at that interesting period. No change has since occurred in it.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JAMES MONROE.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Copy of a letter from the Minister of Finance to the Count of Sussy, Counsellor of State, Director General of the Customs.

DECEMBER 15, 1810.

On the 5th of last August the Minister of Foreign Relations wrote to Mr. Armstrong, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, that the Berlin and Milan decrees were revoked, and that, after the 1st of November, they would cease to have effect; it being well understood that, in consequence of this declaration, the English would revoke their Orders in Council, and renounce the new principles of blockade which they wished to establish, or that the United States, in conformity to the act communicated, should cause their rights to be respected by the English.

On the communication of this note, the President of the United States issued, on the 2d of November, a proclamation, which announces the revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees after the 1st of November; and which declares that, in consequence thereof, all the restrictions imposed by the act of the 1st of May, 1809, should cease with respect to France and her dependencies.

The same day the Treasury Department addressed to the collector of the customs a circular, which directs them to admit into the ports and waters of the United States armed French vessels, and enjoins it on them to apply, after the 2d of February next, the law of the 1st of May, 1809, prohibiting all commercial relation to English vessels, of every description, as well as to productions of the soil, industry, or commerce of England and her dependencies.

His Majesty having seen in these two pieces the enunciation of the measures which the Americans propose taking on the 2d of February next, to cause their rights to be respected, has ordered me to inform you that the Berlin and Milan decrees must not be applied to any American vessels that have entered our ports since the 1st of November, or may enter in future; and that those which have been sequestered, as being in contravention of these decrees, must be the object of a special report.

On the 2d of February I shall acquaint you with the intention of the Emperor with regard to the definitive measures to be taken for distinguishing and favoring the American navigation.

I have the honor to salute you.

The Minister of Finance,

THE DUKE OF GAETE.

Copy of a letter from his Excellency the Grand Judge, Minister of Justice, to the Counsellor of State, President of the Council of Prizes.

French Empire.

PARIS, Dec. 26, 1810.

Mr. President: The Minister of Foreign Relations, by order of His Majesty the Emperor and King, addressed on the 5th of August last to the Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, a note containing the following words:

"I am authorized to declare to you that the decrees of Berlin and Milan are revoked, and that after the 1st of November they will cease to have effect; it being well understood, that in consequence of this declaration the English will revoke their Orders in Council, and renounce the new principles of blockade which they wished to establish; or that the United States, in conformity to the act you have just communicated, will cause their rights to be respected by the English."

In consequence of the communication of this note, the President of the United States issued, on the 2d of November, a proclamation, to announce the revocation of the decrees of Berlin and Milan, and declared that, in consequence thereof, all the restrictions imposed by the act of the 1st May must cease with respect to France and her dependencies. On the same day the Treasury Department addressed a circular to all the collectors of the customs of the United States, which enjoins them to admit into the ports and waters of the United States, armed French vessels; prescribes to them to apply, after the 2d of February next, to English vessels of every description, and to the productions arising from the soil and industry or the commerce of England and her dependencies, the law which prohibits all commercial relations, if at that period the revocation of the English Orders in Council, and of all the acts violating the neutrality of the United States, should not be announced by the Treasury Department.

In consequence of this engagement, entered into by the Government of the United States to cause their rights to be respected, His Majesty orders that all the causes that may be pending in the Council of Prizes of captures of American vessels made after the 1st of November, and those that may in future be brought before it, shall not be judged according to the principles of the decrees of Berlin and Milan, but that they shall remain suspended; the vessels captured or seized to remain only in a state of sequestration, and the rights of the proprietors being reserved for them until the 2d of February next, the period at which the United States having fulfilled the engagements to cause their rights to be respected, the said captures shall be declared null by the council, and the American vessels restored, together with their cargoes, to their proprietors.

Receive, Mr. President, the new assurances of my most distinguished consideration,

THE DUKE OF MASSA.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Barlow to Mr. Russell.

PARIS, May 11, 1812.

I have concluded to despatch the Wasp to England, expressly to carry to you the documents herewith enclosed.

I was not a little surprised to learn by the declaration of the Prince Regent in Council, of the 21st of April, that it was still believed by the British Government that the French decrees of Berlin and Milan yet remained in force, as applicable to the United States. On reading that declaration, I therefore addressed to the Duke of Bassano a note bearing date the 1st of May, of which I enclose you a copy.

This drew from him the answer of which I likewise hand you a copy, with the three documents that accompanied it. The most remarkable of these is the decree of the 28th April, 1811. This piece I had never before seen; it appears that it had not been published at the time of its date, and, not finding it among the archives of this Legation, I suspect that, by some omission or neglect, it was not communicated to you as it ought to have been. The Duke, however, assures me that it was so communicated. Be this as it may, I am convinced it has not been made known to the British Government.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Russell to Mr. Barlow.

LONDON, May 29, 1812.

Your letter of the 11th of this month, with its enclosures, was handed me on the 20th, and I immediately communicated copies of the letters from the French Minister of the 21st of December, 1810, and also of the decree of the 28th of April, 1811, to this Government. The letters were already known; but the decree, from th cause undoubtedly which you so justly assign, namely "an omission or neglect in not having communicated it to me," was entirely new.

The Duke of Bassano has unquestionably full faith in what he assures you, but the date of the decree is so very remote, that it is not surprising that our memories should not accord on the subject.

E.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Russell to Mr. Monroe.

LONDON, May 30, 1812.

With regard to the French decree of the 28th of April, 1811, Mr. Barlow, in a letter to me, makes the following remarks: "This piece I had never before seen; it seems that it had not been published at the time of its date; and not finding it among the archives of this Legation, I suspect that, by some omission or neglect, it was not communicated to you, as it ought to have been. The Duke assures me, however, that it was so communicated. Be this as it may, I am convinced it has not been made known to the British Government." I content myself with saying, that, until communicated to me by Mr. Barlow, I had never heard of such a thing. I persuade myself that there is no necessity of my adding any further explanation or comment on this strange business.

With great respect, I am, sir, &c.

JONATHAN RUSSELL.

Mr. Russell to Mr. Monroe.

LONDON, May 25, 1812.

SIR: I have the honor to hand you herein a copy of my note of the 20th of this month, communicating to Lord Castlereagh a decree of the French Government, dated the 28th of April, 1811, and two letters of the French Minister, of the 25th of December, 1810. I also send you copies of that decree and of a note from his Lordship, acknowledging the receipt of my communication, and engaging to submit the documents above mentioned to His Royal Highness the Prince Regent.

I have the honor to be, with profound respect, sir, your faithful servant.

JONATHAN RUSSELL.

The Hon JAMES MONROE, &c.

Mr. Russell to Lord Castlereagh.

18, BENTINCK STREET, May 20, 1812.

The undersigned, Chargé des Affaires of the United States of America, has the honor to transmit to Lord Castlereagh authentic copies of a decree purporting to be passed by the Emperor of the French on the 28th day of April, 1811; of a letter addressed by the French Minister of Finances to the Director General of the Customs, on the 25th day of December, 1810; and of another letter of the same date from the French Minister of Justice to the President of the Council of Prizes.

As these acts explicitly recognise the revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees in relation to the United States, and distinctly make this revocation to take effect from the 1st day of November, 1810, the undersigned cannot but persuade himself that they will, in the official and authentic form in which they are now presented to His Britannic Majesty's Government, remove all doubt with respect to the revocation in question, and, joined with all the powerful considerations of justice and expediency so often suggested, lead to a like repeal of the British Orders in Council, and thereby to a renewal of that perfect amity and unrestricted intercourse between this country and the United States which the obvious interests of both nations require.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to assure his Lordship of his highest consideration.

JONATHAN RUSSELL.

LORD VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH, &c.

NOTE.—For the enclosures, see correspondence between Mr. Barlow and the Duke of Bassano, communicated herewith.

Lord Castlereagh to Mr. Russell.

FOREIGN OFFICE, May 23, 1812.

Lord Castlereagh presents his compliments to Mr. Russell, and has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of his official note of the 21st instant, transmitting copies of two official letters of the French Minister, dated December 25, 1810, and of a decree of the French Government, bearing date the 28th of April, 1811.

Lord Castlereagh will immediately lay these documents before His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, and avails himself of this opportunity to renew to Mr. Russell the assurances of his high consideration.

JONATHAN RUSSELL, Esq., &c.

G.

Mr. Russell to Mr. Monroe.

LONDON, May 25, 1812.

SIR: The assassination of Mr. Perceval has led to a dissolution of his Ministry, and I hope may lead to an abandonment of his system, as far as we are concerned.

The vote on the motion of Mr. Stuart Wortley on the 21st, for an address to the Prince Regent to form a more efficient Administration, has driven the old Ministers to offer their resignation. The new arrangements are intrusted to Lord Wellesley, but nothing is yet effected.

Mr. Canning appears to be associated with his Lordship in this business, which I cannot consider as a circumstance very auspicious to us.

There will, undoubtedly, be much difficulty in forming the new Cabinet. None of the old Ministers will act under Lord Wellesley, he having so recently refused to act under them. Besides, there is considerable difference on essential points of policy. The members of Opposition have a repugnance to act under any leader not taken from their own ranks, and they certainly will not constitute a part of any Administration that does not adopt their system.

The probability therefore is, that either Lord

Relations with France.

Wellesley and Mr. Canning will not succeed in performing the task imposed upon them, or that they will perform it so imperfectly as to expose their work to early destruction.

Whatever may be the ingredients of which the new Cabinet may be composed, I am not altogether without hope that the Orders in Council will be modified, if not removed. The effects of our embargo, the evidence before Parliament of the distresses occasioned by those orders, and the change of Ministers itself, afford both cause and color for this proceeding.

I say nothing of the French decree, of which I this day send you a copy, as, without the circumstances just mentioned, it would, I am persuaded, have been disregarded.

I shall dismiss the Wasp as soon as the new Ministry is formed, or before, unless that event happens in a few days. She will return to Cherbouurg. With great respect, I am, &c.

JONATHAN RUSSELL.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Russell to Mr. Monroe.

LONDON, June 13, 1812.

The difficulty which has been encountered in forming a new Cabinet has appeared to render it necessary to support the old one; and upon this ground the House of Commons appear to have acted last evening, in giving to Ministers, on the second motion of Mr. Wortley, a majority of one hundred and twenty-five.

Notwithstanding these inauspicious circumstances, and all the prejudice of the men now in place respecting the United States, yet I know not how the Orders in Council can be maintained without the most serious consequences both to this Government and country. It is impossible, in the face of the evidence now before Parliament, to deny the vital importance of our intercourse to this nation; and, obstinate as the Ministry is, I do not entirely despair that it will be forced from its system, or from power. I have some slender hope that this evidence may, even on the motion of Mr. Brougham on Tuesday next, produce some change, although it hardly seems probable that the Ministers will allow the question to come on without the certainty of a triumph.

Mr. Russell to Mr. Monroe.

LONDON, June 18, 1812.

SIR: I hand you herein the Times of yesterday, containing the debate in the House of Commons on the preceding evening relative to the Orders in Council. From this debate, it appears that these measures are to be abandoned, but as yet no official extinction of them has been announced. The time already elapsed since the declaration of Lord Castlereagh, excites a suspicion that either the promised revocation will not take place, or, what is more probable, some other measure equally unjust is now under consideration to replace those which are to be revoked.

I hope, until the doings here are ascertained with certainty and precision, there will be no relaxation on our part.

With great respect, your obedient servant,
JONATHAN RUSSELL.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Russell to Mr. Monroe.

LONDON, June 30, 1812.

I have at length had the satisfaction to announce to you, in my letters of the 26th instant, the revocation of the Orders in Council.

You will, without doubt, be somewhat surprised that this revocation is founded on the French decree of the 28th of April, 1811.

The real cause of the revocation is the measures of our Government. These measures have produced a degree of distress among the manufacturers of this country that was becoming intolerable; and an apprehension of still greater misery, from the calamities of war, drove them to speak a language which could not be misunderstood or disregarded.

Many members of the House of Commons, who had been the advocates of the Orders in Council, particularly Mr. Wilberforce, and others from the northern counties, were forced now to make a stand against them, or to meet the indignation of their constituents at the approaching election. It is, therefore, the country, and not the Opposition, which has driven the Ministers to yield on this occasion; and the eloquence of Mr. Brougham would have been in vain, had it been destitute of this support.

What has now been done, has been most reluctantly done, and yielded to coercion instead of being dictated by a spirit of justice and conciliation. The Ministers were resolved to concede nothing until the last extremity. Lord Castlereagh undoubtedly went down to the House of Commons, on the 16th instant, determined to preserve the Orders in Council in their full force; and, when he perceived that he should be in the minority, he endeavored to compromise, by giving up as little as possible.

It was decided by the Cabinet, in consequence of the vague declarations of his Lordship on that night, to suspend the Orders in Council, and to make this suspension to depend upon conditions to be previously proposed to the United States. Driven from this ground by the motion of Mr. Brougham for the call of the House for Thursday, the 25th of this month, the Ministers at length issued the order of the 23d; and even this order was carried in the Cabinet by a small majority, only five members voting against it. With these facts before me, I feel myself constrained to chasten my exultation on what has taken place, with some fear of a return of the old injustice in a new form.

H.

Mr. Graham to Mr. Russell.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Aug. 9, 1812.

SIR: The Secretary left this city about ten days ago on a short visit to Virginia. Since that period, Mr. Baker has, in consequence of some despatches from his Government, addressed to Mr. Foster, made to me a communication respecting the intentions of his Government in regard to the Orders in Council. It was of a character, however, so entirely informal and confidential, that Mr. Baker did not feel himself at liberty to make it in the form of a note, verbal, or pro memoria, or even permit me to take a memorandum of it at the time he made it. As it authorizes an expectation that something more precise and definite, in an official form, may soon be received by this Government, it is the less necessary that I should go into an explanation of the views of the President in relation to it, more particularly as the Secretary of State is daily expected, and will be able to do it in a more satisfactory manner.

I refer you to the enclosed papers for information as to the maritime and military movements incident to the war, and will add, that the President is anxious to know, as soon as possible, the result of the proposals you were authorized to make to the British Government respecting an armistice. He considers them so fair and reasonable, that he cannot but hope that they will be acceded to, and thus be the means of hastening an honorable and permanent peace.

I have the honor, &c.

JOHN GRAHAM.

JONATHAN RUSSELL, Esq., &c.

Mr. Graham to Mr. Russell.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Aug. 10, 1812.

SIR: Thinking that it may possibly be useful to you, I do myself the honor to enclose a memorandum of the conversation between Mr. Baker and myself, alluded to in my letter of this date. From a conversation with Mr. Baker, since this memorandum was made, I find that I was correct in representing to the President that the intimation from Mr. Foster and the British authorities at Halifax was to be understood as connected with a suspension of hostilities on the frontiers of Canada. I have the honor, &c.

JOHN GRAHAM.

JONATHAN RUSSELL, Esq., &c.

[Memorandum referred to in the above letter.]

Mr. Baker verbally communicated to me, for the information of the President, that he had received despatches from his Government, addressed to Mr. Foster, (dated, I believe, about the 17th June,) from which he was authorized to say, that an official declaration would be sent to this country; that the Orders in Council, so far as they affected the United States, would be repealed on the 1st of August, to be revived on the 1st May, 1813, unless the conduct of the French Government, and the result of the communications with the American Government, should be such as, in the opinion of His Majesty, to render their revival unnecessary. Mr. Baker moreover stated, that the orders would be revived, provided the American Government did not, within fourteen days after they received the official declaration of their repeal, admit British armed vessels into their ports, and put an end to the restrictive measures which had grown out of the Orders in Council.

The despatches authorizing the communication to the American Government, expressly directed that it should be made verbally; and Mr. Baker did not consider himself at liberty to reduce it to writing, even in the form of a note, verbal or pro memoria, or to suffer me to take a memorandum of his communication at the time he made it. I understood from him that, the despatches had been opened by Mr. Foster at Halifax, who, in consequence of a conversation he had had with Vice Admiral Sawyer and Sir John Sherbrooke, had authorized Mr. Baker to say that these gentlemen would agree, as a measure leading to a suspension of hostilities, that all captures made after a day to be fixed should not be proceeded against immediately, but be detained to await the future decision of the two Governments. Mr. Foster had not seen Sir George Prevost, but had written to him by express, and did not doubt but that he would agree to an arrangement for the temporary suspension of hostilities. Mr. Baker also stated, that he had received an authority from Mr. Foster to act as Chargé d'Affaires, provided the American Government would receive him in that character, for the purpose of enabling him officially to communicate the declaration which was to be expected from the British Government; his functions to be understood, of course, as ceasing on the renewal of hostilities. I replied that, although to so general and informal a communication no answer might be necessary, and certainly no particular answer expected, yet I was authorized to say, that the communication is received with sincere satisfaction, as it is hoped that the spirit in which it was authorized by his Government may lead to such further communications as will open the way, not only for an early and satisfactory termination of existing hostilities, but to that entire adjustment of all the differences which produced them, and to that permanent peace and solid friendship which ought to be mutually desired by both countries, and which is sincerely desired by this.

With this desire, an authority was given to Mr. Russell on the subject of an armistice, as introductory to a final pacification, as has been made known to Mr. Foster; and the same desire will be felt on the receipt of the further and more particular communications which are shortly to be expected.

With respect to the joint intimation from Mr. Foster and the British authorities at Halifax, on the subject of suspending judicial proceedings in the case of maritime captures, to be accompanied by a suspension of military operations, the authority given to Mr. Russell, just alluded to, and of which Mr. Foster was the bearer, is full proof of the solicitude of the Government of the United States to bring about a general suspension of hostilities on admissible terms, with as little delay as possible. It was not to be doubted, therefore, that any other practicable expedient for attaining a similar result would readily be concurred in.

Relations with France.

Upon the most favorable consideration, however, which could be given to the expedient suggested through him, it did not appear to be reducible to any practical shape to which the Executive would be authorized to give it the necessary sanction. Nor, indeed, is it probable, if it was less liable to insuperable difficulties, that it could have any material effect previous to the result of the pacific advance made by this Government, and which must, if favorably received, become operative as soon as any other arrangement that could now be made. It was stated to Mr. Baker, that the President did not, under existing circumstances, consider Mr. Foster as vested with the power of appointing a Chargé d'Affaires; but that no difficulty, in point of form, would be made, as any authentic communication through him, or any other channel, would be received with attention and respect.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Barlow.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, June 16, 1812.

SIR: An act declaring war against Great Britain will probably pass both Houses on this day or to-morrow. It has already passed the House of Representatives, and, from what is known of the disposition of the Senate, its assent is expected without delay.

This result has grown out of the continued aggressions of that Power on our commerce. Propositions were made in both Houses of Congress to comprise France in the same declaration; and in the Senate the vote was fifteen for, to seventeen against it. In the other House the majority against it was proportionably greater. Its defeat in both Houses has been, doubtless, in a great measure, owing to a passage in your last letter, which intimated the intention of the French Government to make some proposition in favor of indemnities, to be comprised in the treaty you were negotiating, whereby an expectation was excited that that interest would be provided for, and satisfaction given on the other grounds of complaint against France. The sentiment in both Houses, as it is with the nation generally, produced by so many acts of injustice, for which reparation has not been made, is strong against France. The arrival of the Wasp, which you promised to despatch in two or three weeks from the date of your last letter, with the result of your labors, and which may be now daily expected, was another motive for delaying ulterior measures with respect to her. In advising the war against England, as was distinctly implied by the late Message which brought that subject under consideration, the President stated to Congress his strong dissatisfaction with the conduct of the French Government on every former ground of complaint, and to which others of a more recent date have been added, with the single exception of the repeal of the decrees. He promised also to bring our affairs with that Power fully before Congress as soon as he should receive the communications which you had promised to forward by the Wasp. I communicate these facts, which are of a character too marked to require any comment, that you may be enabled to turn them to the best account in promoting an amicable accommodation with the French Government of every wrong received from it, which is sincerely desired.

You were informed, by my letter of the 6th of May, of such outrages committed by a squadron which was reported to have sailed from Nantes in January last, as were, at that time, known here. It appears that several vessels sailing from American ports to Lisbon and Cadiz, laden with the productions of the United States, were seized and burnt at sea. The crews of these vessels were taken on board one of the French vessels, and afterwards transferred to another of our vessels engaged in the same trade, which was also seized, in which they made their way home. These men forwarded here the evidence of these acts, copies of which have already been transmitted to you. I forward to you, by this conveyance, the evidence of other aggressions, which will claim, in like manner, your particular attention. Most of these documents have been laid before Congress, and referred by it to this Department.

You will analyze all these cases of recent spoliations, and place them in the class of aggressions to which they severally belong on principle. In demanding of Great Britain the repeal of her Orders in Council, on the ground of the repeal of the French decrees, this Government has, from a regard to justice, given to France all the credit to which she had any claim, believing that the notification alone of the French Minister of Foreign Affairs to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris of their repeal, was sufficient to justify the demand of the repeal of the Orders in Council of Great Britain, on her own principles. But it was never the intention of this Government to concede to France anything on that subject, to which she was not fairly entitled. On the contrary, it has been its intention, as is sufficiently evident by your first instructions, to exact from her a most strict and rigorous compliance with her pledge in regard to the repeal. If any act in violation of that pledge has been committed, you will not fail to point it out in the most distinct manner to the French Government, and to communicate to this Department, without delay, any answer which you may receive from it. I have to add, admitting that the repeal of the decrees is observed with perfect good faith, that if the French Government has given other orders, or permits acts of another character, which violate our rights, the wrong will not be less sensibly felt or less resented by this Government.

Your despatches by the Hornet were received on the 22d May. They are the last which have come to hand. I have, &c., J. MONROE.
JOEL BARLOW, Esq., &c.

ment, in the hope that it may reach Mr. Morton at Baltimore, and be conveyed with the letters and documents with which he is already charged for you.

The President has seen, with great surprise and concern, that the Government of France had made no accommodation to the United States on any of the important and just grounds of complaint to which you had called its attention, according to your instructions, given at the time of your departure, and repeated in several communications since. It appears that the same oppressive restraints on our commerce were still in force; that the system of license was persevered in; that indemnity had not been made for spoliations, nor any pledge given to inspire confidence that any would be made. More recent wrongs, on the contrary, and of a very outrageous character, have been added to those with which you were acquainted when you left the United States. By documents forwarded to you in my letter of 21st March, you were informed of the waste of our commerce, made by a squadron from Nantes in January last, which burnt many of our vessels trading to the Peninsula. For these you were also instructed to demand redress.

It is hoped that the Government of France, regarding with a prudent foresight the probable course of events, will have some sensibility to its interest, if it has none to the claims of justice, on the part of this country.

On the French decree of the 28th of April, 1811, I shall forbear to make many observations which have already occurred, until all the circumstances connected with it are better understood. The President approves your effort to obtain a copy of that decree, as he does the communication of it afterwards to Mr. Russell.

[Communicated to Congress, January 7, 1814.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit for the information of Congress copies of a letter from the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to the Secretary of State, with the answer of the latter.

In appreciating the accepted proposal of the Government of Great Britain for instituting negotiations for peace, Congress will not fail to keep in mind that vigorous preparations for carrying on the war can in no respect impede the progress to a favorable result; whilst a relaxation of such preparations, should the wishes of the United States for a speedy restoration of the blessings of peace be disappointed, would necessarily have the most injurious consequences.

Lord Castlereagh to the Secretary of State.

FOREIGN OFFICE, November 4, 1813.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose to you, for the information of the President of the United States, copy of a note which His Britannic Majesty's Ambassador at the Court of St. Petersburg was directed to present to the Russian Government, as soon as His Royal Highness, the Prince Regent, was informed that Plenipotentiaries had been nominated on the part of the American Government for the purpose of negotiating for peace with Great Britain, under the mediation of His Imperial Majesty.

His Lordship having, by the last courier from the imperial headquarters, acquainted me that the American Commissioners now at St. Petersburg have intimated, in reply to this overture, that they had no objection to a negotiation at London, and were equally desirous, as the British Government had declared itself to be, that this business should not be mixed with the affairs of the continent of Europe, but that their powers were limited to negotiate under the mediation of Russia:

Under these circumstances, and in order to avoid an unnecessary continuance of the calamities of war, the Prince Regent commands me to transmit, by a flag of truce, to the American port nearest to the Seat of Government, the official note above mentioned, in order that the President, if he should feel disposed to enter upon a direct negotiation for the restoration of peace between the two States, may give his directions accordingly.

In making this communication, I can assure you that the British Government is willing to enter into discussion with the Government of America for the conciliatory adjustment of the differences subsisting between the two States, with an earnest desire on their part to bring them to a favorable issue, upon principles of perfect reciprocity, not inconsistent with the established maxims of public law, and with the maritime rights of the British Empire.

The Admiral commanding the British squadron on the American station will be directed to give the necessary protection to any persons proceeding to Europe, on the part of the Government of the United States, in furtherance of this overture; or, should the American Government have occasion to forward orders to their Commissioners at St. Petersburg, to give the requisite facilities, by cartel or otherwise, to the transmission of the same.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient humble servant, CASTLEREAGH.

THE AMERICAN SECRETARY OF STATE, &c.

Lord Cathcart to the Count De Nesselrode.

TOPLITZ, September 1, 1813.

The undersigned, Ambassador of His Britannic Majesty to the Emperor of all the Russias, desiring to avail himself of the first occasion to renew the subject respecting America, which was brought into discussion in a conference at the moment of his departure from Reichenbach, has the honor to address this note to his Excellency the Count de Nesselrode.

Although the Prince Regent, for reasons which have been already made known, has not found himself in a situation to accept the mediation of His Imperial Majesty, for terminating the dissensions with the United States of America, His Royal Highness desires, nevertheless, to give effect to the beneficent wishes which His Imperial Majesty has expressed of seeing the war between Great Britain and America soon terminated, to the mutual satisfaction of the two Governments.

With this view, His Royal Highness, having learned that the Envoys Plenipotentiary of the United States for negotiating a peace with Great Britain, under the mediation of His Imperial Majesty, have arrived in Russia, notwithstanding that he finds himself under the necessity of not accepting the interposition of any friendly Power in the question which forms the principal object in dispute between the two States, he is nevertheless ready to nominate Plenipotentiaries to treat directly with the American Plenipotentiaries.

His Royal Highness sincerely wishes that the conferences of these Plenipotentiaries may result in re-establishing between the two nations the blessing and the reciprocal advantages of peace.

If, through the good offices of His Imperial Majesty, this proposition should be accepted, the Prince Regent would prefer that the conferences should be held at London, on account of the facilities which it would give to the discussions.

But if this choice should meet with insuperable obstacles, His Royal Highness would consent to substitute Gottenburg, as the place nearest to England. The undersigned, &c.

CATHCART.

Secretary of State to Lord Castlereagh.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

January 5, 1814.

MY LORD: I have had the honor to receive, by a flag of truce, your Lordship's letter of the 4th of November last, and a copy of a note which His Britannic Majesty's Ambassador at the Court of St. Petersburg presented to the Russian Government on the 1st of September preceding.

By this communication it appears that his Royal Highness, the Prince Regent, rejected the mediation offered by His Imperial Majesty to promote peace between the United States and Great Britain, but proposed to treat directly with the United States at Gottenburg, or London, and that he had requested the interposition of the good offices of the Emperor in favor of such an arrangement.

Having laid your Lordship's communication before the President, I am instructed to state, for the information of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, that the President has seen with regret the new obstacle to the commencement of a negotiation for the accommodation of differences between the United States and Great Britain. As the Emperor of Russia was distinguished for his rectitude and impartiality, and was moreover engaged in a war as an ally of England, whereby it was his interest to promote peace between the United States and Great Britain, the President could not doubt that His Royal Highness the Prince Regent would accept the mediation which His Imperial Majesty had offered to them. It was the confidence with which the high character of the Emperor inspired the President that inclined him, disregarding considerations which a more cautious policy might have suggested, to accept the overture with promptitude, and to send Ministers to St. Petersburg to take advantage of it. It would have been very satisfactory to the President if His Royal Highness the Prince Regent had found it compatible with the views of Great Britain to adopt a similar measure, as much delay might have been avoided in accomplishing an object which it is admitted is of high importance to both nations.

The course proposed as a substitute for negotiations at St. Petersburg, under the auspices of the Emperor of Russia, could not, I must remark to your Lordship, have been required for the purpose of keeping the United States unconnected, against Great Britain, with any affairs of the Continent. There was nothing in the proposed mediation tending to such a result. The terms of the overture indicated the contrary. In offering to bring the parties together, not as an umpire, but as a common friend, to discuss and settle their differences and respective claims in a manner satisfactory to themselves, His Imperial Majesty showed the interest which he took in the welfare of both parties.

Wherever the United States may treat, they will treat with the sincere desire they have repeatedly manifested of terminating the present contest with Great Britain, on conditions of reciprocity consistent with the rights of both parties as sovereign and independent nations, and calculated not only to establish present harmony, but to provide, as far as possible, against future collisions which might interrupt it.

Before giving an answer to the proposition communicated by your Lordship to treat with the United States independently of the Russian mediation, it would have been agreeable to the President to have heard from the Plenipotentiaries of the United States sent to St. Petersburg. The offer of a mediation by one Power, and the acceptance of it by another, form a relation between them, the delicacy of which cannot but be felt. From the known character, however, of the Emperor, and the benevolent views with which his mediation was offered, the President cannot doubt that he will see with satisfaction a concurrence of the United States in an alternative, which, under existing circumstances, affords the best prospect of attaining speedily what was the object of his interposition. I am accordingly instructed to make known to your Lordship, for the information of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, that the President accedes to his proposition, and will take the measures depending on him for carrying it into effect at Gottenburg, with as little delay as possible; it being presumed that His Majesty the King of Sweden, as the friend of both parties, will readily acquiesce in the choice of a place for their pacific negotiations, within his dominions.

The President is duly sensible of the attention of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent in giving the orders to the Admiral commanding the British squadron on this coast, which your Lordship has communicated.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

MEDIATION OF RUSSIA.

[Communicated to the House, January 18, 1814.]

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report of the Secretary of State, complying with their resolution of the 13th instant.

JAMES MADISON.

JANUARY, 18, 1814.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Jan. 18, 1814.

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 13th instant, requesting the President to lay before the House such documents relative to the Russian mediation as, in his opinion, it may not be improper to communicate, has the honor to transmit to the President for the information of the House, the following letters in relation to that subject, viz:

A letter in French (with the translation) from M. Daschkoff, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of His Majesty the Emperor of Russia, to the Secretary of State, of the 8th March, 1813, with the answer of the Secretary of State of the 11th of March.

An extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Adams, Minister of the United States at St. Petersburg, of the 1st of July 1812, and four letters and extracts from Mr. Adams to the Secretary of State, bearing date respectively on the 30th September, 17th October, and 11th December, 1812, and on the 26th June, 1813.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JAMES MONROE.

Mr. de Daschkoff, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, to the Secretary of State of the United States.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 24, (March 8.) 1813.

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of His Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, has the honor to make known to the Secretary of State of the United States of America, that he has just received orders from the Emperor his master, to make the following overture to his Excellency the President of the United States:

The peace of Russia with England seemed to present this immense advantage to the commerce of nearly all seafaring people, that it freed their relations from that constraint, from that continual vexation, to which it had been subjected for many years without intermission. The Emperor viewed with pleasure a result so conformable to all his wishes, and which appeared as not being at all doubtful. It became so, however, by the war between England and America.

The undersigned is directed to express to the President of the United States the regret with which His Imperial Majesty foresees the great shackles which this new episode is about to oppose to the commercial prosperity of nations. The love of humanity, and what he owes to his subjects, whose commerce has already sufficiently suffered, command him to do everything in his power to remove the evils which this war is preparing even for those nations who will not take part in it.

His Majesty, who takes pleasure in doing justice to the wisdom of the Government of the United States of America, is convinced that it has done all that it could to prevent this rupture, but that treating of it directly would take away from the negotiation all semblance of impartiality. In a direct discussion, everything would tend to excite the prejudices and the asperity of the parties. To obviate this inconvenience, His Majesty the Emperor, gratified at being able to give a proof of his friendship alike for His Majesty the King of Great Britain and the United States of America, wished to offer to them his mediation, and charged the undersigned to propose it to the President of the United States.

The undersigned, having the honor to communicate to the Secretary of State the sentiments and the wishes of His Imperial Majesty, he begs him to make them known to the President of the United States. The Emperor would feel great satisfaction if a like disposition on the part of the Government of the United States should have the effect of stopping the progress of this new war, and of extinguishing it in its origin. From the satisfactory assurances which the President of the United States has constantly given to the undersigned of the sentiments of regard and friendship on the part of the United States, and of His Excellency for Russia, and particularly for the august person of His Majesty, he cannot but flatter himself that he will receive an answer which shall correspond with the generous wishes of the Emperor his master.

The undersigned cannot refrain from expressing on this occasion to the Secretary of State his individual wishes for whatever may have a tendency to re-establish active relations between Russia and the United States, and to advance the prosperity of the public.

He seizes with eagerness this occasion to renew to the Secretary of State the assurance of his highest consideration and respect.

ANDRE DE DASCHKOFF.

Mediation of Russia.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Daschkoff.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 11, 1813.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your note of the 8th instant, making known to the President of the United States the disposition of His Majesty the Emperor of Russia to promote peace, by his friendly mediation between the United States and Great Britain.

I am instructed by the President to assure you, that he sees in this overture, on the part of your Sovereign, strong proofs of that humane and enlightened policy which have characterized his reign. It was impossible that a war between the United States and Great Britain should not materially affect the commerce of Russia, and it was worthy the high character of a Prince, distinguished by his attachment to the interests of his people, to interpose his good offices for the restoration of peace. The President sees, at the same time, in this overture, and in the circumstances attending it, a strong proof of the friendly interest which His Imperial Majesty takes in the welfare of the United States. The United States, conscious that they were not the aggressors in this contest; that, on the contrary, they had borne great wrongs for a series of years before they appealed to arms in defence of their rights, are willing and ready to lay them down as soon as Great Britain ceases to violate those rights.

The President is aware that many of the inconveniences resulting from a direct communication between the parties themselves may be avoided by the mediation of a third Power, especially one entitled to and possessing the entire confidence of both the belligerents. To the claim of Russia to that distinguished consideration the President does not hesitate to express, on the part of the United States, his full acknowledgment. He collects with much satisfaction that, during a period of great and general contention, the relations of friendship have always subsisted between the United States and Russia; and he finds in the personal qualities and high character of the Emperor Alexander a sacred pledge for the justice and impartiality which may be expected from his interposition.

Influenced by these sentiments, the President instructs me to inform you that he willingly accepts the mediation of your Sovereign to promote peace between the United States and Great Britain. I am instructed also to state, that such arrangements will be made, without delay, as will afford to His Imperial Majesty the opportunity he has invited, to interpose his good offices for the accomplishment of so important an event. Of these arrangements I shall have the honor to advise you in an early communication.

I have, &c. JAMES MONROE.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to John Quincy Adams, Esq., Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at St. Petersburg.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 1, 1812.

SIR: On the 18th ultimo a declaration of war against Great Britain passed Congress; of which, of the President's Message, and report of the Committee of Foreign Relations of the House of Representatives leading to it, I have the honor to transmit to you copies.
